THE NOBLE-HEARTED AMERICAN IRON AND Steel Institute is set on protecting its workers from labor agitators. In a statement issued on June 29 the institute announced that a campaign for union organization had been promised by "persons and organizations not connected with the industry" (how news does get around these days!); that "there are many disturbing indications that the promoters of the campaign will employ coercion and intimidation . . . and foment strikes"; and then to make its position perfectly clear, the institute adds that it will use all its resources (and five billion dollars are a lot of resources) to prevent the adoption of the closed shop. Not, of course, that the industry is opposed to unions. On the contrary, "the overwhelming majority of the employees of the steel industry recently participated in annual elections under their own representation plans and elected their representatives for collective bargaining." But these are comfortable company unions which the industry feels thoroughly able to control—by labor rats and the black list if necessary, as recent investigations have amply shown. What the industry objects to are organizers of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, with the sponsorship and the organizing resources of John L. Lewis. What it objects to, in other words, is bona fide collective bargaining which would be a challenge to the power of steel's masters. In reply the C. I. O. is unkind enough to point out the curious similarity between the institute's statement on collective bargaining and that of the Republican platform and to declare that it will proceed with its organizing campaign regardless.

HAILE SELASSIE'S BELATED STAND FOR ETHIOPIAN independence on the battlefields of Geneva can hardly do more than embarrass the League in lifting sanctions against Italy. Under the pressure of the British Tory government the majority of League states have given up the struggle to preserve even the principle of punishment of a successful aggressor. The new government in France, which might have been expected to support the League Covenant, has very naturally drawn back from a step which threatened to isolate France with respect to its three most powerful neighbors. With sanctions already buried, the real battle is expected on the subsidiary point of recognizing Italian sovereignty over Ethiopia. While the precedent set in the Manchurian affair makes it virtually impossible for the League to acknowledge Italy's conquest, the powers are unwilling to take action which would "offend" Mussolini lest he withdraw from the League he has all but wrecked. Consequently, if any mention is made of Italy's guilt, it will be in the most guarded language. These developments have played directly into Hitler's hands. With the prospect of punitive action by the League eliminated, France as well as Britain has made direct overtures to Germany, Delbos going so far as to say that he did not "question the word of a former combatant who during four years experienced the misery of the trenches." To read the hopeful statements emanating from London and Paris one would almost think that no Eastern Europe exists—which is exactly what Hitler desires.

WAR HAS NOT YET BROKEN OUT IN CHINA, and each day that the threatened hostilities between Nanking and Canton are deferred increases the possibility that the civil strife will give way to a straight Sino-Japanese conflict. Feeling between the two countries has reached fever pitch with Japan once more taking the aggressive. Tokyo has filed a vigorous protest against the firing by Chinese customs vessels on Japanese smugglers, and the Chinese in turn have been incensed by the arrogant conduct of the recently strengthened Japanese garrison in Peiping. A report from Chinese sources asserts that two department-store employees were recently arrested in Tientsin charged with selling goods bearing a trademark which pictured a girl standing under a parasol. This trademark was interpreted by the Japanese as counsel to resist the sun, which to them could only refer to the Japanese Empire. It is not impossible that the hint will be accepted. While it is scarcely to be expected that the hand-picked delegates who will be present at the Kuomintang national congress on July 10 will go so far as to support the South's war of "national salvation," there is an excellent chance that the compromise on domestic issues which must precede a united stand against Japanese aggression will be reached.

WHILE THE DEMOCRATS WERE DISPORTING themselves at Philadelphia, the Communist Party was conducting a political convention of its own in New York. There were certain superficial similarities between the two conventions. Both listened to endless speeches denouncing their political enemies; both prepared platforms and nominated their Presidential candidates by acclamation; and both staged prolonged demonstrations for their party leaders. In contrast to the playboy atmosphere at Philadelphia, however, the Communists sought to face the essential political issues of our time in an adult manner. Their platform dealt with a number of vital issues which both the major parties had carefully dodged. It favored a constitutional amendment to curb the Supreme Court, increased taxation on the higher incomes, drastic legislation against lynching, the Frazier-Lundeen social-insurance bill, and cooperation with the League of Nations in the enforcement of peace. The vast majority of these specific recommendations can, as the platform points out, be realized within the capitalist system. But at the present stage of American political development, there is little hope of achieving even these limited objectives either through the major parties or through an avowedly revolutionary organization such as the Communist Party. If they are to be achieved at all, it will be through a party based primarily on labor and embracing all the left groups.

THE FIGHT BETWEEN PHIL LA FOLLETTE AND the Socialists in Wisconsin ended temporarily in a draw at the conclusion of the convention of the Farmer-Labor Progressive Federation at Oshkosh on June 21. The federation did not indorse the Governor but named no candidate to run against him. It pointed out that its constitution permitted indorsement only of federation members, and Governor La Follette had declined to join. The production-for-use slogan was not repeated in the platform, but on the other hand it was not removed from the Declaration of Principles, and a paragraph on public corporations made clear the federation's stand in favor of the socialization of industry. The main fact to remember is that the federation did not split or dissolve, but will abide by its resolution to build a real farmer-labor party in the state, looking toward a national party by 1940. It hopes this fall to elect a complete legislative slate, thus ending the conflict between Progressives and Socialists which has enabled the two old parties to hold the balance of power. No Presidential candidate was indorsed in spite of a movement, which was vociferously defeated, to support the new Union Party of Mr. Lemke. The group promises to make a considerable show of strength in November and to be worth watching four years hence.

NO WORSE LEGISLATION WAS PASSED BY THE expiring Congress than that providing for direct ship subsidies. What this bill does is to create a new group of the specially privileged, and to establish an industry which openly declares that it cannot live without government support. Those receiving the dole will become a vested interest with the powerful argument on their side that if the government stops pouring money into their laps their business will fail, goods will be carried by others, and many Americans will be thrown out of work. Mr. Roosevelt, as an intelligent man, must be aware of all this, as of the indisputable fact that no such system of subsidies has ever been established in this country without bringing with it graft, scandal, and corruption. He has yielded to it partly because of the obvious disgrace and "honest" graft attending the present mail subsidies, but mainly because of the argument that we must have a large reserve merchant fleet for the next war. So the government will give 50 per cent of the cost of new ships to the builders and lend 25 per cent more! Assistant Secretary of Commerce Johnson in speech after speech demands that 350 additional vessels be built at once, without inquiring whether there is the slightest economic need for them or whether there will be any cargoes for them to carry. Failure to build these ships, he asserts, is a "potential danger to national defense." Thus the ship-subsidy act has become part and parcel of the rapid militarization of the United States.

EVEN AS PREMIER OF FRANCE, LEON BLUM IS A man little known to the general public. That he has had a distinguished career in literature as well as in politics is hardly realized outside his own country. The Lumière, the leading weekly of the French left, publishes an essay on Blum as a poet, critic, and social philosopher which reveals the wide range of his mind and activities. Along with André Gide, Pierre Louys, and Paul Valéry, he made his debut in letters at the time of the flowering of the symbolist epoch in France. His first sonnets were published in the ephemeral and rarefied journals issued by his fellow-symbolists in their reaction against the commercialized literature of the boulevards. Later, with Henri Barbusse, he became a contributing editor to the Banquet, founded by Marcel Proust and expressive of the newly aroused political, social, and intellectual curiosity of the times. Then came the Dreyfus case, which gave Blum his baptism in the realities of the fight for social justice. In this impassioned era he was swept into contact with Jaurès and the young Socialists, but as yet he did not enter the field of practical politics, preferring to continue the fight with his pen rather than on the rostrum. After the excitement over Dreyfus died down, Blum temporarily set aside his interest in social questions to become one of the leading dramatic critics of the day. He achieved distinction also for critical essays on Goethe and Stendhal, his favorite authors, and for his famous treatise on marriage, which greatly influenced Bertrand Russell's writings on the same subject. There is a certain irony in the spectacle of a man of Blum's type heading a labor government. Whether the two can be welded into a successful whole remains to be seen.

THERE IS A SIGNIFICANT OMISSION IN THE latest press release on the Federal Trade Commission's investigation of the milk industry. Nowhere in the twelve-page summary is the name of a single distributor given. This is a reversal of the original policy, and probably indicates that the milk trust has brought pressure to bear on the FTC to give them the shield of anonymity. The government also seems to have had a change of heart on the evils of monopolistic control. The satisfactory conditions found to exist in Baltimore were attributed "in part to the comparatively few milk distributors operating in the Baltimore sales area." A more important factor is undoubtedly the strength of the producers' association, the Maryland Cooperative Milk Producers. However, the distributors have quite consistently shown high net returns, which indicates that even when the producers are in a position to demand a square deal the distributors can still manage to make a substantial profit. Their largest item of expense is, of course, for delivery and selling, accounting for approximately 60 per cent of the total operating expenses. Part of the apparent high cost of delivery is attributed to the distributors' method of bookkeeping. Although milk, cream, cheese, eggs, and other commodities are carried on a milk wagon, the companies charge almost the entire cost of delivery to milk, on which they are thus enabled to show a smaller book profit. The FTC points to the need for a new method of allocating delivery costs. A more important reform would be to eliminate the duplication of service on the same routes. If we must have monopoly, we could do without fictitious competition.

THE ARTICLE BY LEON TROTSKY ON FRANCE, on another page of this issue, and the symposium of protest and praise for Benjamin Stolberg's much-discussed article on the Jews may serve as occasion for a fresh declaration of editorial policy. We say again that the opinions expressed in signed articles and reviews are not necessarily the opinions of the editors. We take full responsibility only for what appears in the editorial columns. The demands we make upon our signed contributions are only that they shall be fresh, authoritative, important.

Mr. Roosevelt Holds Fast

THE tumult and the shouting have died down both in Cleveland and in Philadelphia. The captains and the kings of all political stripes have departed. What trial balance shall we strike? Let us dispose first of the newspaper and radio judgments now repeated for the thousandth time. Let us agree that never have nominating conventions been duller, never have they seemed so much like pepped-up carnivals, never have the delegates been so reduced to the role of puppets and noise machines as they were at both conventions. What remains?

What remains is that the issue is now squarely joined. The Republicans have shown that seven years of depression have taught them nothing fundamental about statesmanship and that three years of absence from office have only sharpened their hunger. That was the meaning of the noise at Cleveland. Much of the noise at Philadelphia may be set down to an equally strong Democratic hunger for continuing in office. But not all. The Democratic platform and Mr. Roosevelt's acceptance speech go beyond the greed of office-holding or the intoxication of convention ballyhoo. It is to Mr. Roosevelt's credit that he has seen the wisdom and necessity of holding fast to the essential achievements of the past three years. This does not mean that there has been no straddling. Actually a vast amount of ingenuity was spent in drafting a platform that will go down as one of the smoothest literary and intellectual performances in party history. But the skill was expended in dressing up something that has a real core to it. Mr. Roosevelt has served notice on the Tories in both parties that, whatever may be the chances of a further leftward movement, he has no intention of going backward.

As compared with the abysmally weak Republican platform, the Democrats have prepared an extremely clever document. They have exploited to the utmost the contrast between the three years of steady recovery under Roosevelt and the economic débâcle under Hoover. When read uncritically, the mere listing of the measures adopted by the Roosevelt Administration to combat the depression and aid the common man is impressive and makes the Republican criticisms appear carping and inconsequential.

There can be no question that the Democratic platform is considerably to the left of the Republican. Whereas the Republicans are completely oblivious to such problems as those of the consumer, housing, youth, and neutrality, the Democrats have recognized that millions of Americans are seriously concerned with these issues. They have accepted the principle of government responsibility for the unemployed and are not completely blind to the anti-social practices of the great corporations. They promise to continue the New Deal campaign against the utilities through the extension of the "yardstick" method.

The rhetoric of the farm plank is Roosevelt, but the substance is Henry Wallace. Therefore the plank is unusually explicit, for platform material, and has an unusual tone of sincerity. What it promises in effect is to carry forward the policies worked out by Wallace in the last three years. Excessive surpluses are to be controlled by a thorough conservation and domestic-allotment plan; federal finance is to be applied toward reducing interest charges on loans; cooperation is to be encouraged; efforts are to be made to extend markets at home and abroad. The platform recognizes the evils of farm tenancy, but unfortunately fails to say explicitly what is to be done about it; imperfect context implies that federal loans may be used to transform tenants into owners. Unlike the corresponding plank of the Republican platform, the Democratic plank promises nothing that cannot be performed. It promises nothing that the Democrats do not intend to perform. Credit for this is due to Henry Wallace. A better plank would have read: We intend to keep Henry Wallace in his post and back him to the limit in his plans for placing American agriculture on a sound footing.

The Democrats can also point to concrete measures to aid both the farmer and the consumer by reciprocal tariff reduction. In fact, their international plank is vastly stronger than that of the Republicans. While no mention is made of international cooperation for the maintenance of peace through pacts of collective security or otherwise, the platform comes out specifically against war as an instrument of national policy, and is realistic enough to see that the urge for profits and the commitments of international bankers are among the most important causes of war. There is an ominous silence, however, regarding the munitions makers, and there is no mention of the hundreds of millions of American dollars which Roosevelt is squandering annually on a war machine patently designed for offensive purposes.

The greatest weakness of the platform as a practical political document lies in the appalling discrepancy between its promises and the record of the Administration during the past three years. It is very pleasant, for example, to read that the Democrats "will act to secure to the consumer fair value," until one recalls the fate of the food-and-drug bill at the hands of a Democratic Congress and the manner in which the consumer divisions of the NRA and the AAA were sabotaged at every turn by Democratic politicians. Similarly, one might be inspired by the statement that the party is "determined to erect a structure of economic security for all our people" if one did not know the details of the cumbersome, inadequate Social Security Act, with its vicious system of reserves which at best will provide protection for less than half of the unemployed and, on a federal basis, for scarcely a third of the aged. The platform's pious words regarding the necessity for government housing will mean very little to the 15,000,000 American families now living in homes that do not measure up to the minimum standard of decent housing, for it will not be forgotten that the Administration has stressed the need for a housing program since the early days of 1933—and has built no houses.

It is scarcely reassuring, moreover, to have the party come out in a campaign year, within a week of the adjournment of Congress, with a statement saying that the government should provide work at prevailing wages for the millions who cannot find jobs in industry, when the best that the party achieved in three years was the temporary employment, in the CWA, of four million out of twelve million unemployed, and when this program has now been pared down until only one jobless man out of four is employed by the government, and at one-half to two-thirds the prevailing wage. The promise to guard the freedom of the radio would be much more impressive if the FCC had not just handed down its ruling forbidding the rebroadcasting of foreign programs without its consent.

Merely to list the planks which the Democrats should have included would take more space than we have at our disposal. Fundamental, of course, would have been a plank calling for an amendment to the Constitution ending the usurpation of power by the Supreme Court. We believe also that the Democrats could have strengthened their position in the country if they had come out definitely for child-labor and minimum-wage legislation, advanced an adequate relief program, advocated specific steps to preserve civil liberties, and openly favored nationalization of the munitions industry. There is a strong popular feeling against all forms of repressive measures, and a courageous stand against such un-American influences as are expressed in the Kramer sedition bill, the loyalty oaths, and deportation of aliens seeking political asylum might have done much to revive the wavering faith of left-wing groups in Mr. Roosevelt's sincerity.

Taken as a whole, the platform is better than was generally expected. So was Mr. Roosevelt's acceptance speech. It had what the Republicans have so often accused him of lacking—taste and dignity. It made everything that had gone before seem shrill and inconsequential. Let there be no mistake about it: it did not make a proletarian leader out of a patrician, nor did it make Mr. Roosevelt a potential leader in a labor party. It showed only that the President has intelligence, that he is sensitive to the major winds of doctrine of today, and that he can catch and express the aspirations of the lower middle classes. It showed Mr. Roosevelt's recognition that we are living in a new economic universe, and that the forces that threaten popular freedom today are not the political bugbears of the past but the very real economic tyrannies of the present. Mr. Roosevelt has come to see that the role of the Democratic Party is a conservative one—to make to the rising forces of labor and the common man the concessions which alone can keep the prevailing social system intact. That is the meaning of Mr. Roosevelt's liberalism.

He has recognized what we must all recognize—that the rank and file of Americans are more radical than either of their two major parties. For the present, American radicalism must curb itself because it fears the uncharted future and because no new leadership has yet emerged. But when as practical a politician as Mr. Roosevelt talks about economic royalists, then most Americans respond. We must remember, however, that speeches, however persuasive they are and however much they may quote Dante, are not enough. The continuance of Mr. Roosevelt's liberalism can be assured only by the growing strength of organization among labor and professional groups and education among the middle-class groups. More important than any campaign developments will be what happens this summer in the steel regions around Pittsburgh, Youngstown, Chicago, and Birmingham.

How Free Is the Air?

IN ONE of the most amazing rulings ever issued by a governmental body in this country the Federal Communications Commission has forbidden the rebroadcasting of foreign programs without its written permission. When the order becomes effective on July 1, it will mark the abandonment for radio of every pretense of adherence to the proud tradition of freedom of speech and thought. The indifference of the public is almost as amazing as the ruling itself. The general press has remained strangely silent; even the most vocal defenders of our civil liberties have not raised their voices; and the commercial broadcasters are unwilling, especially at a time when hearings on the reallocation of the radio spectrum are being held, to show resentment or to assert their independence.

The right of the FCC to issue such an order might easily be challenged. Under Section 326 of the act creating the commission the power of censorship except as to obscene, indecent, or profane language is expressly denied. By a broad interpretation of the provision which makes the issuance of a license to broadcast dependent on "public convenience, interest, or necessity," the old Radio Commission, as well as its successor, the Communications Commission, has of course indirectly censored radio programs. But this censorship, even though an established fact, has always been officially denied. The new ruling, therefore, constitutes the first admission that the FCC is in reality the dictator of the American radio world.

What prompted the FCC to make such a dangerous admission is hard to divine. The commission's most useful alibi has always been that it had no power to censor programs. The danger from foreign propagandists must certainly have seemed great to have induced the commission to uncover its hand. Although there has been considerable use of radio by foreign propagandists, the novelty of foreign broadcasts to the American radio audience is beginning to wear off. But the commission is evidently thinking of future contingencies. The role it now essays is highly perilous. Permitting or refusing to permit the broadcasting of certain programs may very well be accepted by European countries as indicative of national policy and may arouse considerable antagonism. But these obvious problems and their rather terrifying implications apparently do not trouble the commission nearly so much as the fear that foreign governments will use the radio to spread their subversive propaganda.

The new ruling is made ridiculous by the inability of the FCC to censor the programs heard by owners of short-wave sets. It is estimated that there are now approximately six million short-wave sets in use, and the proud owners, their families, and friends can listen directly to the European broadcasts which the twenty million owners of standard sets may not be permitted to hear. Eventually the FCC may find it necessary to adopt the Nazi practice of censorship by interference with the air waves.

There is a significant exception to the ruling on rebroadcasting. If the program is transmitted entirely by telephone facilities, it does not come under the ban. This exception might almost have been written by the telephone companies themselves. It is a direct subsidy to them. But the commission's intention was far more subtle than appears on the surface. Wealthy chain stations use telephone facilities to obtain foreign programs for rebroadcast; small stations pick up their programs from the air waves. The new regulations are aimed only at the little fellows and are intended to discourage them from disseminating too much foreign news. The chains representing huge capital investments are considered safe and less in need of strict censorship. The commission's rules are masterpieces of ingenuity—without mentioning the large stations, they succeed in giving them a monopoly on foreign programs, they effectively check rebroadcasting of "dangerous" material, and they gratuitously increase the business of the telephone companies.

These rules were announced at a time when criticism was certain to be smothered in the apparently more important discussion of the reallocation of radio channels and in the hearings on the ultra-high wave lengths. The manner in which the FCC will distribute the new wave lengths, its handling of the claims of the powerful networks which now control all but a few of the cleared channels, place it in a very powerful position. Great things are promised by the radio experts—television, newspapers printed by facsimile, bigger and better programs. But all of these are rendered unimportant in the light of the now publicly announced policy of government censorship.

Mrs. Warren's Profession

THE excellent work of Thomas E. Dewey and his associates in bringing about the conviction of Charles Luciano and eight of his confederates should not be allowed to set the public mind at rest on the vital problem of prostitution in our great cities. It was no part of Mr. Dewey's work to attack the problem itself; his concern was with breaking up a group of gangsters who were levying tribute on an illegal business. The business remains, and so long as women are jobless or wretchedly underpaid it will flourish whether it is legal or not.

While economic pressure drives women to sell their bodies, criminal prosecution of prostitutes will continue to reek of social hypocrisy. It will also retain the aspect of persecution, more especially since only the prostitute suffers. It is a criminal offense to cause another person to commit prostitution, but in practice the man who employs a prostitute is never molested—no doubt for the obvious reason that such a course would place a great many of our most highly respected citizens in the category of criminals. But in this discrimination between buyer and seller lies a great menace to public health. For the men who visit houses of prostitution return to homes throughout the community, carrying with them the danger of venereal disease to the members of their families—a danger which is strikingly illustrated by the fact that of eighty-eight prostitutes recently arrested in the city of New York, sixty-nine were found to be syphilitic, and by the further fact that 23 per cent of all prostitutes arrested in this city are found to be suffering from syphilis. On this aspect of the "social evil" the law is silent. The authorities have no power to compel the diseased prostitute to undergo treatment. In practice the Department of Correction does compel the convicted prostitute to take treatment by making it the condition of early release under an indeterminate sentence. About the woman who is acquitted it can do nothing.

These facts are sufficient proof that the whole theory and procedure in handling this problem need revision. The conviction of Luciano and his gang brought before the public a plan which Magistrate Anna M. Kross submitted to the Mayor of New York over a year ago. This plan contemplates placing the apprehension of persons engaged in prostitution in the hands of socially trained medical workers; substituting for the Women's Court an informal tribunal composed of a doctor, a psychiatrist, and a lawyer, with full power to apprehend and detain offenders under a "liberal, modern, scientific social-health code applicable to both sexes"; and substituting for criminal sentence "a medical, psychological, and social diagnosis on the basis of which appropriate treatment will be prescribed to meet the needs of the individual offender, utilizing all the community's resources for protection . . . and guidance."

Mr. Dewey's work is done, and well done. Mrs. Warren's profession proceeds as usual. It is high time for an intelligent revision of our social code along the lines indicated by Magistrate Kross.

Landon's Labor Record

Topeka, Kansas, June 29

THERE are three ways to judge a Presidential candidate, and only one of them is any good. One is to judge him by what he says he stands for. Another is to gauge him by what he has stood for. Comparing what he says he will do with what he actually has done is the best. Let's apply the third method here to Alf M. Landon with specific references to those issues in the Presidential campaign which bear most directly on his liberal pretensions—the Constitution, labor, relief, and social security.

Take first the constitutional issue, noting at the start that Landon thought he had Roosevelt topped on that score and that Roosevelt would not dare go so far as he had gone in his message to the Cleveland convention. Landon said in that message that he wanted the voters to know he would not hesitate to urge amendment of the Constitution when, as, and if it was demonstrated that under the present Constitution the states could not enact valid legislation to establish minimum wages for women and children in industry. He has declined to date to say how long he thinks it will take to provide the demonstration needed.

Apparently, however, it would take a long time to satisfy Landon. The records of his own state show that Kansas had a minimum-wage law for women and children until July 11, 1925, when the state Supreme Court invalidated it. The records also show that Landon has never raised a finger in protest. Nor has he ever advocated substitute legislation. His Commissioner of Labor and Industry, an Old Guard Republican by the name of G. E. Blakeley, when asked what labor legislation had been passed under Landon, could think only of the repeal of the state's $3 annual poll tax, a reduction in auto-license fees, and amendment of the workmen's-compensation act to let in all civil servants. Blakeley refused to boast about the state's workmen's-compensation act. He pointed out that Landon twice had urged the legislature to ratify the child-labor amendment, each time, with one eye on the farmers, hastening to explain that the amendment would not affect Kansas. Kansas, however, has not yet ratified it.

Kansas has a law requiring an eight-hour day and payment of prevailing wages on public works. It was invalidated by the state Supreme Court and reenacted in 1925, but according to Commissioner Blakeley, a Landon appointee, it remains inoperative. Kansas also has a Court of Industrial Relations, which was set up in 1920 under Governor Henry J. Allen, a former Hearst editor who belongs to the same "liberal" camp as Landon, had Landon as his secretary for a while when he was governor, and now is among Landon's most vigorous supporters. Allen is quoted here as boasting that Mussolini set up a similar court in Italy. The effect here was the same as the effect in Europe. Organized labor hated the court, which served principally as a strike-breaking agency. It had compulsory-arbitration powers and authority to use the militia. It called out the troops on several occasions, according to Blakeley, who says the court is now a dormant institution and that he has served these last few years in fear that its powers would again be invoked. It had in the beginning power to fix wages and hours in "essential" industries, but this power was taken from it a number of years ago by the United States Supreme Court (267 U.S. 552) in a case involving the packing industry.

The state's Department of Labor and Industry no longer attempts to regulate minimum wages for women and children in industry. It does attempt to do something about maximum hours, although, as Blakeley says, it has no power to enforce the orders it has issued. As last amended on February 15, 1936, those "orders" establish a nine-hour day and a forty-nine and one-half to fifty-two-hour week in laundries; a nine-hour day and six-day week of forty-nine and one-half to fifty-four hours in manufacturing establishments; an eight-hour day and a forty-eight-hour week in restaurants, hotels, and the like; a "basic" six-day week and a "basic" eight-hour day for telephone-company employees, with the exception of night operators, who may be employed for twelve hours at a stretch including "rest and sleep time . . . which shall not be considered work time." Landon opposed all parts of the NRA save the oil code, which jacked up oil prices. He is an oil operator, and his wells, bankers here estimate, yield him an income of from $20,000 to $30,000 a year. He is not a large operator, and "independent" is a misnomer when applied to him. His wells are so located as to place him completely at the mercy of Standard Oil. The pipe-line on which he must depend to get his oil to market belongs to a Standard Oil subsidiary. When he led his fellow-"independents" in a publicity fight against Standard Oil in 1930-31, it was merely to get Standard Oil to reopen the pipe-line and begin buying oil again from Landon and his fellows. His oil properties are non-union.

Landon professes no opposition to labor organization. He believes his employees will not organize because they have been with him many years. That belief seems to me a very significant gauge of his probable attitude on the collective-bargaining issue. One of his close advisers, when asked what Landon would do about the issue of labor relations if elected President, confidently replied that he would have a survey made. He would have the surveyors pick out the thousand companies that have had "the best labor relations," the adviser said; then he would have their policies digested, the secrets of their success analyzed, and out of the results he would compile a labor policy.

Perhaps a better gauge of Landon on labor relations—better than the fact that he permitted prison labor to be used on a public-works project and employed non-union labor in renovating the Executive Mansion here—is his conduct during the strike last year in the lead and zinc mines of southeastern Kansas. There seems to be a great deal of confusion in the East as to exactly what happened. Raymond Gram Swing, writing in The Nation last fall, left the impression, I am afraid, that the strike was largely a dispute between two unions and that the Governor's intervention did no measurable harm to the workers. Damon Runyon, writing in Mr. Hearst's Cosmopolitan under Mr. Hearst's orders, said organized labor did not hold the Governor's action against him. I have been at some pains to get the facts straight, and what is said here is drawn chiefly from official records. The picture justifies the resolution which the state Federation of Labor Forum passed in meeting at Coffeyville on June 11 of this year. It excoriated Landon for calling out the troops. The strike began on May 8, 1935, and covered not only the Kansas mines but also those in adjoining Missouri and Oklahoma. They are frightful places, badly inspected, with almost no ventilating equipment and a high incidence of lead poisoning and silicosis. The men employed in the mines had been unorganized until the New Deal came along. Their strike was principally for union recognition. There was only one union in the field at the time, the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, an A. F. of L. affiliate. It had 3,000 dues-paying members. The company representatives refused even to meet with union officials, and the strike ensued. There was no violence in the Kansas area up to the time the troops were ordered to the scene by Landon. There had been violence in Oklahoma, and the Governor there called out the troops on May 27. The troops were never called out in Missouri.

Landon ordered a battalion of militia to the scene on the night of June 7, 1935. He had been visited that day by a delegation of company lawyers. The troops arrived on the strike scene the following morning. A few hours earlier—at 2 a.m. on June 8—two power-line towers and a telegraph pole had been dynamited. There are at least strong indications that the dynamiting was the work of agents provocateurs and was intended solely to justify the Governor's action. In a subsequent injunction proceeding a miner, a union member, testified that he had urged the use of dynamite, that he was in daily communication with a company lawyer, and that he lived with two detectives employed by the companies for strike purposes. The Kansas City Star, chief journalistic supporter of Landon's Presidential ambitions, hailed the sending of the troops in a staff correspondent's dispatch on June 8. One appeal to the Governor for troops came from the under-sheriff of the county and the county attorney. It is one of the two messages on which Landon's defense is based. It said that the mayor was pro-union and did not want the troops. (Landon later started ouster proceedings against the mayor, who resigned and then successfully stood for reelection.) The other message was signed by a man who was the president of a union local. It gave thanks for the Governor's military intervention. The signer is no longer a union official. He belongs to the company union that the operators set up under cover of the militia's guns.

Known locally as the "blue-card" union, the company organization is called the Tri-State Metal, Mine, and Smelter Workers' Union. Its president is a mine operator, F. W. Evans, who in 1928 served a stretch in jail in Venita, Oklahoma, as a bootlegger. One of its members is John Campbell, personnel manager and secretary to the operating vice-president of the Eagle Picher Mining and Smelting Company, dominant corporation in the area. Campbell testified to his own connections with the company union during the injunction proceedings. Miners were paid $10 a head for deserting the A. F. of L. and joining the "blue-card" union under a pledge to have nothing more to do with bona fide unionism. The companies instituted a closed shop—closed to all except "blue-card" carriers. The strike was broken with some 5,000 miners remaining on the outside. There will be trouble again soon, for the old union is coming back by leaps and bounds. The companies, however, will not be unprepared this time. The last troops were withdrawn June 27, 1935. There ensued at once a riot of undetermined origin which brought the troops immediately back to the scene with a declaration of martial law. Before they left a second time they had trained for Cherokee County and its mine owners a "civil army" which, the Star's correspondent flatly asserted, "has the approval of Governor Landon."

Landon's record on relief and social security is not much more encouraging than his record on the labor issue. Contending that the Kansas constitution forbids any other course, he has left the relief problem entirely to the counties and the federal government, appropriating only $775,000 in state funds which are to be spread over a two-and-one-half-year period and spent solely on administration. When the legislature enacted a miserly social-security program that fell far short of the federal Social Security Act's requirements and was rejected by Washington, he again took a stand upon the state constitution, maintaining that an amendment was necessary if the state government was to do its proper part for social security. He turned over to the Judiciary Committee of the Kansas Legislative Council the task of drafting the amendment. The committee, dominated by Republican lawyers opposed to the social-security program, drafted an amendment that ran to several hundred words, divided into three sections, the last of which plainly was designed to convey the idea that "he who votes for this amendment sells his body and soul to Washington." When it was reported to the full council for action, a Democratic member dissented and forced the substitution of a simple, brief amendment. It is this amendment which is to be submitted to the legislature in special session July 7. In the Judiciary Committee's report there is a dissent by a Democratic legislator, W. G. Fink, which seems to answer the constitutional fears and forebodings of the Landon administration on the relief and social-security questions. Fink directs their attention to a recent decision of the state Supreme Court (138 Kansas 913) wherein the court said: "Our constitution nowhere prohibits the state from making provision by legislative enactment for the care of the poor and needy."

Roosevelt Comes Up Swinging

BY HEYWOOD BROWN

Philadelphia, June 28

THE Democratic convention at Philadelphia succeeded in exciting just one person, but he is a rather notable exception. Franklin D. Roosevelt took on energy while delegates droned their weary way through a cut-and-dried ritual. Only two things were exciting. One was the platform and Roosevelt wrote that, and the other was the speech at Franklin Field and that was Roosevelt's also. Concerning both the speech and the platform it may be said that they deal in generalities, but a general statement may at times be far stronger than a specific one. Take, for instance, the plank on a possible constitutional amendment. This is so loosely drawn that it gives the President power to take any stand he pleases. I do not expect to see Franklin D. Roosevelt advocating the curbing of Supreme Court power by direct Congressional action. And yet if he did so he could hardly be accused of jumping off the platform.

Of course, the President is still a long way from accepting a socialist state, but it is new for a Democrat to mark the fact that the right to a job is just as vital as the right to a vote. Roosevelt did a great deal in his acceptance speech to riddle that vague sort of liberty and freedom of which Hoover talked. The issue is pretty sharply drawn.

It is by no means fantastic to hail the New Dealers as constituting the nucleus for a true Farmer-Labor Party. Obviously a large part of the crowd at Franklin Field was composed of labor groups. To them Roosevelt was a sufficient symbol whatever his deficiencies as a candidate. After the votes have been counted in November, it may be that liberals will owe a debt to Father Coughlin. The radio priest is a fascist pure and simple, but he has seduced the minds of a certain number who sincerely believe in a new order. Demagogue though he be, Father Coughlin, with Lemke his hand-picked candidate, has pushed Roosevelt decidedly to the left. It will be well for us all to try to see that this pressure is continued. Stranger things have happened than a Roosevelt candidacy in 1940 on a Farmer-Labor ticket.

Smith and Colby and Cohalan and Ely have all done their bit toward the creation of a people's front. Their help has consisted in the revelation of precisely how reactionary some of our leading Democrats can be.

It is a pity that the purging process is so terribly incomplete. Cotton Ed Smith is said to have gone on a three-hour bolt because a Negro asked the invocation. The Senator should not have been allowed to return. Senator George is said to have threatened to quit unless some slight modification were made in the constitutional plank. It is a pity that he was not taken at his word. Much might be made of the Democratic Party if it were only possible to get rid of the Democrats.

The crowd at Franklin Field, made up as it was of trade-union members, small shopkeepers, and white-collar workers, was the very stuff out of which any important third-party movement must be built in the East. This will not be a party very patient with Joe Robinson, or Pat Harrison, or any of that gang. Indeed, John Nance Garner's speech of acceptance of the Vice-Presidential nomination sounded a little as if he were holding up his wrists to show the bleeding marks left by the ropes which had been used to induce him to volunteer.

But though the old faces and the old names still appear in the familiar places, new men are moving in. Some of them were not delegates and did not even appear at the convention hall, but there need be no doubt that John L. Lewis had a good deal to do with the plank in regard to labor and also with the party declaration in regard to a constitutional amendment. Barring the walking paper of the disgruntled five, the Democratic convention wore upon its face the dull and apathetic expression of perfect harmony. You did not need to take more than one drink with a delegate to find that the contrary was true. The Democratic Party is split precisely in the middle.

If Roosevelt is to hold men like Norris and Lewis, he must give increasingly more progressive leadership. That will lose him Glass and Byrd and a score of others. Inevitably the President wants to hold the boat together until its nose touches the shore. When that happens there will be a scramble. It was said that the acceptance speech of the President's was much more fiery in its original form, but that he decided to tone it down. Personally, I found no lack of fire in the address, even though Franklin D. Roosevelt at times seemed disposed to speak in parables. Still "any stigma will do to beat a dogma," and if the President chooses to resurrect Dante and use his name and fame to club Hoover over the head, I see no possible objection.

Sooner or later I hope that Franklin D. Roosevelt will tackle Hearst by name, but he is under no obligation to cover all the ground in an acceptance speech. I may be woefully wrong, but I am firmly convinced that the plank on a constitutional amendment is fully sufficient to inject that issue into the campaign and that before Election Day there will be suggested an actual, specific amendment. By now the Democratic Party is amply committed to the effort to preserve the power of Congress in the matter of national legislation in regard to labor and to farming.

The convention in Philadelphia made poor newspaper copy and bad radio entertainment, but it did make political history. When the Farmer-Labor Party moves into action in 1940, I think it may be shown that the work of Franklin D. Roosevelt and John L. Lewis in connection with the Democratic conclave of 1936 did quite a lot to prepare the ground.

The Donkey Brays Again

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Political Orators

Philadelphia, June 28

NOW I know why Henry Adams, before the Presidential campaign of 1888, wrote to Edwin L. Godkin of The Nation: "Next summer I am intending ~~a trip~~ to the Fiji Islands, where they eat missionaries and where they may eat me, but at least will not elect a President." I have just come from the worst political convention I have ever attended except perhaps that of 1924 in Madison Square Garden. The misery then was due to a long-drawn-out contest. This direfully wasted week in Philadelphia came solely with the compliments of James A. Farley and the hotel-keepers of that city who put up the money for the unholy show and bargained that it stay until Saturday night when it could have been wound up by Wednesday night, Roosevelt and all.

For the sake of the record be it written that this was the dreariest, dullest, stupidest, loudest, most inane, most vulgar, most blatant, most idiotic, most depressing, most childish, most needless, most incredible, and generally most disgusting of political gatherings, bar none. If I had a few more adjectives I should apply them too, and also borrow Henry Mencken's favorite word "obscene," if he had not worked it to death. The most experienced observers agreed that the convention touched the low-water mark in speaking and in what passed for brain work. True, Governor Lehman and Governor Horner spoke seriously and sincerely, and Governor Earle startled everybody with a speech that Norman Thomas might have made. A woman from Oregon came to the rescue of her sex and astounded us by the revelation that she possessed brain cells and knew how to use them, but the rest of the orators made us pray that there were only a few foreigners present to witness our national abasement. The whole show was just what Ernestine Evans called it—"a magnificent Elks picnic direct from Indiana." But not even Indiana Elks would have endured on their own heath fifty-two seconding speeches, without committing murder.

The only hope for the future is that the delegates who were thus butchered for a Philadelphia holiday will rise in their wrath to prevent another such orgy. Also the managers, even the massive brain of Jim Farley, may in time perceive that it is extremely bad politics to wear out your radio audience at the very beginning of your campaign and to outrage the radio companies by wasting so much of their costly time. Certainly it was bad for the Democrats to be exposing their asininity to the public gaze so much longer than the Republicans did theirs. Well, a number of journalists at Philadelphia thought that the radio will kill any further exhibitions like this of long-distance driveling and cheering, just as they believe that the loud speaker has ended genuine oratory by tying speakers to the microphone. There I don't agree. One does not have to prance all over the platform to speak effectively, and one can certainly stand before the "mike" and still talk with sincerity, earnestness, and in moving tones, and broadcast the product of gray matter if one has it.

The trouble was that this convention, like the Republican, was primarily concerned with sticking what might be called its head in the sand, trying to be just as remote from the real issues of the day as possible. The world is in dire distress. There are a dozen places where it may explode at any moment. Was there the slightest recognition of this in Philadelphia? Not any more than there was reference to the fact that the peerless party of Jefferson has not put some nine or more millions of Americans back at work. Everywhere the old order is in the utmost jeopardy—even though a thousand bands play "Happy Days Are Here Again" and the President declares fifty times that he has banished fear from America. The convention actually reduced some of the best and most facile journalists in America to silence, or to the level of Mark Sullivan's Munchausen meanderings. Imagine a Paul Anderson actually wiring a story to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch explaining why he could find so little to write about! At least a dozen others told me that it was impossible to find anything worth saying.

Incidents? A few. The men who dared to show those Al Smith banners and were alternately described as Republicans, professional pickpockets, and renegade Democrats paid by the enemy were beaten up before the audience with obvious brutality when the episode should have been devoutly welcomed as introducing the only bit of humor and challenge in that desert of utter vacuity. An English audience would have enjoyed the happenings as part of a most desirable heckling, a matter of course. Then, there was Governor Curley of Massachusetts, for whose defeat in the Senatorial contest next fall everybody ought to pray nightly, who added his touch to the picture by parading himself and some heelers three times around the auditorium under a characteristically modest banner reading "Look Out for Curley in 1940." It was entirely fitting that at the head of those embattled Massachusetts minute men should be Dr. Condon, the "Jafsie" of the Lindbergh kidnaping case. But the cohort which escorted Curley was well worthy of notice. It comprised an American Legion band and some thirty or forty legionnaires. For the first time, I am sure, rifles and bayonets, even though only three or four, were seen on the floor of a political convention. The soldiers without guns, as well as those with them, were as perfect a potential fascist cell as ever delighted the heart of a Hitler or a Mussolini. Their uniforms were stunning and immaculate, their set-up and bearing worthy of the Kaiser's bodyguard in 1914. They showed that the drilling they got in 1917-18 still sticks. Are they forerunners of what is to come?

In the convention as a whole there were just two high spots—the platform and the President's appearance; no, I should also include the very sincere and genuine reception given to Governor Lehman. There was an ulterior purpose there, of course; still there was real recognition of the Governor's fight to make New York a socially progressive state. As for the platform, it seems to me as clever and adroit a political document as we have had for a long time; it is a brilliant piece of political writing, avoiding every pitfall and giving the enemy nothing startling to pounce upon and twist to the Democracy's disadvantage. The Republican spellbinders who may seek to denounce it as a dangerous document will have to be brazen indeed. It is distinctly aggressive in reaffirming the basic principles of the New Deal, and it is free from apologies. Almost 90 per cent of it relates to human needs and only about 10 per cent to material things. The business man, far from being toadied to, is let off with only a few lines. It is the best platform for labor since the La Follette platform of 1924. Given this particular convention and the Democratic Party as it is, it is a surprisingly good document and one which must make a strong appeal to liberals. Now, please, you who read these lines don't think I am saying that this is a perfect platform and that therefore everyone should vote for Franklin Roosevelt. It does not go far enough for me at many points; especially in the matter of peace and war it gives me no assurance whatever that the President, if reelected, will not continue to militarize this country at breakneck speed and thereby open up an easy road for fascism. Had I been the author of that document I should have redemanded our entry into the World Court, reaffirmed my belief in free trade as the only hope for foreign-trade recovery, given much more space to Secretary Hull's remarkable record in foreign affairs, pledged immediate disarmament on land and sea, and touched on other issues on which the platform is lamentably silent. At least, however, the convention did not turn over to a rapidly fossilizing William E. Borah the sole right to draft the party's views on foreign affairs, as was the case in Cleveland.

If the credit for the platform is largely Senator Wagner's, he, then, is entitled to congratulations. It made me want to shout out loud when I found that the platform bracketed "kidnapers and bandits" and "malefactors of great wealth" together in the same paragraph, almost in the same sentence, with both under the heading: "For the Protection of the Family and the Home." I admire the skill with which the platform straddled on the Supreme Court issue in such a way as to leave the party and the President free to limit the court's powers while making it impossible for the Republicans to put the false issue of saving the Constitution to the front. I admire the cleverness of the sentence which reads: "We know that drought, dust storms, floods, minimum wages, maximum hours, child labor, and working conditions in industry, monopolistic and unfair business practices cannot be adequately handled exclusively by forty-eight separate state legislatures, forty-eight separate state administrations, and forty-eight separate state courts." Linking acts of nature and unfair business practices together is certainly a smart Yankee trick. I rejoice that the platform commits Franklin Roosevelt, like Landon, to the extension of the merit system "to all non-policy-making positions in the federal service"—a marvelous revolution if it comes and one that has been consistently advocated by The Nation and its editors since its first issue in 1865. I rejoice, too, that the platform devotes a whole paragraph to the maintenance of civil liberties, much as I regret the absence of a pledge as to lynchings.

Such as it is, the platform is far better than that of the Republicans. It makes it possible for the Democrats to assert that they are for the masses, for the spirit of the New Deal, for the humanitarian policies of the President. As to these the platform speaks with wise humility when it declares: "We have built foundations for the security of those who are faced with the hazards of unemployment and old age; for the orphan, the crippled, and the blind." (Italics mine.) Platforms usually mean a little less than nothing, but here at least is a brave reaffirmation of the policies for inaugurating some of which the President has been most bitterly attacked. Surely no liberal should hesitate between the two parties if he feels that he must vote for either the Republicans or the Democrats. But if he feels that he wishes a really new order and desires to identify himself with something more far-reaching or more radical, he will vote for someone else. For I do not sympathize with William Allen White, who has just written that we have witnessed the birth of a new party at Philadelphia. Many delegates who were there will vote secretly for London. Some Democratic newspapermen were there who will not support the President or if they do will give him merely lip-service. But would not the Democratic Party promptly drift back into its traditional subservience to big business, to the reactionary South, and to the crooked city machines, should Mr. Roosevelt be defeated next fall? The chances are that it would. At any rate there is today nothing whatever to the party except the progressive, humanitarian program which Mr. Roosevelt has enunciated while in office, which he has carried out so badly, so inefficiently, and with so much Farleyism.

Finally, there is the President's speech. Never have I been more impressed in my long years of reporting than by that marvelous crowd and that whole scene on Franklin Field. It was overwhelming in its magnitude, its drama, its genuine enthusiasm for the President, in the significance of that cross-section of America, larger probably than the joint armies of Lee and Meade at Gettysburg. It was an occasion for a Gettysburg address if ever there was one—and for me the President muffed the opportunity. I was exactly in the mood to be thrilled and uplifted. The address left me perfectly cold. His voice could not respond to that marvelous greeting with deep emotion, with any real passion, or even a note of just indignation or striking sincerity. "A fine baccalaureate sermon or commencement address," said a brilliant woman journalist beside me. It was a courageous restatement of his war upon the "economic royalists" and his devotion to the rights of the plain people. But not a sentence or sentiment could produce as much applause as that which followed his tribute to Philadelphia; not one lifted the crowd out of their seats. He spoke too slowly, in too measured a manner. He was a preacher, not a great leader. There was not a word to send people away from that occasion determined to fight until the votes are cast. I think many of them are still ignorant about that "war" of which he spoke. Of course, he had to stand by his record or take the heart out of his most valuable followers. He does, however, deserve praise for calling upon all Americans to serve and sacrifice in order to preserve the institutions of democracy. But what would not Wendell Phillips have done with such a crowd? What would Lincoln not have impressed upon their souls?

Still it stands out as a wonderful occasion. The Nazis would have run it better; their police could have handled it a great deal more efficiently. There would have been a finer display, more symbolism, endless banners, everybody in uniform. Thank fortune, Franklin Field was what it was, and the crowd garbed as it was. Will it be so four years from now, or twelve?

The French Revolution Has Begun

BY LEON TROTSKY

Norway, June 9
NEVER did the radio seem so precious as during these days. From a distant village in Norway one can follow the pulse beats of the French revolution. Or rather, to put it more exactly, the reflection of these pulsations in the minds and voices of the Messrs. ministers, trade-union secretaries, and other mortally terrified leaders.

To say "French revolution" may seem exaggerated. Oh, no, this is no exaggeration. That is precisely how a revolution springs into being. Generally speaking, a revolution cannot come into being any other way. The French revolution has begun.

To be sure, Léon Jouhaux, tailing Léon Blum, keeps assuring the bourgeoisie that this is a purely economic movement within the rigid framework of the law. The strikers, indeed, are seizing factories for the duration of the strike, establishing control over the bosses and their staffs. But one may shut one's eyes to this deplorable "detail." On the whole, these are "craft strikes, not political strikes," the Messrs. leaders keep repeating. Yet under the influence of these "non-political" strikes the entire political situation in the country is being radically transformed. The government decides to act with haste it never thought of the night before. Indeed, according to Blum, true strength lay in patience! The capitalists are unexpectedly compliant. The entire counter-revolution bides its time behind the backs of Blum and Jouhaux. And this miracle is brought about entirely by "craft" strikes. What then would have happened had the strikes been political?

Oh, no, the leaders are not telling the truth. The craft union embraces the workers of a single, isolated trade, separating them from other trades. Trade unionism and reactionary syndicalism bend all efforts to keep the working-class movement within the framework of crafts. Upon this, in fact, rests the dictatorship of the trade-union bureaucracy over the working class—the worst of all dictatorships!—while the Jouhaux-Racamond clique in turn slavishly depends upon the bourgeois state. The essence of the present movement consists precisely in that it is breaking through trade-union, craft, and local bounds, raising beyond them the demands, hopes, and will of the whole proletariat. The movement takes on the character of an epidemic. The contagion spreads from factory to factory, from craft to craft, from district to district. All the layers of the working class seem to be giving echoing answers to a roll call. The metal workers begin—they are the vanguard. But the strength of the movement lies in the fact that just behind the vanguard follow the heavy reserves of the class, including the most backward trades, the rearguard, completely forgotten on week days by Messrs. parliamentarians and trade-union leaders. Not for nothing did the Peuple openly confess that the emergence of certain particularly low-paid categories of the Paris population came to it as a complete "surprise." Yet precisely in the depths of these most oppressed strata inexhaustible springs of enthusiasm, selflessness, and courage lie hidden. The very fact of their awakening is the infallible mark of the tidal wave. It is necessary to reach these layers at all costs!

Tearing loose from the craft and local bounds, the strike movement has become terrible not only for bourgeois society but also for the workers' own parliamentary and trade-union representatives, who are primarily concerned with closing their eyes to reality. Historical legend has it that Louis XVI, upon asking, "What is this, a mutiny?" was answered by one of his courtiers, "No, sire, this is revolution." Now to the question of the bourgeoisie, "Is this mutiny?" its courtiers are replying, "No, these are only craft strikes." In giving comfort to the capitalists, Blum and Jouhaux are comforting themselves. But words will not help. To be sure, when these lines appear in the press, the first wave may have subsided. Outwardly life may seem to be returning to its old channels. But this changes nothing. These are not craft strikes that have taken place. These are not just strikes. This is a strike. This is the open rallying of the oppressed against the oppressors. This is the classic beginning of revolution.

The entire past experience of the working class, the history of its exploitation, miseries, struggles, and defeats, comes to life under the impact of events and rises up in the consciousness of every proletarian, even the most backward, and drives him into the common ranks. The entire class has been set in motion. This colossal mass cannot be stopped by words. The struggle must be consummated either in the greatest of victories or the most ghastly of defeats.

The Temps has called the strike the "practice maneuvers of the revolution." This is infinitely more serious than what is being said by Blum and Jouhaux. But even the definition given by the Temps is incorrect, for it is in a certain sense exaggerated. Maneuvers presuppose the existence of a command, a general staff, a plan. This does not exist in the strike. The leading centers of the working-class organizations, including those of the Communist Party, have been caught unawares. They are above all afraid lest the strike spoil all their blueprints. The radio relays a remarkable statement by Marcel Cachin: "We are all of us—we and the others—confronted by the fact of the strike." In other words, the strike is our common misfortune. With such words the terrible Senator persuades the capitalists to make concessions in order not to aggravate the situation. The parliamentarians and the trade-union secretaries, who are adapting themselves to the strike from the sidelines the sooner to extinguish it, stand in reality outside the strike, dangling in the air. They themselves do not know whether they will land feet or head first. The awakened mass is still without a revolutionary staff.

The ruling class has a real staff. This staff is not at all identical with the Blum government, although it uses the latter very skilfully. Capitalist reaction is now playing a big and risky game, but playing ably. At the present moment it is playing the game of "losers win." Let us today concede all the unpleasant demands which have met with the unanimous approval of Blum, Jouhaux, and Daladier. It is a far cry from recognition in principle to realization in action. There is the Parliament, there is the Senate, there is the Chancery—all these are instruments of obstruction. The masses will show impatience and will attempt to exert greater pressure. Daladier will divorce Blum. Thorez will try to shy to the left. Blum and Jouhaux will part company with the masses. Then we shall make up for all the present concessions, and with interest." This is the reasoning of the real staff of the counter-revolution, the famous "200 families" and their hired strategists. They are acting in accordance with a plan. It would be light-minded to say that their plan is groundless. No, with the assistance of Blum, Jouhaux, and Cachin the counter-revolution can attain its goal.

The profound organic and genuinely revolutionary character of the strike wave is best of all characterized by the fact that the mass movement, though improvised, has acquired such vast scope and has exercised so great a political influence. This is the guaranty of the endurance of the movement, its stubbornness, and the inevitability of a series of ever-rising waves. Without this, victory would be impossible. But all this is not enough for victory. As against the staff and the plan of the "200 families" there must be a staff and a plan of proletarian revolution. Neither as yet exists. But they can be created. All the prerequisites and all the elements for a new crystallization of the masses are at hand.

The sweep of the strike springs, we are told, from the "hopes" in the People's Front government. This is only one-quarter of the truth and even less than that. If matters were really limited to hopes alone, the workers would not have run the risk of struggle. The strike expresses above all the distrust or the half-trust of the workers, if not in the good intentions of the government, then in its ability to overcome obstacles and to come to grips with its problems. The proletarians want to "assist" the government, but in their own way, in the proletarian way. They still of course lack complete consciousness of their own strength. But it would be a gross distortion to portray matters as if the masses were guided only by pious "hopes" in Blum. It is not easy for them to muster their thoughts while yoked to the old leaders, who try to drive them as soon as possible back into the old rut of slavery and routine. Nevertheless, the French proletariat is not at the beginning of its history. The strike has everywhere and in every place pushed the most thoughtful and fearless workers to the fore. To them belongs the initiative. They are still acting cautiously, testing the ground under their feet. The vanguard detachments are trying not to rush ahead, in order not to isolate themselves. The echoing and reechoing answers of the hindmost ranks to their call gives them new courage. The roll call of the class has become a trial self-mobilization. The proletariat was itself in greatest need of this demonstration of its own strength. The practical successes won, however precarious they may be, cannot fail to raise the self-confidence of the masses to an extraordinary degree, particularly in the most backward and oppressed strata.

That leaders have come forward in the industries and in the factories is the foremost conquest of the first wave. The elements of local and regional staffs have been created. The masses know them. They know one another. Real revolutionists will seek contact with them. Thus the first self-mobilization of the masses has outlined and in part brought forward the first elements of revolutionary leadership. The strike has stirred, revitalized, and regenerated the whole colossal class organism. The old organizational shell has by no means dropped away. On the contrary, it still retains its hold quite stubbornly. But under it the new skin is already visible.

We do not speak now of the rhythm of events, which will undoubtedly be accelerated. In this sphere only suppositions and guesses are possible as yet. The second wave—its duration, its sweep, and its intensity—will doubtless permit a much more concrete prognosis than can be made now. But one thing is clear in advance: the second wave will not at all have the peaceful, almost good-natured, spring-like character that the first has had. It will be more mature, more stubborn and harsh, for it will arise from the disillusionment of the masses in the practical results of the policies of the People's Front and their own initial venture. In the government, as well as in the parliamentary majority, a process of stratification will take place. The counter-revolution will immediately become more self-assured and brazen. Further easy successes cannot be expected by the masses. Faced with the danger of losing what seemed to have been won, faced with the growing resistance of the enemy and the confusion and indecision of the official leadership, the masses will feel the burning need of a program, an organization, a plan, and a staff. For this we must prepare ourselves and the advanced workers. In the atmosphere of revolution the masses are swiftly reeducated, the cadres swiftly selected and tempered.

The revolutionary general staff cannot emerge from combinations at the top. The combat organization would not be identical with the party even if there were a mass revolutionary party in France, for the movement is incomparably broader than the party. The organization also cannot coincide with the trade unions, for the unions embrace only an insignificant section of the class and are headed by an arch-reactionary bureaucracy. The new organization must correspond to the nature of the movement itself. It must reflect the struggling masses. It must express their growing will. This is a question of the direct representation of the revolutionary class. Here it is not necessary to invent new forms. Historical precedents exist. The industries and factories will elect their deputies, who will meet to elaborate jointly plans of struggle and to provide the leadership. Nor is it necessary to invent the name for such an organization: it is the Soviets of Workers' Deputies.

The main section of the revolutionary workers is now following the Communist Party. In the past they have more than once cried: "Soviets everywhere!" The majority of them undoubtedly accepted this slogan honestly and seriously. There was a time when we regarded this slogan as untimely. But now the situation has radically changed. The mighty collision of classes is heading toward a climax. Whoever vacillates, whoever loses time, is a traitor. The choice lies between the greatest of all historical victories and the most ghastly of defeats. We must prepare for victory. "Soviets everywhere"? Agreed. But it is time to pass from words to action.

The Attack on Group Medicine

BY JAMES RORTY

YES, the American Medical Association knew about the Borden boycott, which was the subject of the first article in this series. Yes, said Dr. Morris Fishbein when I saw him in Chicago last month, he had read the innuendoes, the incitements, the ultimata, the reports of progress published in state and county medical journals. He had watched the crusading medicos break the fragile milk bottles of the Borden Company over the head of the Milbank Memorial Fund; watched while they coerced into submission both the Borden Company and Albert G. Milbank, in his dual role as chairman of the board of the company and president of the fund; watched while they forced the dismissal of the fund's secretary, John A. Kingsbury; watched and said nothing, in public at least. "The boycott was never officially brought to the attention of the American Medical Association," said Dr. Fishbein.

What is official? Dr. Olin West, secretary and general manager of the A. M. A., admitted that a distressed representative of the Borden Company had called on him after the boycott had been in progress at least eight months; also that representatives of the crusading doctors had visited him. "I told them, no," said Dr. West. "I said, 'Don't you drag the A. M. A. into this; the A. M. A. isn't boycotting anybody.' And then I went to the telephone and made sure that certain physicians in important positions understood this clearly."

Excellent! But did the A. M. A. officially and publicly repudiate the boycott at any time while it was in progress or since? It did not. Did Dr. Fishbein repudiate the boycott in the Journal? He did not.

The plain fact is that in doing what they did the medical boycotters and slanderers were obeying the spirit, if not the letter, of policies which the American Medical Association has followed for many years—policies designed to defend and perpetuate a system of medical service and payment which is demonstrably obsolete and heart-breakingly destructive both of human health and of medical idealism. Again and again, both officially and unofficially, the A. M. A. has used brass knuckles on the advocates of change in the organization of medical care wherever they showed their heads. As a result of this policy some of the best heads both in and out of the medical profession are bloody—but not noticeably bowed. Expulsion from his medical society, the loss of hospital and university appointments, public ostracism and private slander—these are the penalties visited almost automatically upon nearly every doctor who attempts to rip off the nineteenth-century swaddling clothes in which the rugged medical individualists would like to bind the huge potential resources of modern medicine.

Yet more and more group-practice and group-payment schemes are launched, and if they are honestly and competently managed, the public supports them; the medical priesthood roars its imprecations in vain. For in the long run the progressives hold the winning cards. Their present trials are arduous enough, but the future is theirs. "American Medicine" by Dr. Henry E. Sigerist, the William H. Welch professor of the history of medicine at the Johns Hopkins University, contains the following excellent summary of the situation:

American medicine is at the crossroads. Scientifically it has, by unremittingly purposeful effort, caught up with Europe, and is now leading in many lines of work. It is armed with the most superb equipment, with modern hospitals, laboratories, and schools, manned by a large, competent, and well-trained corps of physicians. It has behind it a history long enough to have borne fruit, short enough not to be oppressive, with the way to the future still open. Its task is a grateful one, for the majority of the population has faith in science and in the physician as its representative. The skeptical attitude toward the physician so common in Europe is seldom met with in America. And now American medicine is faced with the greatest task of all; it must put this artfully fashioned apparatus to work; now that the scientific problem is solved, it must find the social solution. . . .

The attitude which the [American Medical] Association will take in regard to the reorganization of the medical care of the population will have enormous weight. It can accelerate changes or put on the brakes. It cannot stop them altogether, as they are determined not by the decisions of the physician but by the laws of social development. The responsibility is therefore very great, and it is to be hoped that the leading men will have the courage and the foresight to look squarely at the problem, not only from the narrower perspective of the physician's office, but from the wider viewpoint of the general welfare.

There is no present likelihood that the leading men of the A. M. A. will "have the courage and foresight to look squarely at the problem." In Chicago I spent nearly three hours with Dr. Olin West, secretary and general manager of the American Medical Association. He said, and I made him repeat it, while I took verbatim notes: "There is not one human being of my acquaintance, nor in my belief has there ever been one human being, who could not get needed medical care if he had sense enough to ask for it." Dr. West spoke with every evidence of sincerity and conviction. Yet to say that he was speaking sheer nonsense is putting it mildly. I could only conclude that the "leading men" not only do not face the problems; they deny their existence. What Dr. West said is only a more extreme version of the statement of Dr. Frederic E. Sondern, past president of the New York State Medical Society, which appears in the 1935-36 Debate Handbook on socialized medicine: "Under the prevailing system of practice it can be said that there is little lack of medical care if the person needing it, or his family, will seek it."

There is plenty of current evidence that the ruling hierarchies of the A. M. A., including most of its state and county units, intend to obstruct and hamstring all attempts to set up voluntary group-practice and group-payment schemes of medical care, regardless of the demonstrated quality and economy of the service offered by such organizations. True, the Judicial Council of the A. M. A. in February of this year ordered the reinstatement of Dr. Donald E. Ross and Dr. H. Clifford Loos to membership in the Los Angeles Medical Society on the ground that they had been given no proper opportunity to answer the charges that the Ross-Loos clinic had violated the "principles of ethics" of the American Medical Association. But to balance this the council, in sustaining the expulsion from the Dallas County Medical Society of the physicians and surgeons associated with the Dallas Medical and Surgical Clinic, enunciated a new principle, now embodied in two clauses, 6 and 7, which have recently been added to the office code of ethics. Any group-practice organization is now ruled "unethical"

6. When the conditions of employment make it impossible to render adequate service to the patients.

7. When the contract, because of any of its provisions or practical results, is contrary to sound public policy.

In practice this means that if the majority of the members of any county medical society decide that a clinic or group-practice organization is "against sound public policy" they can expel from their society the doctors associated with the clinic, and the Judicial Council of the A. M. A. will sustain them. What the A. M. A. is saying in effect is this: A group clinic may not solicit patients, directly or indirectly; may not underbid individual physicians to secure a contract; may not charge fees which in the judgment of the competing individual members of the county medical society are inadequate to secure good medical service; may not interfere with reasonable competition in a community; may not prevent free choice of a physician; may not set up conditions of employment which in our judgment make it impossible to render adequate service to patients. Finally, no group-practice organization may operate under a contract which because of any of its provisions or practical results is in our judgment contrary to sound public policy.

This is the heart of the A. M. A.'s 1936 policy with respect to the organization and distribution of medical care. Not even the United States Supreme Court has dared to assert such impudent claims to power over matters affecting the life and death of the American people. True, the A. M. A. has no legal authority. It cannot prevent a physician from practicing nor can it stop a group clinic from operating. But it can and does implement its claim to authority by public excommunication and private ostracism and persecution. It has no police powers, but it can and does summon its medical squads and battalions to a holy war in defense of their own status, their own emoluments. It does this whenever the pressure of public need fires a group of progressive doctors with the determination to cast off the shackles of the A. M. A.'s pocket-motivated "ethics" and attempt to give people decent medical care at a price they can afford to pay. There have been scores of such holy wars and they are all pretty much alike. Two recent examples will suffice to illustrate the customary strategy and tactics.

In December, 1932, a month before the United Medical Service opened its doors a few blocks south of the medical profession's Vatican on South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Dr. Ernest B. Zeisler had a talk with his old friend, Dr. Morris Fishbein. Dr. Zeisler is regarded as one of the ablest young physicians in the Middle West. He told Dr. Fishbein that he intended to associate himself with the new enterprise as chief of the medical staff. Dr. Fishbein, as Dr. Zeisler described the interview, was shocked. He admitted privately to Dr. Zeisler that group practice was not a step toward state medicine (within three weeks he stated in an editorial that it was a step toward state medicine), but he said it was dishonest—as dishonest as breaking a safe. Dr. Zeisler would gain nothing; he would lose his good name, his professional repute, and, finally, his friendship with Dr. Fishbein.

Three weeks later Dr. Fishbein in a Journal editorial said in effect that the United Medical Service staff was without ability, although, as it happened, one of its members, Dr. M. J. Steinberg, had previously treated Dr. Fishbein himself. Within three months after the clinic was started Dr. Zeisler and his associate, Dr. Charles R. Wiley, who was then a member of the council of the Chicago Medical Society, were expelled from the society along with their entire staff. The loss of hospital and university appointments followed in due course. Since all the participating physicians had been deprived of their hospital privileges, it was only after a considerable struggle, which included a counter-threat of legal action against the local medical politicians, that the United Medical Service succeeded in making arrangements to hospitalize its patients at the Jefferson Park Hospital.

developed. Charges that the president, Dr. Joseph C. Berkowitz, was overpaying himself and his family and underpaying his staff resulted in the resignation, in May, 1935, of five directors and thirty-eight members of the medical corps of forty-one. The secedent doctors, led by Dr. Zeisler and Dr. Wiley, organized the Civic Medical Center on a partnership basis. Both clinics have continued in operation, although both of them have suffered from the publicity attending the split, and both have been more or less continuously under fire from "organized medicine." At the moment Dr. Fishbein faces a $300,000 libel suit brought jointly by the twenty-eight doctors of the Civic Medical Center, the chief complaint being a published editorial reference by Dr. Fishbein to "the Civic Medical Center, another commercial medical racket."

Similar slanders are directed against practically all group-practice and group-payment enterprises by physicians who fear that the success of such enterprises will deplete their individual clienteles. The public, aware of the economic pain animating such outcries, has learned increasingly to disregard them. This is particularly true in Chicago, whose citizens witnessed the expulsion from the A. M. A. in 1929 of Dr. Louis E. Schmidt, one of the most eminent American urologists, because of his interest in the Public Health Institute and the Illinois Social Hygiene League, and more recently applauded when Howard Vincent O'Brien, the liberal columnist of the Chicago Daily News, had himself examined by the clinicians now at the Civic Medical Center and reported that in his opinion the service was excellent. I was not surprised, therefore, when I visited the Civic Medical Center and found it exceedingly busy. Ironically enough, Dr. Zeisler was able to prove to my satisfaction that the relatively superior thoroughness of group-practice diagnosis frequently shows up individual practitioners, perhaps not as "racketeers," but certainly as wretchedly careless and stupid people. "Medical ethics" operates rather effectively to prevent such physicians from being penalized, whereas the same shibboleth is used to sabotage the development of the type of group practice, dictated by the very nature and requirements of modern medical knowledge, which would serve to check and minimize such carelessness.

Like the wars staged by imperialist nations, the holy wars conducted by the medical politicians are never really ended. They flare up and die down, but the embers continue to glow. They are still warm in Chicago; they are brick red today in the City of Brotherly Love, which more than any other American city is entitled to be called the fountain-head of American medicine.

The first hospital to serve exclusively for the care and treatment of the sick was started in Philadelphia; the first medical school was started in Philadelphia in 1847. The Quaker City has produced great medical pioneers, inherits a great tradition. Well, something has soured it. Last spring the Philadelphia Medical Society presented the Dr. I. P. Strittmayer Award for the year 1935 to Dr. Seth A. Brumm. For what? I quote from the presentation speech of Dr. John M. Fisher:

True to your inborn potentials you for many years have been wielding an ax with a Brumm fighting edge, chopping the dry rot of ignorance and misleading propaganda from the Milbank Foundation and other sinister organizations aiming to standardize and control the unstandardizable and uncontrollable science and art of medicine.

Undoubtedly one of the "other sinister organizations" referred to by Dr. Fisher was the Twentieth Century Fund. So when the representatives of the fund came to Philadelphia a few months ago they knew what they were getting into. Their intent was innocent enough, however: nothing more nefarious than helping Philadelphia business men and trade-union leaders to set up group-payment systems that would enable Philadelphia workers to pay for and obtain adequate medical care and, incidentally, permit Philadelphia physicians to make a little better living.

They found the public more than willing. In a short time about a hundred executives representing business concerns employing more than 200,000 workers had signified their interest. Unfortunately, officials of the Philadelphia Medical Society also became interested. At their request the representatives of the fund put their cards on the table: theirs was a mild, conciliatory program embodying considerably less in the way of proposed change than the majority recommendations of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care. No very strenuous objections were registered by the medical conferees at this meeting, but within a few weeks the Medical Society launched a tangential and utterly unexpected attack.

It happened that there was already in operation in Philadelphia a successful group clinic—the Saul Medical Service. Out of the blue Dr. Dudley W. Saul received a request from the state insurance commissioner to show cause why his service should not be prosecuted for violation of the insurance laws. On investigation it appeared that the Medical Society had filed a complaint with the Better Business Bureau, which in turn had referred the matter to the insurance commissioner. There followed a period of uproar and confusion in the courts and in the newspapers. Several weeks later, and only after threatening suit for libel, Dr. Saul, who had weathered earlier storms of this sort, got a retraction and apology from Dr. F. A. Faught, president of the Philadelphia Medical Society. Still later the fund's representatives got a statement from the insurance commissioner to the effect that in his opinion the fund's plan was not under the control of his department.

Similar conflicts are raging openly or smoldering under the surface all over America. The public, as proved by the success of the three-cents-a-day plan for hospital care of the Associated Hospital Service of New York, understands the plain good sense of applying the insurance principle to the payment of medical costs. Lay opinion, as Sigerist points out, still has a high regard for the individual doctor. But it may confidently be predicted that the public will not be too proud to fight if our medical politicians continue to claim sole authority and then use this authority for purposes of obstruction and sabotage; to assert sole title to leadership and then offer a Sabine march—one step forward and two steps backward—as their official version of progress in the year 1936.

DO COLONIES REALLY PAY?

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

ONE of the great paradoxes of our time may be found in the fact that Japan, Italy, and Germany have launched their drives for empire at the moment that the major powers appear to be in the process of loosening their colonial bonds. Until fairly recently it was almost universally assumed that colonies were good investments—for the long pull if not for immediate profit. Today a number of authorities, particularly in Great Britain and the United States, are contending that an empire is more of a liability than an asset. The supporters of the Philippine Independence Act and the proposed plebiscite for Puerto Rico have clearly been influenced by this point of view. In the Near East one finds France following the example of England in Iraq by granting independence to Syria. One even hears intelligent Englishmen whisper of the day when it will be desirable for Britain to relinquish its responsibility in India.

Why do nations desire colonies? The average imperialist prides himself on his hard-boiled appraisal of the situation. He will deny that his expansionist views are the outgrowth of sentiment—such as desire for national prestige—and will insist that the possession of colonies offers the mother country four concrete advantages: (1) an outlet for surplus manufactured products; (2) a guaranteed source of raw materials; (3) a means of relieving population pressure; and (4) an opportunity for investment under the protection of the investor's flag. Now all of these are tangible items capable of quantitative measurement. But they are counterbalanced by a number of frequently overlooked entries on the debit side of the ledger. Few if any colonies are entirely self-supporting in the sense that the revenues obtained from the native population cover all expenses of administration and defense. The possession of colonies entails the setting up of elaborate governmental machinery both in the home country and in the dependency; their protection requires the most expensive of all luxuries—a modern navy and air force; and their exploitation requires considerable capital for the construction of railroads, highways, and harbors. If we add the cost of wars which result from imperialist rivalries, our debit total will far exceed any reasonable estimate of profit.

With a view to exploding the traditional imperialist fallacies, Grover Clark has sought to compile a balance sheet* showing the profits and losses resulting from the colonial adventures of the leading powers. His findings are startling if not wholly convincing. He discovers, for example, that not one of the great colony-holding countries carries on as much as one-fourth of its trade with its dependencies, and that none obtains as much as a fifth of its raw materials and foodstuffs from empire sources. Moreover, the colonies usually carry on a substantial trade with other nations in addition to that with the mother country, indicating that political control is not a necessary prerequisite to obtaining markets and raw materials.

When it comes to striking a balance between credits and debits, Italy, ironically enough, is shown to have the most unsatisfactory record. In twenty years, from 1913 to 1932, Italy's expenditures exceeded its total colonial trade over a forty-year period by more than a billion lire. Germany's record is nearly as bad. In the last twenty years in which it possessed colonies it also spent, on the average, an amount well above its gross trade with them. Japan has fared better, but its direct outlay for its colonies, excluding military expenses, equals 18.4 per cent of its trade with them—far more than any conceivable profit on the trade. The British figures are more difficult to obtain, but even here Mr. Clark is confident that the costs outweigh the trade benefits.

As an outlet for surplus population the colonies show up even more unfavorably. In 1913, after twenty years of colonization, there were less than 20,000 Germans in all the German possessions—fewer, as Mr. Clark points out, than the number of Germans living in the Bronx in 1930, though this borough had the smallest German population of any of the four principal boroughs of New York City. Between 1865 and 1924 more Hollanders entered the Netherlands from the Dutch colonies than emigrated to them. Sweden, with no colonies and a population one-tenth that of Japan, has sent abroad in the past fifty years half again as many permanent emigrants as Japan. The foreign-born population of New York City in 1930 was seven times as large as the number of European emigrants that have settled in Africa in the past century.

On the basis of an impressive amount of evidence of this nature Mr. Clark concludes that the great powers have erred in assuming that colonies offer either an immediate or a potential source of wealth. He sees the colonial system merely as a cause of international irritation and a constant threat to peace. As a remedy he suggests that each of the powers establish complete equality of economic opportunity within its colonies, and that it confer upon the League power to enforce this policy, as in the mandate system.

If it were true that colonies are merely economic parasites, draining the strength of the great empires and threatening to cause their destruction, his proposal might be worthy of close scrutiny. Unfortunately, however, the co-conomic case against imperialism is not as overwhelming as his analysis would suggest. One has the feeling that Mr. Clark has been extremely diligent in searching for the debit items on the balance sheet, but that he has not exhibited equal zeal in seeking credit entries. He has shown that in most instances the profits on trade could not have equaled the cost of maintaining an empire, and that colonies do not solve the population problem. He has, however, whether deliberately or not, neglected two of the primary advantages of colony-possession—the creation of opportunities for investment and the disposal of domestic surpluses. It is very well to say that investment in colonial areas is open to capitalists regardless of citizenship, but history has shown that the pound, franc, and dollar have tended to follow their respective flags. In the case of India and the British dominions the return on investments has undoubtedly been of greater importance than the profits on trade. Still more important is the effect of capital exports on the national economy. Our economic system demands an outlet for both capital and goods if it is to function at anything like capacity, and a country might easily find that it paid to subsidize a colony which would take surpluses off its hands. It might also be pointed out that while African and Asiatic colonies do not provide opportunities for large-scale immigration they offer highly lucrative jobs for a handful of administrators, business men, and engineers who tend to be drawn from the ruling classes of the mother country.

This raises a point which is all too frequently overlooked. In his chapter describing the origin of the colonial system, Mr. Clark shows very clearly that the gains and losses of imperialism did not involve the same persons. Governments, that is, the taxpayers, took over the costs of administration, but the profits went into private pockets. Needless to say, this remains the situation today. Imperialism might be defined as a device for persuading the taxpayers of a country to assume some of the risks and costs of private business beyond national boundaries. Thus for the average citizen a colony may be a liability, but for the few it is almost invariably profitable. By the time that he reaches his conclusions Mr. Clark appears to have forgotten this fundamental observation. He speaks of the voluntary recession of the perquisites of imperialism as if governments were controlled by the many rather than the few. If the masses of the people were strong enough to determine policy, we might hope for a liquidation of imperialism on the basis of reason. But for the moment there is little likelihood of a voluntary surrender of power except under great pressure, as in Syria, or where colonial imports compete directly with domestic products, as is the case with the Philippines and Puerto Rico. The underlying trend is very clearly in the opposite direction. Because of contracting home markets, economic nationalism is gaining favor and is rapidly closing the gates of trade opportunity. As long as this trend continues, political control over colonial areas is bound to take on increasing importance. Instead of being representative of an outworn dogma, the aggressive colonial policies of Japan and Italy may foreshadow a period of new and more desperate imperial rivalries.

War Between the States

GONE WITH THE WIND. By Margaret Mitchell. The Macmillan Company. $3.

MISS MITCHELL'S heroine, Scarlett O'Hara, is introduced as a Southern belle in her teens, distinguishable from her fictional prototypes only by the author's unadorned treatment of her petty maneuverings for power over admirers. The daughter of a self-made Irishman and a gentlewoman from Savannah, Scarlett has the habit of wealth but lacks the aristocratic feeling which is nourished by tradition. Infatuated with Ashley Wilkes, whose interest in art makes him exotic in a society of Georgia planters, she confesses her love with a reckless forthrightness which does her credit, but he humiliates her by his preference for his idealistic little cousin, Melanie. Scarlett marries in pique a youth shortly killed in action defending the Confederacy, and is left with an unwanted child.

Neither the human incidents depicted nor the author's broad account of public events gripped this reader until the widowed heroine, visiting Atlanta, found herself immured in a beleaguered city and responsible for her rival, the fragile Melanie, who, with the men at the front and medical aid unattainable, bears Ashley's son. Then Scarlett, exploiting her beauty, secures the cooperation of Rhett Butler, a scamp possessed of a forceful personality, paradoxical wit, and a faculty for remaining persona grata with both Yankees and Confederates, and he arranges her flight with Melanie and the new-born infant through doomed territory to Tara, the home of the O'Hara family. The O'Haras are among the many victims of the havoc left by Sherman's march to the sea; and it is when Scarlett is subsequently tested by hard circumstance that she emerges in her true character—a transformation for which, however, earlier portions of the book have not adequately prepared us. None the less, the sea change she suffers as a fictional creation is altogether advantageous, and as a petty Nietzschean ruthlessly concerned with the reestablishment of the family and her own security she is thoroughly convincing. Reconstruction days carry her through a second marriage of convenience to a third marriage, this time to Butler; and her relations with him, with Melanie, and the regretted Ashley are the crux of her emotional life.

Margaret Mitchell gives us our Civil War through Southern eyes exclusively, and no tolerant philosophy illumines the crimes of the invaders; she writes with the bias of passionate regionalism, but the verifiable happenings described eloquently justify prejudice. Unfortunately her temperamental limitations as a critic both of mass movements and personal behavior are such that she often gives a shallow effect. She is vigorous enough to imbue her work with dramatic buoyancy, but unequal to the subtler demand she makes on herself with the tragedy fitly conceived as the climax of her story. The desperate earthiness of the second Scarlett is memorable enough, and the portrait of Rhett, half a scoundrel, is likewise to Miss Mitchell's credit: the whole-heartedness with which her imagination yields itself to the interpretation of these two favorites makes the reader's absorption in a narrative sprinkled with clichés and verbal ineptitudes a contagious growth. But the author seems handicapped by the undigested influence of that literature of pessimism which, though it is responsible for everlasting masterpieces and is a tonic antidote for easy romanticism, is too often misinterpreted among Anglo-Saxons as negativism.

Neither writers like Miss Mitchell who, when under an obligation to move their audiences profoundly, fall back on the vocabulary of platitude, nor those more modish novelists who for the individualized hero substitute masses still as vague an entity as Peer Gynt's Great Boyg can grapple with that last problem of a rounded art: how to make tenderness as authentic in realism as brutality; how to make benevolence the specific investiture of a man and not of a fool; how courage may be shown to glow with a warmth as physical, if not as impartially animal, as is now generated for literature by passions more menacing. Contrast Miss Mitchell's stammering articulation of high virtue with her zestful translation of primitive impulse: Ashley Wilkes remains the wasted genius of filmdom rather than of fine literature; and Melanie, tenuous in ways not attributable to her poor health, represents a concession to rare qualities discredited for this author's art by her inability to give them true embodiment. If Miss Mitchell is able, later, to master the wide significances implicit in her own material, and to convey her idealism as something more than a soporific, she may yet demonstrate the mature humanity absent in the works of so many among us who are "disillusioned" in that adolescent fashion which follows a first boast of understanding and belief.

EVELYN SCOTT

"Art for My Sake"

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF JOHN MIDDLETON MURRY: BETWEEN TWO WORLDS. Julian Messner. $3.

WHEN D. H. Lawrence wrote, "I always say my motto is 'Art for my sake,'" he set down what seemed to be the perfect doctrine for those "divine amateurs" of his own generation. In his earlier work John Middleton Murry practiced this doctrine so assiduously that he became the favored scapegoat of the classicists, for in reading him they had but to point to warn, and the disastrous results were all too plain. It may be said that Mr. Murry's autobiography is a continuation of his books on God and Jesus, Keats and Shakespeare, his "Son of Woman" and his "Memories of D. H. Lawrence"; the troubled voice is heard throughout them all; it is the same man speaking. If his early criticism is the confession of the soul at large among the masterpieces (which I suspect it is), certainly his present book is a confession of the soul at large among the artists. To Mr. Murry, Gaudier-Brzeska, D. H. Lawrence, and his own wife, Katherine Mansfield, were difficult people; and the fact that he too was difficult, as well as they, may be counted as one of his primary motives for writing his autobiography. Mr. Murry, a poor boy, climbing by scholarships to Christ's Hospital and Oxford, visibly increased his sense of social insecurity on the way upward, until at last he landed in a dark space "between two worlds." It is a pitiable history of maladjustment that Mr. Murry recites to us again; and again it is evident that it was written to salvage the remains of a pale shadow that Mr. Murry calls his soul.

Mr. Murry's English reviewers have generously compared his latest book with the confessions of Rousseau, forgetting as they did so the reasons why the first memorable autobiography of modern times is as much alive today as in the hour in which it was composed. Where Rousseau is concrete, if not painfully explicit, Mr. Murry is vague and more inclined to justify an obscure motive than to let us see for ourselves whatever he has done. Where Rousseau sustains a narrative and is often vivid and concise, Mr. Murry is fragmentary, covering what appears to be a lapse of memory with a surplus of words: and always between the reader and the event that Mr. Murry is trying to recall there floats the tenuous substance which is Mr. Murry's principal concern—his soul. On the mere evidence of this "Autobiography" I believe that no psychiatrist, however expert, however wary, could determine how much of what is written here is literally true or false, how much is wish-fulfilment or "true" confession. I raise this doubt because a few of the more specific passages in this testimony are subtle contradictions of equally specific passages in H. S. Ede's "Savage Messiah" and D. H. Lawrence's letters. Since Mr. Murry's narrative is impeded by hazy reference interlarded with Bergsonian commentary on soul and instinct, life and love and letters, my greatest pity for the man's misfortunes is related to his inability to tell a convincing story.

Despite the vagaries which attended the writing of Mr. Murry's autobiography, the book has its unique, if somewhat perverse, fascination as a record of literary life in war-time London. The moral sickness of its characters, as it reflects the ambitions of middle-class professional life, seems to correspond with the very corruption that I. A. Richards describes when he speaks of "the destructive element." Mr. Murry's early admiration of Frank Harris is illustrative of that corruption; the pitiful quarrel with Gaudier-Brzeska, in which Mr. Murry becomes righteous in his denial that the artist should be paid for his drawings, is another example of the same kind. Katherine Mansfield's isolation, taking its refuge behind the barriers of self-pity and petty-bourgeois snobbery, seems even further evidence that a false set of ethical values closely circumscribed and almost smothered the fruition of a minor talent. After all this is shown, one does not wonder that D. H. Lawrence immersed himself within and then grew restless of such company, for the moral sickness of the Murry-Lawrence circle was of the world that was "tainted with myself."

As not a few of Lawrence's biographers testify, his life was a series of escapes from places and emotional entanglements, from relatives, friends, lovers, and even casual literary associates. In the wake of broken relationships many tributes to his memory have been written, and not the least of these is E. T.'s personal record of his early manhood. E. T. was the Miriam of "Sons and Lovers," the person to whom he insisted, "It will fall to you to write my epitaph." And here it is, a slender book, recalling the atmosphere of "The Wild Common" and other poems of that period as well as of "The White Peacock." Curiously enough, the book almost transcends its biographical importance, for its actual value lies in a careful study of adolescent love. Its narrative discloses how Lawrence and E. T. were lovers and then slowly outgrew each other—and the simple presentation of the story possesses very nearly every merit that John Middleton Murry's elaborate confession lacks. E. T. has the ability to select those significant episodes that reveal her hero's character, an ability by which we are made willing to accept her Lawrence in preference to Mr. Murry's. In her recollection of a "literary" dinner at the home of Violet Hunt one plainly sees how Lawrence outgrew his provincial origins. His distrust of Hueffer (Ford Madox Ford) was characteristic of that growth; whereas E. T., growing more firmly rooted in Nottinghamshire soil, was to remain in awe of literary celebrity. Even as she writes of him, Hueffer, the literary tipster of war-time London, is seen as a godlike figure at a Campden Hill Road dinner table.

Mr. Murry's introduction to E. T.'s book would serve, I think, as an appropriate footnote to his autobiography. His first statement is: "Since I became a peripatetic lecturer in America, I have been shocked by the relative lack of interest in D. H. Lawrence." Mr. Murry does not tell us that his audience is chiefly composed of people who are interested only in the very latest "literary" names, the people who wish to talk smartly at bridge tables and cocktail bars. And those who know Lawrence's work only too well would be embarrassed to ask questions of a man who wrote "Son of Woman." He goes on to say: "I do not understand this strange indifference to Lawrence. Today he is hardly so much as mentioned by American critics." Mr. Murry's singular attacks of blindness are of no recent date, for Gaudier-Brzeska once said of him and Katherine Mansfield that "they had never noticed the statue of Charles I in Trafalgar Square and they were people who considered themselves to be artists." Perhaps in his case it is the merest charity to remember that "Art for my sake" is a jealous art.

The Cooperative Program

COOPERATIVE DEMOCRACY. By James Peter Warbasse. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

CONSUMER COOPERATION IN AMERICA, DEMOCRACY'S WAY OUT. By Bertram B. Fowler. The Vanguard Press. $2.

THE rise of consumer cooperatives in the United States is one of the most interesting results of the depression. Two million Americans are now members of cooperatives. In the new and rewritten edition of his book, the bible and guide of cooperatives throughout the world, Dr. Warbasse projects the thesis that the cooperative movement, when it achieves its full power, will take over a majority of the functions of the state, and by a two-house legislature—the Cooperative Assembly, and the Industrial Assembly representing labor—govern the country.

Unquestionably the political significance of the cooperative program is not comprehended by many members of consumer societies. For the long-time result of cooperation, which may or may not fulfil the specifications of Dr. Warbasse, is obscured by the immediate practical gains. An efficient cooperative assures its members a real money saving. By buying as a group instead of as individuals they secure a more advantageous price and goods of better quality. Both the money saving and the elimination of shoddy have made a tremendous appeal, especially to white-collar workers whose incomes have been reduced by the depression and whose eyes have been opened by the muckrakers who have shown how the hundred million guinea pigs are fooled.

In the United States the cooperative movement was slow in gaining real support. Many years ago Sweden started along the road Marquis Childs has termed "the middle way"; Englishmen, building on the solid foundation laid by the Rochdale pioneers, the founders of the modern cooperative movement, established the British Cooperative Wholesale, one of the biggest businesses in the empire; Germany, Italy, Russia, and Japan, all had strong consumer cooperatives. But it has only been since the depression set in that Americans have been converted to cooperation. Bertram B. Fowler has written a dramatic history of what has already been accomplished by the revolution of the meek. His is essentially a reporter's job. In a vivid travelogue he describes the Middle Western oil cooperatives, which are now the strongest competitors of the large oil interests; the cooperative organized by the Negroes of Gary, Illinois, with an initial capital of $24, which last year did a business of $35,000; and the cooperative established by members of the faculty of the University of Wisconsin.

Mr. Fowler is too much occupied with recounting the achievements of American consumer cooperatives to theorize, except by the way. He is also too enthusiastic to be critical, and as a result his book contains no adequate discussion of the obstacles which must be surmounted if the movement is to achieve the success he envisions for it. Still he has written an excellent and readable history which will undoubtedly inspire many to follow his directions for forming a consumer "co-op."

Dr. Warbasse writes more soberly, but his analysis and predictions also lack critical objectivity. As president of the Cooperative League of the United States since its inception in 1916, he has seen the ruinous results of greed, stupidity, and human frailty. He is aware of the possible disasters which may overtake the movement, but he too writes with the zeal and natural bias of the missionary. Like all other economic ideologies, consumer cooperation is hard to preach impartially and dispassionately. Dr. Warbasse sees in the cooperative movement a means of defeating monopoly and of achieving worldwide peace and the brotherhood of man. To him consumer cooperation means cooperation on every front and among all people. "Through cooperation," writes Dr. Warbasse, "could be advanced a true classless society."

There is disagreement both in this country and in Europe on Dr. Warbasse's thesis that the movement must stay out of politics. However, he continues to be fearful of entangling alliances and urges the advantages of indirect control of legislators by the strength of a cooperative-minded electorate. When a sufficiently large proportion of the population have been converted to cooperation, then the cooperatives should take over the function of government.

One of the immediate problems is to secure the cooperation of labor. Dr. Warbasse makes a strong bid for this support by showing that the two movements have common interests. But it will take more than logic to bring labor into the cooperative fold. So far no really intensive efforts have been made either to organize cooperatives in labor unions or to unionize employees of cooperatives.

He would be a foolhardy prophet who would attempt to predict the future of the American cooperative movement. Certainly, its program has never been expounded more persuasively than by Dr. Warbasse and Mr. Fowler. Together these two books form an excellent record of what has been accomplished and of what may lie ahead.

RUTH BRINDZE

Eleven Words for Seven

FLOWERS OF EVIL. From the French of Charles Baudelaire.

By George Dillon and Edna St. Vincent Millay. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

THE faults of these translations might have been fewer and less serious had Miss Millay and Mr. Dillon used pentameter instead of the hexameter of the French. Not that they do not often succeed in writing good hexameters: Miss Millay particularly avoids placing the caesura so that it breaks the line into two trimeters—or a tetrameter with two feet dangling at the end. In this difficulty both translators have been ingenious; but space does not allow citations of a special competence, the brilliance of which seems to me to be irrelevant to the task of translating Baudelaire. Miss Millay says in her preface that part of her task was to make the English sound like French verse. One cannot argue with this, but one may suppose that if the translation is still French it is not English, that it is only half-translated.

French words are longer than English words; so the trouble with Baudelaire in English hexameters is that whoever does the job is likely to put into the English a good deal that was not in the French. The line, "Je veux, pour composer chastement mes églogues," is rendered by Mr. Dillon: "I want to write a book of chaste and simple verse"—eleven words for seven, an adverb weakened into an adjective, and another adjective put in, the whole effect being blurred. Let us see what Mr. Dillon does to the first stanza of Réversibilité:

Angé plein de gaieté, connaissez-vous l'angoisse,
La honte, les remords, les sanglots, les ennuis
Et les vagues terreurs de ces affreuses nuits
Qui complimentent le cœur comme un papier qu'on froisse . . .

Mr. Dillon:

Spirit of happiness, hast thou heard tell of woe?
Hast thou heard tell of anguish, and remorse, and care—
Of those long nights when in the black fist of Despair
The heart is crumpled up like paper? . . .

Angé is not "spirit." Gaieté is not "happiness." Connaissez-vous is not "hast thou heard tell of"; but Mr. Dillon needed two more syllables for his hexameter than the simple "Do you know" would have allowed him; so we get the lofty "hast thou" combined with "heard tell of"—a mixed style that turns Baudelaire over in his grave. (Baudelaire frequently combines Racinian rhetoric and the common phrase, but not in this passage.) In the second line the exigencies of English hexameter compel Mr. Dillon to repeat "Hast thou heard tell"; he needs some rapid monosyllables that will maintain the nearly accentless movement of the French; but he is also compelled to break up the emphasis of the original. He breaks the flow of the original by making the first line a unit, end-stopped: angoisse, coming first in the series of griefs, is the most abstract and it sets the "tone"; it is followed dramatically by the concrete varieties of grief. The series culminates with terreurs, but Mr. Dillon violates it by substituting "long nights," which is not a coordinate term. Baudelaire's list of the afflictions of human nature rises to a powerful climax in the subtle figure of suffocation (compliment le cœur) which is suddenly illuminated with marvelous accuracy by means of the simile of the crumpled paper. Mr. Dillon runs it all together in an undergraduate metaphor of his own, which exaggerates out of existence the effect achieved by Baudelaire.

I have labored one point about a stanza that I selected at random. There are passages, even whole poems, in which Mr. Dillon is more successful; there are passages and poems in which Miss Millay is more successful than Mr. Dillon ever is. Here is Miss Millay's beginning for one of the great poems:

The child, in love with globes and maps of foreign parts, Finds in the universe no dearth and no defect . . .

—which is not bad in itself; but it is not Baudelaire:

Pour l'enfant, amoureux de cartes et d'estampes,
L'univers est égal à son vaste appétit . . .

This is neither good nor Baudelaire:

Oh, Death, old captain, hoist the anchor! Come, cast off!
We've seen this country, Death! We're sick of it! Let's go!

O Mort, vieux capitaine, il est temps! levons l'ancre Ce pays nous ennuie, O Mort! Appareillons!)

The formal invocation of O Mort is converted into an expression of personal emotion—"Oh, Death." In English one does not hoist anchor. Nor can one begin to render the passage until one has understood the force of il est temps! without which one of the great passages of nineteenth-century verse would be commonplace. Miss Millay omits it. If Appareillons! is untranslatable, it is surely not "Let's go!" It is astonishing to see how much that is wrong Miss Millay gets out of Ce pays nous ennuie!

Mr. Dillon's version of Lesbos is his best contribution to the book, though here as elsewhere he puts in his own pretty adjectives that give Baudelaire something of a Junior League tone. Miss Millay is at her best, I think, in her rendering of L'Imprévu. Nothing in this book equals James Elroy Flecker's version of Don Juan aux Enfers, or Aldous Huxley's Femmes Damnées. This difficult poem the present translators do not attempt. They give us fewer than half of "Les Fleurs du Mal"; so a fairer title for their book would have been Selections from Baudelaire. The translations by F. P. Sturm, in the Modern Library, will give the reader without French a better introduction to the poet than the more "creative" performance of Mr. Dillon and Miss Millay. Sturm is only a versifier, but he has his eye on Baudelaire; he leaves out a good deal, but he puts in very little of his own.

Upstate Chronicle

LISTEN FOR A LONESOME DRUM. A YORK STATE CHRONICLE. By Carl Carmer. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

NOBODY but an upstater could have written a York State chronicle like "Listen for a Lonesome Drum." It is not history, it is not fiction, and I am being polite in accepting Mr. Carmer's own description of it. But it will serve its purpose as well as fiction or history for all who may wish to learn what upstate is really like, or for others, like myself, who may wish to renew old acquaintances.

Upstate New York from the beginning has been the natural gateway to the West—I was going to say America, but if it is a gateway to America it is to that part of the country that has come into being since the early 1800's. Then the Great Western, the Mohawk, and the Seneca turnpikes competed with Mr. Madison's "must" project, the Cumberland road. After 1825 the Erie Canal, and later the New York Central supplementing it, captured most of the traffic to inland America. Over these roads and waterways came men of all creeds and nations, and for a while they came so thick that many were bound to spill off in passage. By virtue of them York State became a sort of distillation of America, filled with contrary ideas, some grotesque, some simply human, some horrible, and some lovely.

Of these, Mr. Carmer, in his own process of renewing acquaintance, has chosen with inspiration. From the first moment of his homecoming to Geneseo, when his small nephew drinks the contents of the bottle on the pantry shelf—the dark one—the book is an authentic revelation of the instincts and the way of thought of the upstater. "I drank it," said Bill, "I thought it was grape juice." Three adults rushed to the porch to regard the twelve-year-old, who sat calmly rocking. "Don't you feel funny?" said his uncle. "No," he said. "Don't you want to go to bed?" said his mother. "No," he said.

One understands at once that the upstater hasn't changed very much in his capacity for swallowing large doses of whatever may be new, even though he may consider it grape juice at the time. It is a capacity for thinking big, and sometimes for getting away with it. It is astonishing how many managed in the past to get away with it, and to leave their mark not only on the state but on the country. You may meet most of them in this book; Joseph Smith with his tablets of gold discovered under the guidance of Moroni; Ann Lee, mother of the Shakers; John Humphrey Noyes, founder of the Oneida Community. Others were less successful: the Loomises, of whom the author gives us only a fleeting glimpse without suggesting the political hold they exerted on their locality for nearly forty years; Jemima Wilkinson, who was born twice, and incorporated celibacy in her doctrine (probably her only mistake); and William Miller, for whom the world did not end on time.

These people Mr. Carmer has drawn vividly—but most successful of all are his pictures of the living people he met on his way. Troopers, lumbermen, revivalists, Indians—all of them talk to Mr. Carmer with few reservations. Indeed, unwittingly, he has drawn a portrait of himself that is as clear as any other in the book, sensitive, alert, and with a capacity for friendship.

WALTER D. EDMONDS

Shorter Notices

THE EARLIEST DREAMS. By Nancy Hale. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The appeal of these stories is to the connoisseur in the deft, the graceful, and the fastidious. Miss Hale's is a medium of considered restraints in which ugliness and excess have no place. The best pieces in the volume are those which seem to be autobiographical sketches. No One My Grief Can Tell is a tender projection of a young mother's love for her small child and her fear of this love's eventual possessiveness. Midsummer deals with the passionate and unstable infatuation of an adolescent girl for her riding instructor. Very credibly we are carried into the world of complex feminine sensibility, and as long as we remain within its confines, the stories appear true and good. When the scope is widened, however, to include the suicide of an untalented art student, as in Art for Art's Sake, the author's shortcomings in negotiable experience become at once apparent. What might be termed a third group of stories is concerned with the struggles of various individuals with impending fate in one form or another; all these stories, however, fall a good deal short of their Chekhovian and Mansfieldian models.

SALLY: THE STORY OF A FOSTER GIRL. By John Metcalfe. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

Although the title of this novel suggests a genre of light fiction, this study of vice and crime in underworld London affords reading that is more than ordinarily provocative. Sally is the illegitimate daughter of a dancer in third-rate music-halls. Despite her superior intelligence and sensitivity, she is doomed from the very outset by her sense of belonging to a lost world through birth and inheritance. The majority of characters with which she is thrown inhabit this shady limbo of the "lost" and are excellently portrayed. Conditioned by poverty and necessity, their relations with one another and the difficult world in which they ply their trade as petty criminals are set forth with telling if unduly exhaustive effectiveness. John Metcalfe, an English writer of some distinction, combines accuracy and insight with vigorous criticism of social injustice today.

RECORDS

A RECORD company invests money only in records it thinks will sell. There is no quarreling with this, particularly if the people who want the things with limited sale can have them by underwriting their cost in advance. And in the past three years the subscription method has been used by His Master's Voice and other foreign companies for the songs of Hugo Wolf, the Goldberg Variations of Bach, works of Purcell, and other things of this sort. But it has been used also where there has been no need of it. If Schnabel's records of Beethoven concertos could be issued in the ordinary way, why not his records of the sonatas; if "Der Rosenkavalier" and "Otello," why not "The Marriage of Figaro"? One objects because what could be a method of increasing the circulation of records actually operates to restrict it.

The records, once made for subscribers—let us say at a special price—should then be available to the entire public. And in England it works out that way. There was at first the objectionable business of "limited editions"—without trade editions; but this has been dropped, and one can buy a volume of Beethoven Sonata Society records in London for the same price as H. M. V.'s other records. In this country, however, the fiction of a society issuing the records means that they are not released by Victor under its own label; and the price of Schnabel's records becomes almost prohibitive.

Victor did, however, issue Volume I of the Sibelius Society three years ago, and has now issued the Violin Concerto from a more recent volume—which is the occasion for these remarks. For whether it is a matter of Victor seeking permission, or of H. M. V. granting it, one asks why only the Violin Concerto, and not the Seventh Symphony, the Sixth Symphony, the String Quartet? And why only Sibelius, and not Beethoven sonatas, Haydn quartets, Mozart operas? In other words, why not sense in the business?

Sibelius offers good reasons for respect and enjoyment, but not for the claims that have been made for him recently. There are painters without anything very important to say who have a feeling for their medium and an ability to use it effectively. Sibelius has this feeling for musical sound, this ability to work well with it; and what he produces sounds so well that the limitations of his thought and feeling are not noticed. A great point has been made of the fact that he does not use Finnish folk-music in his symphonic works; but the real point is that his own material in these works often has the character and feeling of folk-music—when it is not merely pictorial. This type of material is attractive and enjoyable; and Sibelius's ability to work it into large-scale structures has deceived commentators into thinking they were hearing large-scale ideas as well, and to claim for him the constructive mastery of Beethoven. But constructive power is evident and important only in relation to the material on which it operates; and Sibelius simply hasn't the ideas with which to achieve the form-of-content that Beethoven achieves.

The Concerto is a fairly early work—it follows the Second Symphony—but it gives the essential quality of Sibelius's matured musical thinking; for the only difference in the later works is their greater concentration. The performance of the London Philharmonic and Heifetz under the direction of Beecham is excellent, and the recording for the most part as good (four records, $8).

"The Jew and the World"

[The following letters are selected from many that The Nation has received about Benjamin Stolberg's article. The editors hope to find room for a further selection in a later issue.]

WHAT FORTUNE MEANT

Dear Sirs: Mr. Stolberg's "Answer to the Editors of Fortune" makes so much brisk fun, sound reading, and general good sense that no one could take serious exception to it. If I am, as Mr. Stolberg aptly says, a sociological ingenue, he, I assume, is the leading lady. There can be no objection to that.

The title, however, is confusing. What statement of the editors of Fortune is Mr. Stolberg answering? He contends that the editors of Fortune have not solved the "Jewish problem." I agree. But it is Mr. Stolberg, not the editors of Fortune, who offers to do so. The editors of Fortune were attempting something much more modest. They were attempting to present certain facts bearing upon the economic position of the Jews in America. Those facts seemed to them pertinent because the rise of fascism with its attendant anti-Semitic propaganda had produced abroad, and might well produce here, prejudicial and highly inflammatory statements on the subject. They said:

The Jews, in the phraseology of Dr. Ruppin of the Hebrew University at Jerusalem, having changed in the eighteenth century from an Oriental people to an Eastern European, have in the last few generations changed from an Eastern European people to a Western European and an American. The apprehensiveness of intelligent Jews [in America] springs from this fact. Realizing that Jews have been the scapegoats of all Western history, that they have been made to bear responsibility for everything from the Black Death to the economic ills of the Germans, these observers fear that the enormous increase in Jewish numbers in America will lead to charges that the Jews have monopolized the opportunities for economic advance and that these charges will pave the way for fascism here as they paved the way for Hitler in Germany.

The editors of Fortune felt that this apprehensiveness justified the publication of the facts. Those facts, as Mr. Stolberg would, perhaps, on fairer second thought, admit, had never before been collected and were not all to be found in the Public Library.

It is the publication of this material which Mr. Stolberg has answered and which I must assume he disapproves. But what precisely does he disapprove? Does he disapprove the statement that the claim of Jewish monopolization of economic opportunity was made by the Nazis? Does he disapprove the statement that that claim was an effective bit of inflammatory propaganda? Does he disapprove the suggestion that similar claims may be made here? Does he doubt that such claims could be dangerous? Does he think that the publication of the truth could serve no useful purpose in discouraging them? Or is it his position that the attempt to stop fascism now by an attack upon one of its several ammunition dumps is idle since the revolution will eventually set everything straight? As I recall it there were certain Germans who thought the same thing: they are now generally considered to have erred.

THE INDIVIDUAL COUNTS

Dear Sirs: The psychoanalytic verbiage with which Mr. Stolberg befogs the problem of anti-Semitism does not seem to me to help us either to an understanding or to a solution. We ought to recognize that it is the frequent problem that presents itself whenever a socially segregated or racially recognizable group is considered as a unit in which each individual partakes of all those traits that are more or less arbitrarily ascribed to it, often merely on the basis of tradition. No matter whether it is a case of Greeks despising barbarians, nobility the common people, Catholics the Protestants, the castes of India one another, whites the Negroes or Japanese, or Gentiles the Jews; the situation is always the same. It becomes particularly acute for the proscribed class when its members come to be conscious of the fact that they are no longer a class but individuals like the rest of the people among whom they live, and when this claim is not recognized but each individual is still looked upon as a member of the despised group. The demand for racial purity, and with this the prevention of assimilation, is merely an expression of the conflict between groups, social as well as racial. It is manifest in the prevention of marriage between patricians and plebeians, between nobility and commoners, as well as in the ban on interdenominational marriages. Even our socially privileged classes have not learned the simple fact that they should have learned in school and home, that it is the individual who counts, not the class to which he is assigned.

SOLID AND BRILLIANT

Dear Sirs: I thought Benjamin Stolberg's article on the Jews, in your issue of June 17, was quite simply the solidest interpretation of anti-Semitism, as well as the most brilliant, that I have ever seen in print in any language.

MEA CULPA!

Dear Sirs: Thank you for sending the advance copy of the Stolberg article. I think I have seldom seen such an astute and penetrating discussion of this question. And, what is more, it leaves the commentator little or nothing to say but yes or no. My answer is mostly yes, with a little change in the emphasis of his argument.

Many people forget that under the heat and storm, the fighting and stress and argument, which go with the Jewish question in our present day there are biological and physiological factors and trends at work which have a far larger if unconscious weight in settling the matter. These basic activities underlie and finally determine race questions; the Jewish question in the last analysis is a biologic question. And what we know of the history of races taken over the period of historical time points to the fact that races intermarry, lose their identity, are merged or submerged in the welter of the peoples with whom they come in contact. Of course, none of this mingling goes on, or ever went on, without a great deal of mental and physical torture, persecution, warfare, governmental restriction, social ostracism, and all the cruelties which our consciousness can invent to waggle futilely in the face of a natural fact. Probably there is no individual alive on the earth today in the dim, forgotten shadows of whose ancestry there are not many individual experiences of just such a type as would occur today in a marriage between a Jew and a Christian. And so, if we wanted to, or could, wait a thousand years or so, we might see the last of this so very troublesome problem. The Jews, who because of the accident of their peculiar history have kept their identity as a race in the minds of many, would be no more; perhaps one might say then that "my great-grandfather twice removed was a Jew," as one says today, "One of my ancestors came over with William the Conqueror," and with just about as much truth.

However, the Jewish problem is today a great problem, and one which brings no one any great pleasure. It would be an intellectual and emotional triumph to have a "fair" attitude. I can hardly believe that any discussion of it does any good, including this. The only profit in taking an attitude is a social one, like liking birds' nest soup in China. Nearly everyone, nevertheless, has an attitude on the Jews. And nearly all these attitudes are emotional and many deeply so, and are much more difficult to change than an ordinary appetite, but are as inevitably acquired. As for me, I have mine, an attitude which leads me to suggest certain things with regard to the solution of the Jewish problem, and probably these are as futile suggestions as any.

It is well known that I have said that I regard the Jews not as Americans, or Germans, or French, but as Jewish Americans, Jewish Germans, Jewish Frenchmen, and, as a consequence, as thinking and acting not entirely as Americans or French or Germans, but as Jewish Americans, etc. I never said that as a race (in its entirety) I wholly disliked and distrusted them. I have paid my compliments to very, very many, and still do, Stolberg among them. I would be wholly ungrateful and unreliable if I said differently. Like the bourgeois in Stolberg's article, I have many Jewish friends. None the less, even among these I have heard some damn portions of the race as this or that, in other words, affirm a number of my charges. And Stolberg points out this sort of action as a characteristic of the problem as a whole. And yet, although their words on occasion have proved emotional fuel to feed my possibly unreasoned attitude, I doubt if they have any more right to say what they do than I. Their opinions are like those of a self-diagnosed patient. Also, when they disagree with me, hold out for the immensely superior social and intellectual qualities of their race, and deny the validity of certain experiences which I have had, well, I don't change then, but only hold on to my attitude with increasing force.

I admit that my attitude is in part emotional. I have said I have had a certain kind of typical experience with Jews, especially in practical matters, and of unvarying consistency. In consequence, I admit that I am likely to believe unquestioningly instances of the same kind when I hear them from others. Probably I am likely to add to this certain things relating to the way some of them live, parts of their culture, etc., which displease me, at times constitute a half-conscious emotional mass which I feel as disagreement, rage, and so on. No doubt today I look for what I dislike in Jews, and dislike what I would normally pass over in another. Mea culpa!

At a time like this, when social unrest, nationalism, jingoism, etc. are so rampant, an attitude like mine might in some group, somewhere, lead to a pogrom, to social persecution of the very cruelest and bitterest nature. Yet this is decidedly what I do not want. Rather I have been always seeking some solution. For in the day of violence the obvious causes would not be the real ones. We in America might have as false justifications as there have been in Germany. We would have, of course, economic jealousy as a base. But still, there is always the much more powerful factor of the intangible fanaticism against the scapegoat through which we must always rationalize our unfulfilled desires and disappointments. Mea culpa!

Unlike Stolberg, I myself do not think that communism will do away with the Jewish question. Unless it can take away whatever economic necessity there is for jealousy, and for finding scapegoats, and make marriage between Jews and others unstigmatized by either side, it will do no better than capitalism. I do not believe that communism will help the Jewish question by encouraging Jewish nationalism and separatism. Racial, cultural, and religious separatism will lead to just as much division of opinion as there is today.

I can well sympathize with the despairing confusion of the Jew who is at once proud and humiliated. His culture is as good and perhaps better than any. But from his side he will be humiliated as long as he is proud. And from the other he must, for his own sake, be proud as long as he is humiliated.

I once thought that if all the Jews could move into a large country of their own, and build up for themselves a national and cultural unity of which they could be proud and which all the world would respect, that would be a solution. But of course, that idea is impractical in the extreme. I really think today that the sufferings and persecution which this question entails are inevitable, that it is a kind of war, perhaps, which increases in fury until some final solution—perhaps only after years of heartrending, bitter, stupid, even insane cruelty, which I personally would hate to see, have come and gone. Oi! Oi!

There is nothing anyone can do. Social life, economic life, for all of us, whether in connection with the Jews or any other group, runs a bitter, unsettled course. This may sound like defeatism for certain liberal groups. Still their liberality is just as much a part of the constant conflict as is my opposite conviction. "Pardon is the word for all."

BACK TO TALMADGE!

Dear Sirs: Your own inimitable Mr. Stolberg has won himself the rare privilege of resting beside the editors of Fortune in whatever mausoleum posterity may set aside for well-intentioned though ill-informed explainer-away of the Jewish question. The author of the article The Jew and the World shows rather clearly that the man who nabbed Talmadge so effectively by the grass roots slipped up rather badly in tackling the Jew.

The Nation has not been terribly sympathetic of late with the legitimate national and cultural aspirations of a large section of the Jewish people. However, when you assign someone to handle the Jewish problem you might at least see to it that he is competent to do so. A string of wisecracks tacked on to some shallow platitudes and annoying prejudices hardly befits The Nation's way of doing things.

Please send Mr. Stolberg back to Talmadge. We Jews have enough troubles.

THE RACIAL WILL

Dear Sirs: With the closing words of Mr. Stolberg's article on the Jews, "The answer is Marxism," I agree; but I have some reservations about most of the arguments by which he arrives at his answer. The answer is Marxism in the sense that a society founded upon an economic and social mechanism compatible with the necessities of a technical age will not allow cultural and racial distinctions to become cause and occasion for such cultural psychoses as characterize our present society. In a dying culture and a disintegrating civilization, in which all universal validities have either been destroyed or become bogus, it is natural that some men should seek to rescue meaning from chaos by trying to interpret the meaning of life purely in terms of their relation to their tribe. Mr. Stolberg is quite right in pointing out that this tribalism may be a sign of sickness among Jews just as much as among anti-Semites. It is natural, too, that the ruling oligarchies of a disintegrating social system should exploit and nourish this tribalism in order to sow dissension among their foes and to maintain unnatural alliances with classes which ought, on economic grounds, to be allied with their enemies.

My difficulty with Mr. Stolberg's analysis is that he seems to interpret all racial solidarity of either majority or minority groups, together with the resulting interracial friction, as a sickness or a psychosis. That is true only in the sense that all human life is sick and will continue to be so even in a new society; that is, the will-to-live of both individuals and groups will continue to provoke friction and conflict. Mr. Stolberg would like to eliminate such conflict entirely. He declares that he does not want either assimilation or segregation. But the whole logic of his argument runs in the direction of assimilation. He begins his thesis by dispelling "the illusion of Jewish endogamy and racial purity." He declares that "Jews exist, if only as a state of mind," and the inference is that they exist only as a state of mind. What is proved by showing that Jews are not strictly endogamous and that a variety of blood has entered their veins? That is equally true of every other race. Yet racial distinctions persist.

We do not solve the problem between Pole and German or between German and Frenchman by proving that none of these racial groups are pure. Though no racial group is purely endogamous, all of them have maintained some kind of collective existence. The Jew has performed the more difficult feat of maintaining a collective life though he has no geographic locus from which to operate. Such collective life, as all life, maintains itself partly in defensive and partly in offensive terms. Defense may become a diseased isolationism, and offensive strategy may become a diseased imperialism. A minority group is naturally more liable to the former than to the latter disease. Only in that sense are the severe strictures of Mr. Stolberg against Jewish racial politicians justified.

Mr. Stolberg says he wants neither assimilation nor segregation, but he offers no third possibility. The answer for him is simply Marxism. But Marxism in Russia means assimilation, does it not? It would be possible, of course, for a socialist society to try some other solution. Assimilation is not dictated by Marxian logic. But it is suggested by a certain tendency in Marxism toward impatience with the irrational and organic facts of human existence. This tendency is implied, though not explicitly stated, in the whole course of Mr. Stolberg's argument.

The Jew has a right to continue to exist as a collective group even though his collective will-to-live, expressed both defensively and offensively, will complicate the problem of social reorganization just as the racial will of every other racial group, involved in an economically interdependent world, complicates that problem. One might add that the maintenance of every individual, as well as of every collective life, is the cause of friction as well as the occasion for new harmonies. While the Jew would be well advised to withdraw his moral support from an economic system which aggravates interracial friction, he ought nevertheless to be critical of a too simple and naive radicalism which offers him salvation in terms of the annihilation of assimilation.

The only complete harmony in life is in death, whether for individuals or groups. If Mr. Stolberg understood that better, he would have more appreciation of the religious sense of guilt which he also regards as a psychosis.

A NESSUS SHIRT

Dear Sirs: With melancholy amusement I have just read Benjamin Stolberg's article The Jew and the World. That Mr. Stolberg's Jewishness is a Nessus shirt to him which he wants to get rid of by the new, universal patent-medicine nostrum of Marxism—that he has in common with all the red and pink assimilationists. But it is less excusable to be so strident and so ignorant. Two examples suffice.

"The Christian revolution against the pharisaism of the Jewish theocracy . . ." Yes, they still teach that stuff in one-building theological schools, where no glimmer of Travers Herford's works on the Pharisees or of the researches of the late George Foote Moore have yet penetrated, and where the findings of the Wissenschaft des Judentums would be anathema. So it comes most curiously about that the red assimilationist of today belabors his people with the detritus of dead Christian theologians.

As for Mr. Stolberg's "little Jewish tailor who shouts in Yiddish"—note the Jewish self-hatred in that "little" and that "shouts"—I can tell Mr. Stolberg precisely why he's less race-conscious than the "big German Jewish banker." It is because it never occurred to that tailor, speaking his mame-loshen and reading the great Yiddish dailies, that he could be anything but a Jew and a member of the living Jewish people. And it will disappoint Mr. Stolberg further that this Jewish tailor will be nine times out of ten a Labor Zionist, a member of the Histadruth—a Socialist, true, but a Jewish Socialist.

UNVARNISHED TRUTH

Dear Sirs: The Nation has done an amazingly courageous thing in publishing Benjamin Stolberg's The Jew and the World; it proves its claim that liberal journalism is not yet dead. Mr. Stolberg's article will offend and perhaps shock some people; but doesn't the plain, unvarnished truth usually do that? It is to be hoped that the article will provoke an honest searching of hearts on the part of Jews and non-Jews alike; for there has been too much courteous silence about the whole business in this country. I, for one, am willing to say flatly that Mr. Stolberg has written the wittiest, of course, but also the wisest discussion of the Jewish question that I have read. Like him, I am sick of the fake pretensions of the professional Jews to speak for the "Jewish community"; for I know, from long personal experience, that segregation is acceptable to them as long as the property relationship remains untouched.

Recently, in an effort to enlist the financial support, in an enterprise against Nazism, of one of the most prominent of these Jewish leaders—a young and very ambitious banker—I was told flatly by him that he did not disapprove of fascism. The Jews could protect themselves, he said, by repairing their spiritual fences. In other words, a return to the actual Ghetto was thoroughly acceptable to him as long as the authority of rabbi and money lender (which, in the final analysis, meant the money lender's authority alone) remained unquestioned. Those of us who feel as Mr. Stolberg does—who do not want to see the reestablishment of the physical Ghetto and who abominate and fear the false leadership of the money lenders—will accept his prescription as the only true one. Anti-Semitism and segregation are rooted in a class society. Mr. Stolberg and The Nation are to be congratulated, he for writing and you for publishing, this brilliant and disconcerting and profound analysis.

WHAT ZIONISTS WANT

Dear Sirs: Benjamin Stolberg's parade of epigrams is an exceedingly cheap display at this time, when German Jewry is hounded, when 1,500,000 Polish Jews are living on the verge of starvation, and when the only refuge for persecuted Jews is being ruthlessly sabotaged by an alliance of Arab feudalism, Italian and German fascism, a nascent Arab nationalism, and the tacticians of international communism seeking a united front with all four.

The charge that Zionists want to segregate Jews is as valid as the charge that class war is the creation of reds and agitators. Zionism merely wants to render Jewish life creative. If Marxism produces a receding margin of failures, the creative impulses liberated by the national renaissance will make the desirability of writing finis to over 3,500 years of Jewish history rather dubious. Why should I as a Canadian Jew sacrifice my identity with Jewish culture when one of the basic realities of the dominion is the foundation of the national life in cultural diversity?

MARVIN B. GELBER

A RECIPROCAL PSYCHOSIS

Dear Sirs: I write to tell you how much I liked Mr. Stolberg's dissertation on the Jews. I completely agree with his psychological interpretation, though I'm less hopeful than he that Marxism will change the psychology. However, it was very much worth saying that anti-Semitism represents a reciprocal psychosis, in which elements of unwholesome attraction as well as revulsion appear. That the economic situation has exacerbated this psychosis is of course obvious. Even in small places in the country one can now hear ominous rumblings. Failing Mr. Stolberg's solution, can anything be done? I believe it can, but I hesitate to mention it, because the subject is painful and difficult.

There is no reason to expect the great mass of Gentiles to do anything to resolve the situation. The fact that psychoanalysis was first developed by Jewish men of science suggests that there is at least a tendency toward mental therapy among the Jews. Mr. Stolberg's witty and often brilliant analysis sets the problem. If the Jew and the world are like a married couple held in pathological bonds, can the Jew introduce an aspect of sanity into this union? We know how a relatively sane person living closely with a psychotic mate may lose touch temporarily with reality and come to accept false premises. As Janet says, abnormality is "catching." The Jew, with his memories of pogroms and persecutions, is like a woman who was raped in her youth and who, continuing to expect a similar traumatic experience, is not able to accept the good marriage which life now is offering to her. It is understandable that she should have difficulty in throwing off this traumatic experience, but she must throw it off if she is to go on to a happier adjustment. For if she goes around expecting to be outraged, she probably will be again. There are persécutées as well as persecutors.

Mental hygiene seems to be particularly needed for the Jews—a mental hygiene which will help them to ignore the memory of ancient grievances and check the tradition of anticipating future outrage. This is difficult, isn't it—practically heroic? I didn't mean to write so much—only to say I am glad The Nation could publish Mr. Stolberg's article.

CLEAR AND UNBIASED

Dear Sirs: I have just finished reading with a great deal of pleasure the article The Jew and the World, by Benjamin Stolberg, appearing in The Nation of June 17.

Mr. Stolberg has put into words in a very clear and definite way the feelings and thoughts that I have had upon this topic for many years. Needless to say, he has done a very much better job than I could ever hope to do.

It pleased me very much to find this material presented so clearly without any particular emotion or bias. I wish to compliment both you and Mr. Stolberg on this splendid piece of work.

The Shape of Things

DROUGHT IN THE PRAIRIE STATES IS NOTHING new. In the late eighties and early nineties there was a succession of droughts which led to the destruction of vast numbers of cattle and the ruin of thousands of ranches. If our condition is worse today it is because land-hungry settlers allowed themselves to be seduced by a sequence of wet years into believing that the extension of cultivation had changed the climate, or that by methods of dry farming they could cope with the irregular rain fall. What is new is the solicitude the government exhibits for the burnt-out farmers and stockmen. In the eighties and nineties they were left to the mercies of the rugged individualists, who bought up the lands for a song and sold them again to trusting settlers when fortuitous rains brought another "permanent" change of climate. The government still believes that by terracing the land and building dams, water enough can be stored to reduce the ravages of drought to manageable proportions. This serves as a basis for the expenditure of large sums in the drought area and, if next year the rain comes in quantities to set hopes sprouting, it will add to the prestige of the government. But it is in no sense a solution. The late Elwood Mead wisely proposed to evacuate a large proportion of the arid-land farmers and resettle them on land where they could make a living not three years out of five, but every year. Hence the blistering hatred for Mead in the prairie-state small towns. It remains true that the farming population of the dustbowl should in the main be evacuated and the land restored to grass by rigorously controlled grazing. The government fully understands this, and knows that it is wasting the money it is putting into ponds that will themselves dry up. But this is a Presidential year.

AS WE READ ABOUT THE BIG NAZI SHOW AT Heidelberg, we found ourselves hoping that the American Olympic Committee would not find the money it needs to send its full complement of athletes to the summer Olympics in Berlin—or indeed any money. We are all for letting the Germans enjoy their own insanities in their own way, but it irks us a bit when our compatriots humor their delusions. Insanity was the order of the day at Heidelberg, with representatives, official or unofficial, of 20 American colleges and universities participating at least passively. Before these witnesses and those of 30 other countries, the 550th birthday of Germany's greatest university was made the occasion for an orgiastic celebration over the dead body of German culture. One touch in the preparations set the tone of the whole procedure. Where Pallas Athene had stood over the doorway of the building presented to the University in 1931 by a group of American graduates and friends headed by Ambassador Jacob Gould Schurman, a swastika had been placed, surmounted by an eagle; and in the inscription, "To the Eternal Spirit," the word "German" had been substituted for "eternal." In the third Reich the German spirit means the Nazi spirit, and the Heidelberg orators made it clear that the Nazi spirit in the "higher learning" is the spirit of fascist propaganda. We note with a certain chagrin that the British universities did themselves the honor of abstaining. We hope the Americans present got their money's worth out of the show—particularly the elevation of the Rector of the University to a captaincy in Hitler's private army.

IN PERMITTING DR. GREISER, PRESIDENT OF the Danzig Senate, to insult the League, Hitler appears to have seriously overplayed his hand. In recent weeks everything had broken to the Third Reich's advantage. The powers had demonstrated their inability to prevent the remilitarization of the Rhineland; the collective system had broken down in the Italo-Ethiopian crisis; and the League was beginning to disintegrate of its own accord. Alarmed by Germany's growing military strength, Great Britain and France were moving toward a Western European pact which would have given Hitler freedom to carry out his plans in the East. Poland, whose aid was essential in this scheme, appeared to be coming more and more under Nazi influence. This trend has been sharply reversed by the Danzig affair. Poland has been thrown quite unexpectedly on the side of the League, and Britain has suddenly adopted a somewhat sterner tone toward the Nazis. With the breakdown of negotiations between Germany and Austria, carrying with it the possibility of a Hapsburg restoration, and the whitewashing of Italy by the League the Reich finds itself once more in danger of complete isolation. While Hitler might conceivably avoid further trouble by forcing the Nazi press to abandon its campaign against League supervision of Danzig, the chances are that he has gone too far to turn back. Danzig must be considered along with Memel, Austria, and Czecho-Slovakia as the possible scene of the next Nazi coup.

THE POOR WIDOWS AND ORPHANS FOR WHOM H. C. Hopson of the Associated Gas and Electric appealed in his fight on the Holding Company Act are being taken for one of the longest buggy rides in judicial history. For more than two years, A. G. and E. has been using every available legal trick to delay decision on the reorganization proceedings brought against it under Section 77-B by some of its security holders. The action was filed in June of 1934. Not until June, 1935, was Judge Julian W. Mack of the U. S. Circuit Court able to rule that there was a prima facie case of insolvency warranting an injunction forbidding transfer of assets without notice. In June, 1936, Judge Mack was at last able to order examination of the company's books to determine its solvency. Thereupon Mr. Hopson asked for Judge Mack's disqualification because the jurist is one of the vice-presidents of Survey Associates, a non-profit making organization which publishes Survey Graphic. In October, 1935, Survey Graphic published an article by Paul Y. Anderson on A. G. and E. Judge Mack was in Europe when the article was published and said he had never read it; nevertheless he referred the charges to Judge Patterson of the U. S. District Court, who dismissed them as "frivolous." The company then appealed to Justice Cardozo for a stay on other grounds, but was rebuffed. Further delay, however, has been made possible by Presiding Justice Manton on the same issue of "bias," and Judge Mack sailed for Europe without being able to name a special master to go into the company's books. In the meantime A. G. and E. is proceeding under a reorganization plan of its own which was refused registration in Wisconsin and denounced by the Supreme Court of that state. Under this plan, the company has been able to write down $100,000,000 of its fixed interest debt at 50 cents on the dollar and to convert all but $75,000,000 of the rest into junior securities. Meanwhile, time passes and the statute of limitations operates.

THE ITALIAN NEWSPAPER MEN WHO whooped and shouted at the Emperor of Ethiopia when he stood up in the Assembly of the League of Nations and asked: "What answer shall I take back to my people whom you promised to defend?" were surely not gentlemen. They were undignified, indecorous, unsportsmanlike, and plain ruffianly. It was entirely proper that they should have been ejected from the meeting and from Geneva. Mr. Eden and Premier Blum, on the other hand, who made speeches on the following day, spoke with all the high mannerly traditions that one would expect from an English gentleman and a Frenchman. But it is doubtful if the Negus was able to take much more comfort from their good manners than from the Italians' insults. For the gist of their remarks was that Ethiopia was to be abandoned to its fate as an Italian conquest, and that at least for the present collective security might be accepted in principle but was to be eschewed in practice. The only forthright statement made at the meeting—with the exception of certain realistic sentences from Mr. Litvinov—was made by Charles de Water, delegate from the Union of South Africa. Renunciation of collective action, he said, could only be taken as a complete abandonment of all that the League stood for. Chaos and the spectacle of nations hastening to rearm were taking the place of what for a time offered high hopes for an orderly world. But it was not yet too late to reaffirm and maintain collective security, and his government, Mr. de Water added, was prepared to cooperate to the full in such a move. His words fell on ears already deaf to any sounds but those of long range guns. Haile Selassie must take what consolation he can in the thought that France and Britain, when engaged in cutting throats, do it in the best possible taste.

MR. WALTER LIPPMANN IS CHAIRMAN, AND Messrs. Richard Whitney, Walter Gifford, Winthrop Aldrich, George F. Baker, among others of the cream of Wall Street, are his faintly inappropriate fellow-members of a committee appointed by the Harvard overseers to survey the work of the department of economics. By a not-at-all remarkable coincidence, the gist of the committee's report is identical with that of Mr. Lippmann's recent speech at Rochester—namely, that professors should keep out of politics. Of professors active in public affairs he says, "Nothing they say can be relied upon as disinterested. Nothing they teach can be trusted as scientific." But the academic detachment advocated by Mr. Lippmann, would result in atrophy, not objectivity. "If the professors try to run the government," he asserts, "we shall end by having the government run the professors." But the thought never appears to enter the marble halls of Mr. Lippmann's mind that his attempt to prescribe the duties of a university faculty is more dangerous to academic freedom than the political activity of an occasional professor. But the worst flaw in his logic comes in his conclusion that our administrators, who, he asserts are mentally mediocre, should nevertheless not be assisted by the expert advice of scholars whose minds are far from mediocre. This sort of nose-to-the-ground thinking, without raising his eyes to see what he is running into, is characteristic of Mr. Lippmann. He may write, as a colleague remarked in the Herald Tribune, "like a revolving door," but he thinks like a bird-dog.

THE NEW YORK CITY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE has issued a report on relief conditions in America's largest metropolis which should be compulsory reading for all voters in the fall elections. The recovery of the past year, it points out, has been accompanied by increased rather than diminished needs on the part of the unemployed. Owing to the steady depletion of resources of men who have been without work from three to five years, the number of families requiring aid has increased from 325,000 a year ago to more than 400,000 today. Food allowances are the same as a year ago despite an 8½ per cent rise in prices. Grants for rent are still limited to a maximum of $25, although the average rent in most districts ranges between $30 and $40 a month. The $25 maximum is only available to families of nine or more persons living in steam-heated flats with private baths. In 1935 the average clothing allotment was only $12.05 per family, and there is no allowance for household supplies, carfare, or recreation. An allowance for ice has been permitted during July, August, and September, but only where there are children under six years of age. Indefensible though these conditions are, they are princely compared with the situation in New Jersey since the termination of state aid. A recent survey by the American Association of Social Workers covering 41 districts in that state reveals that food allowances have been cut 50 to 75 per cent, that no rent payments at all are made in most communities, that no gas or other fuel is provided, and that in a number of areas no clothing is issued. Relief is suspended if any person is employed—or is offered a job—even though it is clear that the amount earned is insufficient to support a family. This is typical of what may generally be expected if relief is, as the Republicans advocate, returned to the local communities.

THE SUICIDE OF ALEXANDER BERKMAN, ILL and discouraged, in his exile at Nice, is symbolic of the fate of the anarchist movement in a world which tends to become increasingly absolutist and authoritarian. Anarchism as a political movement is by its very nature self-defeating. Refusing to meet organized exploitation with organized resistance, it is driven either to acts of terrorism against individual exploiters, or, in case it is confronted with the opportunity to seize power, as in Italy before the march on Rome, to refuse and thereby pass on the power to its enemies. Berkman combined hatred of exploitation with a desperate courage and the inability to understand that the assassination of an individual exploiter leaves the exploiting process untouched. His attempt to kill Henry Clay Frick during the Homestead strike of 1892, brought him a long jail-sentence and furthered the cause of American labor not one jot. From the time of his release, his life was a series of persecutions, and of disappointments not the least of which was the failure of the Russian revolution to proceed in accordance with his own ideas. The monograph in which he gave vent to his indignation against the Soviet government is one of the most pathetic and unintentionally funny social writings of modern times. The tragedy of his life lay in the fact that he was a utopian idealist striving for social justice in a world where even the first feeble steps toward justice must be associated with the organized force which as an anarchist he abhorred.

Watch Steel!

WATCH steel during the coming months. It will bear watching. The organizing campaign that John L. Lewis and the Committee for Industrial Organization have started reaches beyond steel and touches the roots of our economic life. What happens in the drive to unionize the steel workers is freighted with a three-fold meaning.

Its first and most immediate bearing is on the internal struggle within the labor movement. The craft-industrial unionism war within the A. F. of L. has been dramatized as a struggle between President William Green and John L. Lewis. But it is more than a personal battle for control. It is a struggle to determine whether the base of American labor power will be shifted to the thirty million as yet unorganized workers in the mass production industries. The steel industry, now less than one per cent organized, stands out as an example of such a mass production industry. It is significant that Mr. Lewis and his associates are facing the fire not only of the Iron and Steel Institute, the employers' organization, but also of their own comrades in the American labor movement. What is a declaration of war against Eugene Grace and J. P. Morgan is a declaration of revolt from the traditional A. F. of L. leadership, which has thus far completely muffed the problem of organizing the mass-production industries. As we go to press we await information as to the action of the executive council of the A. F. of L. toward the member unions of the C. I. O. The only statesmanlike course for the council to pursue would be to postpone action until the whole issue can be openly thrashed out in the coming convention.

The second, and larger, meaning of the present steel organization drive is that it marks the coming-of-age of American labor in its confronting of the realities of American industry. The steel industry has been responsive to the main line of movement in industrial history. It is large-scale, it is, through its unofficial price agreements and its concentration of control, monopolistic; it is banker-ruled, and in its union of industrial technology with banker-control it shows finance-capitalism at its strongest; it is feudal in its hegemony over company police, company unions, company towns; it is savagely and articulately anti-labor. The struggle in steel will be a struggle between the most entrenched industrial group in America and a labor group which has finally reached a mature understanding of the task and the strength of the American workers. The utterances of John L. Lewis and Philip Murray are as unflinching as those of the Steel Institute. The half-million dollar paid advertisements of the Steel Institute in 375 newspapers was answered by the reading of a declaration of independence at the Homestead mass-meeting which is described elsewhere in this issue. And when Mr. Lewis in his radio speech on July 6 said "my voice tonight will be the voice of millions of men and of women employed in America's industries, heretofore unorganized" he was uttering not a boast nor a wishful thought but a realizable prospect. There is a young leadership springing up in steel as there is in rubber, in automobiles, in glass, in textiles, which is ready to go to battle not recklessly but with a full knowledge that they are confronting, as in steel, a five-billion dollar industry.

The thing to watch most, however, is the relation between the steel struggle and the Presidential election. The C.I.O., as Mr. Hardman points out in his article in this issue, is the heart of Labor's Non-Partisan League for Roosevelt. Nothing is more essential for the Republicans than to discredit and demoralize the new unionism movement. They will be pursuing good strategy if they seek to intensify the dissension within the A. F. of L., thereby splitting the labor vote. They will be pursuing even better strategy if they can smear Mr. Roosevelt with the charge of labor violence. That is the deepest meaning of the ultimatum which the Steel Institute, a Republican stronghold, has issued. We are convinced that the union organizing committee is aiming only at legal objectives, for labor's right to organize has not yet been outlawed. We are convinced also that it intends to use only legal methods. In fact, its whole hope for success lies in the avoidance of violence. But we are not so certain that the steel owners wish to avoid violence. In the first place, their best weapon is the attempt to prevent mass picketing and freedom of assembly—an attempt that can be carried out only by armed deputies and by tear-gas or worse. Secondly, if they can provoke a strike it can be used as a stick with which to beat Roosevelt. Nothing could be more disastrous to Mr. Roosevelt than to have to carry on his campaign in the midst of a strike which, once it starts, is almost certain to involve not only steel but the allied industries as well. Everything that happened in the strike would be distorted and laid at his door, because of his closeness to Lewis and his group.

That this is the strategy at once of the Steel Institute and the Landon managers cannot be doubted. That Mr. Lewis and his associates have their own strategy is equally clear. The coming summer months will be hot in more than one sense.

That Horrible Deficit

EXHIBIT A in the Liberty League's case against the New Deal is the enormous increase in the public debt which has resulted from the Administration's efforts to lift the country out of the depression. By dint of a careful selection of figures the exhibit can be made extremely impressive. The $4,764,000,000 deficit for the fiscal year ending on June 30 was the largest for any peacetime year in American history. In the three years that the Roosevelt Administration has been in office the national debt has increased approximately $13,000,000,000, or nearly 65 per cent. No one likes to be in debt, and the fact that the country as a whole owes nearly $34,000,000,000—$270 for each man, woman, and child in the country—can be made to sound terrifying to a person who does not understand the principles of national bookkeeping.

The picture is not, however, as dark as Republican propagandists would have us believe. Despite all appearances, the government's fiscal position has definitely improved for two successive years. Owing to better business conditions, the past year has seen substantial gains in the receipts from the income tax, miscellaneous internal revenues, and customs, which have brought about a $750,000,000 increase in ordinary government receipts. Moreover, as Secretary Morgenthau points out, two factors for which the Administration had no responsibility—the invalidation of the AAA processing taxes and the passage of the soldiers' bonus—accounted for $2,150,000,000 of the 1936 deficit. Another $350,000,000 was spent for amortization of the national debt and can hardly be considered as part of the deficit. Regardless of responsibility, the invalidation of the processing tax represented a real loss of revenue and must be taken into account. The soldiers' bonus, on the other hand, was an obligation which was incurred ten years ago, and the only charge that can properly be levied against this last year's budget is the extra cost involved in immediate payment as against payment in 1945. Allowing $200,000,000 to cover the cost of amortizing the bonus over ten years, the true deficit for the year was approximately $2,900,000,000, a reduction of $300,000,000 from 1935 and of $700,000,000 from 1934. Omitting the bonus altogether, this year's deficit is practically the same as that incurred in each of the last two years of the Hoover Administration.

As far as the pocket-books of the American people are concerned, the amount of debt means very little. What counts is the amount of money which must be collected annually to meet interest charges. Here the Administration is in an extremely favorable position, for the total interest burden for the past year was actually less than for any year between 1920 and 1927, and was only 10 per cent above the 1929 level. Expressed in per capita terms the debt seems large, but it is really extremely low as compared with the British per capita debt of nearly $850. If American deficits continued as in the past three years—taking the maximum possible figures for the past year—it would be eighteen years before our per capita national debt would reach the present British figure.

When the Treasury can float long-term loans at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent and have them sell at a premium as soon as they are issued, there is no reason to be perturbed about the government's credit. Nor can government borrowing produce an inflation as long as it represents true borrowing. The real fiscal problem facing the country, which is glossed over in recent Federal Reserve statements, is to be found in the tremendous inflational potentialities of the huge gold stabilization fund and the member-bank excess reserves, the results of devaluation. In the latest Federal Reserve statement excess reserves are listed as \$2,670,000,000—enough to support a \$26,000,000,000 expansion in credit—but this does not include the very substantial part of the Treasury's \$2,700,000,000 cash balance which is deposited in the Federal Reserve banks and which may also serve as a basis for credit expansion once it is spent. The fact that the Federal Reserve Board has found no solution for this problem, despite repeated conferences on the matter, may mean that no adequate solution exists within the limits of our present monetary system. It is this situation rather than the budget which will best bear watching during the coming months.

Vatican Over Hollywood

IN spite of the fact that Mr. Will H. Hays, czar of the motion-picture industry, is listed in "Who's Who" as an elder of the Presbyterian church, it is the Catholics who apparently have the inside track at Hollywood. The motion-picture producers have always lived in terror of government censorship. In lieu of it they were only too willing to accept the production code written by the Catholic church in 1930. By 1934, when the Catholic Legion of Decency, born in Cincinnati, was in full flower, Joseph Breen was appointed and given dictatorial powers to pass on stories before production. At that time, Variety, omniscient of the stage and screen, could predict that "possibly the Cincinnati decision may resolve itself into a papal encyclical ruling specifically on the Catholic attitude toward motion pictures the world over." That the church censorship before production is thoroughly effective is indicated by the list of accepted and prohibited pictures issued by the Legion of Decency as of July 9. Out of 277 pictures passed on by the organization, only 4 are condemned, although 30 are listed as objectionable in part—among them the heretical "Things to Come" by H. G. Wells.

The papal encyclical of July 2 comes as a sort of accolade to what the church has been permitted to do for the morals of movie goers in the United States—and as a promise of what may be done in other countries. The Pope's letter is clear, orthodox, and as always, unexceptionably phrased. "We call to mind," it says, "that it is necessary to apply to the cinema a supreme rule which must direct and regulate the greatest of arts in order that it may not find itself in continual conflict with Christian morality or even simply with human morality based upon natural law." One need not quarrel with this description of the cinema as the greatest of arts; if one is a member of the Catholic church, one need not perhaps quarrel with the thought of imposing a supreme rule upon it, or with the ability of the church to recognize and protect Christian or "human" morality. But some seventy millions of Americans attend the movies every week, and in 1934 there were in the United States something over twenty million Catholics. What the non-Catholic movie goers are entitled to decide, therefore, is whether they wish to have their films censored in advance by the Catholic church.

The grounds of church censorship are vague and a little hard for the layman to understand. Heretical doctrine, one of the pillars on which the Index Librorum Prohibitorum rests, is more easily defined than "immorality." Both figure largely in the censorship of motion pictures. In practice, almost any amount of sexual or other irregularity may be at least indicated—not too explicitly—provided there is either "repentance" at the end or punishment for the unregenerate sinner. Thus in the G-men pictures which have lately been so popular, when audiences may watch machine guns in action through several reels, it is forbidden to "glorify the criminal"; after a long career of hair-raising adventures, he must be shot by triumphant federal officers at the fade-out. But Sinclair Lewis's "It Can't Happen Here" was not permitted even to be filmed; and the current production of "Fury," an admirable tract against lynching, suffered a number of changes in production—notably in removing from it certain references to Negroes—which made it less of a significant social document than it might have been.

Film censorship as it operates in the studio today, therefore, seems to include politics as well as morals, local taboos as well as church doctrine. It works, in other words, no better than censorship has ever worked anywhere. The motion-picture goer is entitled to demand that his films be offered to him as his books are offered to him—in conformity with the laws with regard to obscenity and public decency, but otherwise uncensored. If the New York Times hired a lieutenant of Hitler's to blue-pencil its European news, there would be cries to high heaven; if the Soviet Government should presume to decide that no books criticizing the Russian revolution could be sold in the United States the air would be filled with thunder. Coming closer to home, we have valiantly resisted every attempt to impose a general federal censorship of printed matter. Our danger at present is from over-zealous, cohesive groups which may exert pressure on art or life. There is no conceivable justification for the presence of the National Legion of Decency in the cutting rooms and on the production lot in Hollywood.

Lemke: Crackpot for President

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, July 6

ALF M. LANDON and his patrons had no just cause to feel elated when, with the blessing of Father Coughlin, William ("The Bishop") Lemke on June 19 tossed his cap into the Presidential ring as the nominee of an amorphous nonentity called the Union Party. Mr. Lemke will be running in November at the expense of the Republican nominee and not, as Mr. Landon, his aides, and mentors so patently believe, at the expense of Mr. Roosevelt. It is already obvious that the only considerable issue in the campaign is Roosevelt himself and that the only votes Landon stands to get are not pro-Landon but anti-Roosevelt votes. Those are also the only votes that Lemke and his running-mate, Thomas Charles O'Brien, stand to get, and Mr. Landon can ill afford to spare them any.

The Republican high command's hope that Lemke will split Roosevelt's liberal, farm, and labor support and pave the way for a G. O. P. triumph in November is based on three false assumptions. The first of these is that Lemke, with the aid of Coughlin, Townsend, and the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith, will roll up a sizable vote. This assumption immediately runs afoul the unquestionable fact that Lemke won't be able to get on the ballot in many states because most states are equipped with laws to prevent the rise of "third" parties. The assumption is further weakened by the fact that, as better men than Lemke and his pals have found, it takes far more than four and a half months to build a political machine capable of getting out the vote and seeing that it is counted.

But where the assumption falls completely is in its acceptance of Coughlin, Townsend, and Smith as politically potent figures. No more overrated men than Coughlin and Townsend ever happened upon the American political scene. Mr. Smith has nowhere else to go. What power he may have had died with his liegeland, Huey Long, leaving him with only the self-contained powers of a backwoods rabble-rouser. His claim to a following of 5,000,000 is palpably absurd.

The claim of Townsend that he controls 15,000,000 votes is equally absurd. He and his organization have yet to demonstrate effective political strength. Their defeats at the polls have been far more numerous than their successes, and most of the latter have been questionable victories. They have adopted the old trick of claiming the probable winner as their candidate, knowing that few politicians will repudiate an offer of support from any group.

Coughlin is another whose power to deliver votes is at least unproven, if not mythical. There is every reason to believe that his popularity has declined sharply in the interim. According to apparently reliable reports, his collections had been falling off of late. A study of the rise and fall of those collections, incidentally, has shown that Coughlin's supporters are so scattered and so relatively few as to be of no political consequence.

The belief that Lemke will roll up an effective vote in at least the key states is the second of the untenable assumptions on which Republican hopes are based. It immediately raises the question: What are the key states? When you have answered it, you will discover that they are not the states in which Lemke has a chance. They are, instead, the industrial states—Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. For these Lemke, who speaks the agrarian tongue, will have little or no appeal. What strength he has will be concentrated in the farm states of the Mid-West, and by deflecting anti-Roosevelt votes away from Landon in those states Lemke will lessen the Republican nominee's chances of winning even the nucleus of the electoral-college vote he must have to reach the White House. And what of the Catholic and anti-Catholic vote? Certainly the recognizable Catholic vote is not going to Landon, the Methodist, and just as certainly it is not going to follow Coughlin, for most of his fellow priests will shoo it away. Such as it is, it always has been concentrated in the Democratic Party. As for the anti-Catholic vote—it is most powerful in the South, which even the Republican high command privately concedes, along with the West Coast, to Roosevelt.

The third and basic fallacy behind the hopes of the Republican high command is its belief that Lemke will pull liberal, farmer, and labor support away from Roosevelt, regardless of the fact that Lemke, like all other minority party candidates, will have to labor against the din set up by major party politicians screaming their ancient call: "Don't throw your vote away." There would be some merit in the assumption if Lemke truly stood to the left of Roosevelt. He stands, instead, on a platform which holds no lures for liberals or radicals. It is a hodge-podge of what passed for progressivism twenty or thirty years ago, a mixture of Populism and Old Guard Republicanism. It is a fanatically isolationist and militarist document certain parts of which might have been written by Hearst. Certain other parts exhibit traces of a timid, dishonest Townsendism, topped off with a promise of low taxes for everybody and limitation of individual net income, gifts, and inheritances. For the boys in the goiter belt there is a plank pledging "production at a profit for the farmer."

Such liberals as can be prevailed upon this year to cast a "protest" vote will certainly not snap at such pork rinds as these the Union Party offers in its platform. Their votes will go instead to Thomas and to Kansas's other favorite son, Earl Browder. The presence of the fascistic Coughlin at Lemke's elbow would be enough to scare them away, if Lemke's platform itself did not suffice. As for the labor vote—it is nonsensical to expect that Lemke can snare any appreciable portion of it. For the first time in post-war history the labor vote is being rounded up in effective fashion, and the group riding herd on it, Labor's Non-Partisan League, will deliver it lock, stock, and barrel to Roosevelt. There remains as possible ammunition for Lemke only the farm vote and that solely in a few wind, flood, and drought-gutted states such as his own North Dakota. He and his clan have never been able to muster sizable support in the more prosperous farming areas of the Mid-West. Furthermore, he will have the opposition even in this region from the Norris-La Follette-Commonwealth Federation groups, and the Farmer-Labor party, the last-named led by Governor Olson, of Minnesota. Spokesmen for all those groups have denounced Lemke for his Union Party bid. The National Farm Holiday Association, on whose support he counted, has just turned down in convention at St. Paul a resolution endorsing the Lemke ticket.

Nearly all these groups earlier in the year had considered various proposals for amalgamating and launching a bona fide national Farmer-Labor Party and for various reasons all had turned them down. The sudden and unheralded birth of the Union Party came as an unwelcome surprise to them. Parturition appears to have taken place in New England on the estate of Frances P. Keelon, a New Yorker, who is reported to share Father Coughlin's taste for speculation in silver. Precisely whose idea it was is not yet discernible. That it reached Coughlin before it reached Lemke is almost certain. The theory of the Democratic high command that the attending obstetricians were certain Republican leaders of Liberty League stripe is at least worthy of consideration in view of the apparent willingness of that gang to throw money away on anything that promises to add to the attack on Roosevelt. It gains further color from the appearance of Townsend in the picture and the past dickering of Republican missionaries for a $75,000 interest in the Townsend organization.

How this party with no members came to pick Lemke, an obscure Congressman, as its Presidential nominee is less swathed in mystery. Lemke formed an alliance with Coughlin when the radio priest came to the support this year of the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinancing bill which would have cured all the ills of the body politic by injecting a $3,000,000,000 emulsion of greenbacks. Lemke, a man easily duped by flattery, was receptive to the nomination offer not only because it cozened his overweening self-esteem, but also because he had come, in just those last few weeks of Congress, to hate Roosevelt with all the hatred of an Al Smith or a Du Pont. He had been given to understand—or thought that he had been given to understand—that Roosevelt privately favored the Frazier-Lemke bill and would sign it if it were passed by Congress. By an almost inconceivable feat of one-man lobbying and button-holing Lemke had forced his bill to a vote in the House, only to see it crushed under the Administration's steam-roller.

The experience set his teeth on edge and plunged him into his present anti-Roosevelt alliance with Coughlin, Townsend, and Smith. A similar reaction, according to men long connected with North Dakota politics on Lemke's side of the fence, had carried him into the Non-Partisan League from which he gets what little reputation he has as a liberal. It is reported by these men that when Lemke entered the Non-Partisan League it was as a violently partisan Republican, filled with hatred of Wilson, and that his animosity toward Wilson was due to Wilson's Mexican policy and the fact that Lemke's landholdings in Mexico were suffering as a result. The men who tell this story insist that Lemke is impeccably honest and reject the assertion of radicals from his territory that he is "only another professional farm leader," meaning a racketeer.

Born to pioneering parents at Albany, Minnesota, fifty-eight years ago, Lemke had been raised on a farm in a god-forsaken northeast corner of North Dakota, had been graduated as a bachelor of arts from the state university in 1902, and spent the next three years studying law there and at Georgetown Law School and Yale. The last-named institution awarded him his law degree in 1905, and he thereupon returned to Fargo and set up a law shop. His practice was with farmers and farm organizations. He reports in the Congressional Directory that he "has been connected with practically every farm organization in the Northwest as attorney or as active member, including the Farmers' Union and the Cooperative Exchange." He achieved at least local renown as "an authority on the Constitution" and remains one of the gentry who believe that anything can be done under that document, including the setting up of a dictatorship. It was his work as counsel for the old Equity Cooperative in its fight against the grain exchange that brought him to the attention of the Non-Partisan League, when North Dakota's farmers were about to abandon economic for political action.

Lemke became a member of the Non-Partisan League's national executive committee, a post he held from 1917 to 1921. Beginning in 1916 he also held for a similar period of years the chairmanship of the Republican state central committee, and it was principally the G. O. P. in North Dakota that the league set out to capture. The character of its following may be gathered from the fact that its first Congressional candidate, John Baer, now a cartoonist for Labor, achieved election by wowing the voters not with an exposition of his views, but with a series in which he showed them how a sketch of the American eagle could be turned into a portrait of Uncle Sam and a picture of a hog into a profiteer. Townley, the league's Mark Hanna, had hand-picked Baer, just as he hand-picked all the league's other candidates.

This is the same Townley who, according to reports published in the Minnesota press, got $100,000 from the Republicans to run against Governor Olson in 1934. Lemke, his first lieutenant, was similarly supported by the Democrats when he ran for Congress in 1932, the Roosevelt gang financing his campaign as a Republican in exchange for his support of the New Deal. They had needed a man capable of drawing a crowd in those parts, and Lemke filled the bill. He was credited with having carried the state for Roosevelt as well as for himself as Representative-at-large. He is apparently as expert a rabble-rouser in the north country as the Reverend Mr. Smith is in the South. His long face, a maze of freckles and pock marks, set off by a prognathous mouth, one eye that is glass, and one that is genuine but peculiarly cocked, apparently is no more of a detriment there than is his hysterical, high-pitched voice and his thigh-slapping method of pounding home a speech. Undoubtedly his reputation as an unyielding dry is also an asset.

The league which he helped to organize and raise to power in North Dakota was incessantly entangled in financial difficulties. The farmers who supported it had little cash throughout most of the year and paid their subscriptions in post-dated checks which then were hocked with friendly banks. The league had been in power only a little while when this practice brought its house down around its ears. William Langer, a turncoat, who had been a league member, provided the necessary push that started the avalanche. The state's blue-sky law commissioner, who also was state bank commissioner, was in Florida investigating a sisal plantation Townley was promoting there as part of a scheme to make and sell binder twine to North Dakota farmers, to whom he also hoped to sell stock in the enterprise. At this propitious moment Langer managed to have one of the league's friends, the Fargo Scandinavian-American Bank, closed, and out of this closing grew charges that Lemke and his pals had caused the state-owned central bank to deposit public funds in an institution they knew to be insolvent. Out of the charges grew indictments, naming Lemke among others. Thrown out as faulty, the indictments were redrawn and one man was tried and convicted under them. But the indictment against Lemke was quashed.

Then came reaction against the league in which he was a ringleader, and the electorate resorted to the power of a recall election which the league had given them. Lemke, who had been elected Attorney General in 1920, Frazier, who had been elected Governor, and John N. Hagen, the state's Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor, were recalled in 1921. Frazier the following year ran for the United States Senate as a Republican and league candidate and was elected. He has been in the Senate ever since and has been generously described as "an old plowhorse who needs a big field in which to turn around." Lemke, embittered by the results of the recall election, retired to private practice and took no further part in politics until 1932 when he sought and obtained election to the House as a pro-Roosevelt Republican. He was reelected in 1934 on much the same grounds. Except for his constant striving to put through his inflationary farm-mortgage refinancing bill—an effort traceable to the fact that two-thirds of the farms in his state have been foreclosed—he has been undistinguishable from any one of a hundred other New Deal Congressmen.

The record shows that he has voted for most of the New Deal measures which he now reviles, including the AAA and the NRA. He voted for the Guffey bill, the 1933 gold-contract bill, the 1934 Gold Reserve Act, the HOLC, the FEPA, the $4,880,000,000 work-relief bill of 1935, the TVA, and the holding-company bill. There is no record of how he voted on the Wagner Labor Relations Act. He voted against the Social Security Act, which he now calls "a social fake . . . inaugurated to head off old-age pensions." His talents as a creator of legislation have been devoted chiefly to such measures as the Frazier-Lemke bill. His preoccupation with the black arts of monetary manipulation is described by long-time friends as a relatively new obsession with him. It has earned him among his House colleagues the title of "Crackpot" to place beside that of "The Bishop," which his North Dakota neighbors long bestowed upon him because of his self-righteous manner. His House title carries with it no stigma of dislike, although Lemke, despite his success in mustering the 208 petition signatures that forced consideration of the Frazier-Lemke bill, is far from being one of the House's most popular members. He is scarcely more distinguished in that respect than his campaign manager, Usher L. Burdick, the other Representative-at-large from North Dakota. Burdick, a lawyer, sought election as a pro-Roosevelt Republican in 1932 and made it in 1934. It was this same Burdick who told the convention of the National Farm Holiday Association that "six weeks" after election to the Presidency Lemke would be making conservative speeches. He raised the point that solution of the farmers' problems waits upon the election of the "right men" to Congress. Lemke, taking a similar view, is running for Congress again as well as for the Presidency. He privately has no illusions as to his prospects of achieving the White House and talks instead of making his Unionist campaign into an instrument for capturing the balance of power in the House next year by filling a hundred of its seats with Townsendites, Coughlinites, and others of his own kind. If we are to judge by the company he keeps, advocates of a bona fide third, or Farmer-Labor, party had better not wait for Lemke.

Labor Moves Toward Power

BY J. B. S. HARDMAN

SIGNIFICANT forces have come into motion upon the American labor scene. A growing belligerency in the periphery, all too long subdued, is now being given expression by a considerable sector of the central leadership. Smug complacency, the time-honored mental condition of "constituted leadership," is rapidly giving way to "anxious inertia," as John L. Lewis has aptly characterized the frame of mind of the elder statesmen of the A. F. of L.

The onrush of events has been great: enough, indeed, to crowd a much longer time than the seven to eight months that have elapsed since the inner battle was brought into the open by the opposition at the Atlantic City convention of the American Federation of Labor. All the developments have sustained one dominant note—the breakdown of traditional leadership. The mere enumeration of headlines conveys an impact of telling motion—the formation of the Committee for Industrial Organization and its successful intervention in the rubber strike at Akron; the radio workers' refusal to heed the stifling order of the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. and the subsequent launching of the unaffiliated United Electrical and Radio Workers of America; the actual initiation of the drive to organize steel, under the guidance of the C. I. O. and through the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, hitherto a conservative prop; the demonstration by the United Automobile Workers' Union of their all but formal independence of the Executive Council, and the unification of the various automobile workers' organizations developed in consequence; the launching of Labor's Non-Partisan League; and, finally, the refusal of the C. I. O. unions, comprising some 40 per cent of the federation's membership, to comply with the Executive Council's order to dissolve the committee. The new C. I. O. affiliations, announced several days ago, of the United Automobile Workers Union and of the United Rubber Workers of America, coming in the face of certain reprisals by the Executive Council, further emphasize the disintegration of the old line captancy.

The C. I. O. has consistently refused to be provoked by charges of disloyalty or to stoop to personal attacks as argument. Charles P. Howard, president of the International Typographical Union, has set the intellectual tone in his truly remarkable exchanges of letters with the Executive Council. Thus he states the gist of the difference between the two contending groups in the A. F. of L.:

I agree with you when you say, "The interests of the working men and women of the nation, all of whom are seriously affected in the development of their economic and social life, call for united action." I am willing to go you one better and say the interests of the workers transcend every other consideration—even sacrosanct jurisdictional claims. . . . Any legal and ethical policy that will promote organization is justified. Any policy that interferes with and prevents organization cannot be justified and will not prevail.

The restraint of these words is surpassed only by the volume of justified indignation they convey. Only a movement that is sure of victory can be so self-controlled. Never throughout this encounter have the guardians of vested or "proprietary" interests in craft unionism been able to hurl the charge of Moscow influence against the opposition or to accuse it of seeking to undermine the United States Constitution, the home, or the gold base of the dollar. For once, tried and true American catchwords have failed to catch. John L. Lewis cannot be painted red—the paint simply will not stick.

The realistic activism of Messrs. Lewis, Howard, Hillman, and their associates have caught the people's imagination. The C. I. O. has become a rallying center and a driving force of the first magnitude. There soon proved to be sober truth in the jest a Washington correspondent made in the press: "There now are two labor movements, the A. F. of L. and the J. L. L." The Committee for Industrial Organization has, from the outset, sailed under clear and unmistakable colors. Its name has told the full story upon which not even its masterful publicity can improve. The issue is not Lewis versus Green, although much has been made of the mutual antagonism of the two men. The issue at bottom is between a labor unionism that reflects labor's struggle for a place in the sun and one that in so far as the mass-production industries are concerned is but an addition, tolerated by the employers, to the personnel-management department of the business. The two are not reconcilable.

Trade-unionism has long suffered from a social inferiority complex, and those who achieved positions of leadership have been satisfied to stay put. To be sure, the union leaders had an idea of the latent power over which they presided, but somehow it never occurred to them that they could use this power as a leverage for far-reaching action. It is enough to recall the ringing declaration of the A. F. of L. on the eve of America's entrance into the World War—words expressive of the proud self-consciousness of the man who can make tools and knows how to use them:

. . . We represent the part of the nation closest to the fundamentals of life. Those we represent wield the nation's tools. . . . The power and the use of industrial tools are greater than the tools of war and will in time supersede agencies of destruction. . . . The corner-stone of national defense is social justice in fundamental relations—economic justice.

But when responsibility for production and power lay within their reach, it was at most the right of collective bargaining that they thought of demanding. Nor were they even as daring as that in all industries. Not until it was too late did they tackle steel, the giant industry that wallowed in war-made riches. Trained in the art of negotiating, both with employers and with their own members, the trade union leaders were primarily go-between men. They could not see themselves in the role of fighters for a new civilization and a new social morality, reaching out for a relocation of social power.

Not that the stalwarts have not fought battles or sustained severe wounds in the struggles of labor. Most of them rose to leadership upon a record of service, devotion, and many days of gallant fighting, and they honestly and fairly represented the mind of their constituents. And if some others have muscled their way to the top with no better credentials than heavy fists or a genius for maneuvering, the men on the other side are not all lineal descendants of saints. The "trouble" is mostly with the situation, not with the persons. Over the years of time that these leaders achieved their group and personal success, a new America arose to being. The one in which they fought and won no longer exists. In the days of their youth, they carried over and used, with a measure of success, the methods and the traditions of the craft age. They continued to use them with much less success in the machine age. But what chance do they have today, in the power age? The shrinking craft base of union operation has made the movement ingrown, has deprived it of ambition, has fostered upon the leadership a habit of delay which is defended as caution and responsibility, but is in effect a hopeless, almost a fatalistic defeatism.

Labor's Non-Partisan League occupies a strategically central position in the organization of the mass-production industries. This brain-child of the C. I. O. may or may not turn out to be labor's vehicle to independent action in politics. But it ought to be clear that the line-up of the nation's major and most active unions behind President Roosevelt, through the L. N. P. L., goes deeper than the political surface of the situation. There is not a doubt that being "on the ground floor with the President" will be used by organizers in the steel or in the automobile industry as an added argument for "this is the time to organize." For the present, at least, the L. N. P. L. and the C. I. O. form a combined pressure that needs to be exerted if the unionization of the millions of unorganized in the mass-production industries is to have a chance. We may express the moving forces in labor best by the formula $C. I. O. + L. N. P. L. = 2 C. I. O.$

The recently-held convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers confirms this view. Despite a well-earned reputation for political aggressiveness and economic gradualism, the clothing workers unanimously reversed themselves. They voted an indorsement of the reelection of Roosevelt through the L. N. P. L., and they shouted thunderous approval of the union's leading position in the C. I. O., despite the ultimatum of the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. It is possible that the development of European fascism, to which the Jewish and the Italian workers in the union are particularly sensitive, may have made them receptive to the argument: Roosevelt or fascism. But this was not the major motivation of the convention's action. The "ganging up" of reactionaries of all stripes against the author of the New Deal seemed to have been taken by the delegates as a personal affront, just as was the stubborn objection of the craft unionists to industrial unionization of the mass-production workers. There seems to be but one common denominator for C. I. O., L. N. P. L., and F. D. R. in so far as the clothing workers are concerned; it is the people against the exploiting and oppressive class—or, as it is likely to be from now on, the "economic royalists."

The Amalgamated's convention apparently followed in the footsteps of the United Mine Workers, who indorsed the reelection of President Roosevelt several months earlier. But there was a significant difference in the way the two unions approached the issue. The miners accompanied their indorsement of the President by a statement on the one hand that their action did not imply the acceptance of the Democratic Party and on the other hand by tabling a resolution for a labor party as a move that might endanger the President's reelection. The clothing workers' indorsement of Roosevelt was accompanied by a pro-labor party stand.

Major George L. Berry, titular head of the L. N. P. L., stated in his address at the Amalgamated convention that out of over eighteen thousand local, city central, and national union leaders who responded to the league's call for cooperation, only fifteen declined. Four thousand offered to go on the stump. It was also reported that a great many letters of acceptance received by the L. N. P. L. expressed the hope that "this time there will be a real labor effort at independent politics." When Berry closed his pro-Roosevelt speech with the words, "We are going to maintain this institution on up until the election and after the election on up to 1940, and what we do in 1940 when the grand shake-up is coming will be nobody's business but ours," twelve hundred men and women stood frantically cheering and pledging support to what they were firmly convinced was a definite and irrevocable labor-party commitment. In explicit resolutions the clothing workers sought to make it entirely clear that they rejected the Democratic Party as a fighting instrument for the achievement of labor's ends, and the union's general executive board was directed to take an active part in any genuine attempt by representative labor organizations to form a labor party.

It is not unreasonable to assume that conventions of ladies' garment workers, of textile workers, of any other group of workers, had they been meeting at this time, would have acted in much the same manner as did the miners and clothing workers. The hosiery workers and the automobile workers did. Whatever may be the ultimate wisdom of labor's support of President Roosevelt in the present crisis, it is certain that if this course is due to a misreading of the play of historic forces, the misreading is not the work of professional misleaders. When either a faith or an illusion takes hold of an organized mass movement, it will not do to laugh it out of court by caustic remarks or expressions of contempt, or to ignore it. That faith must be tested in action, and not until it is either found unjustified or proved sound, will the road to further action be clear. If it be an illusion, it must be lived down.

It would be a grave error to close our eyes to the full meaning of this contest for mastery within the organized labor movement. It foreshadows the oncoming struggle for power in American industrial society. Labor is marshaling forces for greater battles than have been waged in a long time, greater in scope and greater in the questions at issue. So are the other organized classes. The American Iron and Steel Institute did not rush upon the scene, warning the country that the organizing drive in steel was an attack on returning prosperity, merely to pay a compliment to the power of the C. I. O. No less indicative of the portent of events are editorial caveats in the Herald Tribune and the Sun that "the prospects of warfare in any industry, and particularly in one so vital to the nation's economy, is of serious concern to the whole country," and "it is not inconceivable that the course of the election itself may be profoundly influenced by what happens at the steel mills in the next two or three months." Shades of Marcus A. Hanna and the McKinley-Bryan campaign! Similarity of historic incidents is no conclusive proof of historic similarities. Yet, in that campaign of 1896, one Edward Lauterback, chairman of the New York Republican County Committee, declared: "No blood will be shed—at least not yet, but if they attempt to subvert your Supreme Court, if they should succeed, by any chance, in foisting upon you these horrible doctrines—anarchistic, socialistic, and communistic—which that platform, adopted by this populist brood, contain, we will not abide by that decision."

Nor is "independent" political action, of a kind, missing in the whole array of forces by the party of the second part. There is no doubt that Congressman William Lemke's Union Party, immaculately conceived and thunderously brought into being by the Reverend Father

Charles E. Coughlin, proposes to sap the strength of popular discontent. The New Deal philosophy has led the American people to think that "the state owes them a living" if and when the economic set-up fails to provide the individual with a chance of hiring himself out. But payments on this obligation have not been coming promptly or adequately. And so the average person has come to think that since politicians' promises must not be taken at face value, there may be economic wisdom in paying heed to politicians whose promises are biggest. Thus Mr. Lemke's party is the punishment visited upon the American people for the sins of commission and omission of Franklin D. Roosevelt's government. But American labor, which has entered this campaign under the banner of Roosevelt despite his party, has an obligation and an opportunity to fight Mr. Lemke's party of incipient fascism with a constructive program.

Labor's Non-Partisan League will undoubtedly develop a far-reaching drive for Mr. Roosevelt's reelection. But wherever there is a fighting chance for local farmer-labor and progressive Congressional candidates, the league must move into action with speed and energy. Because of the immense apparatus and resources it has at its command such action will not mean recklessness. The national and state leaders of L. N. P. L. are neither theorists nor politicians committed to a particular brand of political operation. They are most likely to act in accordance with the types of pressure that will be brought to bear upon them and the evidence of practical achievement through action in all given cases.

Though it be replete with explosive divergences, abounding in confusion, what we are witnessing today is the emergence in the United States of a labor movement that is an American labor movement in all that the term American implies: large scale, opportunistic, belligerent, shrewd, hell-bent on "getting there."

How to Become a Spy

BY WILLARD PRICE

SINCE I live in Japan, it may be well to preface these remarks with the hope that my Japanese friends will take no umbrage at what is here set down. It is not written with a long face or malevolent intent. And if I am entertained by certain peculiarities of these estimable folk, they are just as free to be entertained by those of the Western barbarian—and quite often, I notice, exercise their freedom.

The first characteristic of the Japanese is courtesy. The second is, perhaps, suspicion.

Not a week passes without its spy scare in the Japanese press. Some foreigner has been seen taking photographs. Who can say—perhaps the suspicion itself is a form of courtesy. For what an honor it is to the grub who would not get a second look from the cops in his home town to find himself under suspicion as the arch-spy of some great power!

Those who have visited only Japan proper have but tasted the cup. They should go where the officials are really nervous, along the Manchu-Siberian border, or to the South Sea islands which Japan holds under mandate from the League of Nations. The focus of infection so far as spy-phobia is concerned seems to be the strategic island of Palau, closest Japanese territory to Singapore, the Philippines, and Australia.

I had not thought of becoming a spy until the Palau police put it into my head. They have a training course for foreigners who wish to qualify as spies. The chief instructor is a smiling young police officer, by name Toyama-san. In black-and-white yukata he strolled in one evening to call upon us at the home of the German missionary where my wife and I had sought refuge on this hotel-less heathen isle. He laid a map on Herr Siemer's table.

First lesson: "You cannot go there," said Toyama-san, indicating a spot with his pencil. And to quiet a natural suspicion he added, "But there are no fortifications—nothing." Another point. "Cannot go—but there is nothing." Four other spots. "Cannot go," jabbing the points vigorously with the pencil. Then, each time, with a disarming wave of the hand, "But there is nothing—nothing."

It had not occurred to me to make a search for fortifications. Of course they are forbidden under the terms of the mandate. "No military or naval bases shall be established or fortifications erected in the territory." It had seemed unlikely that this regulation was being violated since we had been allowed to go everywhere in the Yap group without the slightest surveillance and had seen nothing that remotely resembled a fortification.

But Toyama-san's closed cupboard with its sign, "Do not open! There is NO JAM in this cupboard," was too tantalizing a challenge to resist. I took down the names of the six forbidden spots and determined to visit all of them.

The next morning I called upon Mr. Kodama, Vice-Governor General of the entire South Seas government. (The Governor General was in Tokyo.) After I had recounted the restrictions of the police, Mr. Kodama said, "I don't know why they should do that. We have no secrets here. You may go anywhere. But have you seen Captain Konishi? You had better see Captain Konishi."

Captain Konishi is the naval attaché. He delivers sailing instructions to the merchant ships and prepares the way for the Japanese warships which occasionally visit Palau. The extent of his power is not quite clear. Some say that he is on a par with the civil authorities if not superior to them, just as the army and navy in Japan accept no dictation from parliament or premier but are answerable only to the throne. However that may be, he is the soul of modesty.

"I am only a naval officer," he said when I asked for permission to move freely through the Palau group. "That is a matter for the Governor to decide."

Mr. Toyama was eager to know the result of the interview. "What did Captain Konishi say? May you go?"

"He said he would accept the Governor's decision. And the Governor says I may go anywhere. Therefore I may go anywhere."

But I had been a little too logical in my deductions. It was not so simple as that. I could go, but not without entourage. I was provided with congenial companions—Mr. Hayashi, Foreign Affairs Secretary of the South Seas government, a police officer, and three sailors; and a government launch with spacious cabin and pleasant deck space fore and aft was placed at my disposal. This attention was flattering, but I could have done with a bit less comfort and more freedom.

I had hoped to go about in the missionary's new motor boat, on which only three days' work remained to be done. But suddenly the carpenters quit work. And we learned that they had been instructed not to finish the boat until the Americans left. "The day the Americans go you can finish your boat," the missionary was told. I suggested speaking to the Governor about it. "No, no," said the missionary. "Let the police have their way. Otherwise they will make trouble for us." After a month of tinkering over three days' work, the boat was slipped into the water the day after we sailed from Palau.

But our trips in the government launch were enjoyable and comfortable. Each time I introduced one of the six sore spots into a projected itinerary there was much discussion and two or three days' delay to obtain permission. Then we went—and found—nothing. Some of the points were of great strategic importance, but there were no man-made fortifications. None of my requests for detailed examination were refused. We poked about in channels and bays and climbed to hilltops. Except that I made no measurements, sketches, or photographs, I had as much freedom as if I had gone unaccompanied.

One by one the six secrets were checked off until only one remained, the island of Arakabesan. This was an island of many hills, any one of them a convenient location for a battery. I could hardly undertake to climb them all. But there were two planes in the harbor. I assumed that they were navy planes, and we made a social call upon Captain Konishi at his house.

This time he received us in shirt and suspenders (a sign of increasing confidence, I thought, for the first time he had barricaded himself behind gold braid). With Western directness I immediately stated my mission. There were rumors abroad that Japan had fortified her South Sea islands. I wished to be able to write positively, "There are no fortifications on Palau." To say that, I must see. I was too lazy to climb every hill on Arakabesan. Could a plane be placed at my disposal for half an hour so that I might fly low over this area?

Captain Konishi gave no sign that he considered the request extraordinary. He bowed slightly, made a little sound of agreement deep in his throat, and asked whether the bean candy was to our taste.

It was. Munching yokan, we discussed the versatility of the bean, used to make everything from cake to buttons, from milk, cheese, butter, soup, salad oil, and ice cream to varnish, enamels, oilcloth, linoleum, glue, and soap.

When the bean's possibilities had been exhausted I ventured to make my request again. The Captain bowed, considered, and inquired whether we liked sashimi (raw fish). That started Mary, who is a sashimi gourmand—yes, the red more than the white. Sashimi made from bonito was splendid. Ah, but, put in the Captain vivaciously, had she tried bass sashimi? When he had been stationed in San Francisco he had had sashimi made from bass—delicious. There is good bass fishing on the Pacific Coast.

Yes, I said, and speaking of fishing, it was interesting how airplanes were used to locate schools of fish. And speaking of airplanes, would it be possible to arrange for an airplane over Arakabesan? He nodded gravely. Now take dried fish. We really should see the making of katsubushi on the shores of Malakal. And turtles. He showed us a fine specimen in the tokonoma.

There were many other distracting things about the room. Wooden tattooed dolls made by the Mortlock people, carved faces from Mortlock, an ivory nut from Ponape, a necklace of white and black disks made from sea shells and cocoanut shells, the great Tritonion shell which the natives use as a trumpet. Finally there was nothing left in the room to discuss except the visitors. He successfully got them talking about themselves. Still I did not forget to inject my question, each time a little more weakly. It always reminded him of something really interesting. When two hours had gone by in this delightful fashion and it was positively necessary to leave to make the dinner hour at Frau Siemer's, I rose and placed both hands upon the table as if about to deliver an address. Mustering all the powers I had of direct and succinct statement, I put my request. Captain Konishi expressed mild surprise, as if he had only now understood me. The airplanes—unfortunately they were not naval planes but government mail planes. He had no power. It would be necessary to apply to the Governor. But why go so soon—please come again. Take along these little souvenirs.

We came away in a very happy frame of mind. We had enjoyed our visit immensely—the Captain, the calpis, the hibiscus reflected in the pool in the garden—and agreed that Captain Konishi was a splendid fellow and would some day be an admiral.

Although my naivete was now so blunted that I no longer expected to get a plane, we went that evening to call upon Vice-Governor Kodama in his beautiful home on the shore of the lagoon. He received us jovially. He has cheeks like apples and is the most genial host imaginable. Unfamiliar with English, he sent a car to the other end of town for Mrs. Shisatomi, who learned English in Hawaii. She came with her baby, too young to be left at home. Two other officials were called in. We sat about a conference table, the baby nursing quietly during most of the interview. Occasionally the mother must rise and jiggle the fretful child, translating meanwhile, or attend to him on a chair under the horizon of the table top, never quitting her interpreting.

Mr. Kodama answered my questions in a very forthright manner. Airplane? Very dangerous. The pilots were men of little experience. The planes had been here only four months, and the men were not yet accustomed to the peculiar air currents above Palau. So they refused to take up passengers. He himself, Mr. Kodama, had wished to go, but could not. Too dangerous. With his hands he demonstrated how violently the planes wobble—and laughingly used the word jishin, earthquake.

I agreed that the air currents must be dangerous indeed if they could not be learned in four months. But I offered to sign a paper assuming all responsibility in case of accident.

No, even so, the responsibility, he said, would be theirs. If I did not care for myself, they did. Also it would be necessary to board the plane from a boat and disembark into a boat, very difficult.

I thought I could manage.

He feared not.

Very well, I said, doubtless he was right. Then might I pass around Arakabesan by boat and land where I pleased?

He was very sorry. As I doubtless knew, at the southern tip of the island an airport was being built for the forthcoming air-mail service to Tokyo. Much blasting. Very dangerous. During the operations no visitors, not even Japanese, were allowed.

But if I went under proper supervision? And landed at a safe distance from the blasting?

It was a very small island.

A mile long, was it not?

Yes, but all roads led to the same place.

I saw that it was time to agree that it must be very dangerous, and did so, shivering a little.

Moreover, went on Mr. Kodama, there was a leper island near by. That was another danger that made it inadvisable to visit Arakabesan.

What, I said, the small island I had noticed a half mile north of Arakabesan? Was it a leper island?

Yes.

Then that settled it. I wouldn't take the risk. Lepers! I thanked him for warning me in time.

We walked home through the deserted main street under the tropic moon.

Mary mused. "What a blow it would be to our leper friends in Korea who entertained us in their homes if they knew that now we can't stand a leper half a mile away."

"Yes," I said, "but circumstances alter cases. Here everything is very dangerous."

Not a visitor, so far as I know, has ever discovered anything remotely resembling a fortification in the mandated islands. The missionaries know of none. The natives know of none. The safe assumption seems to be that there are none. Then why the surveillance? Probably to prevent foreigners from photographing, sketching, or otherwise becoming too familiar with the defensive features of mountains, harbors, and reefs. But all these things were fully recorded by the meticulous Germans, and the German maps are doubtless on file in every navy office in the world. Moreover, a real spy, trained in the art, could get any such information first hand or through the natives. We must go a bit deeper still to find the secret spring of Japan's national nervousness. Its real basis, I think, is psychological. It is the keyed-up tension of expectancy. Japan has plans. She must "stabilize" the Orient, and that soon, before the end of the West's present period of introspection. The area envisaged under the banner of "Asia for the Asiatics" is bounded on the north by Siberia and on the south by the fourteen hundred highly strategic Micronesian islands, where man-made forts would be of little use but where the natural labyrinth provides an almost impenetrable obstruction. The "northern first line of defense" and the "southern first line of defense" are the terms frequently applied by army and navy officials to the Russian frontier and the South Sea chain. And Japan proper must take the first shock of any attack from the east. If there is extraordinary sensitiveness over defenses it is perhaps because of the significance of these three barriers in the protection of the gigantic, long-term projects Japan is already initiating on the Asiatic continent.

Whose Medicine?

BY JAMES RORTY

THE majority of American doctors operate small one-man businesses, and charge as much or as little as the traffic will bear. Since 1929 it won't bear very much, and a great many American doctors are metaphorically, and even in some cases literally, hungry. Medical ethics in its true connotation, meaning the high tradition of the profession, obliges the doctor to do his utmost, first, to prevent the patient from becoming sick; second, to cure him as quickly and inexpensively as possible; third, to utilize when necessary to this end all the available resources of consultation, laboratory, and hospital service. Economic self-interest, since the doctor is paid on a fee-for-service basis, tempts him to keep the patient sick and to pretend competence whether he has it or not. That only a very small minority of physicians yield to these obvious temptations is still the glory of the profession.

A group clinic is a relatively big business offering typical economies and efficiencies of operation and competing with the one-man business of the individual doctor. If it, too, operates on a fee-for-service basis, the same temptations are present; the routine collaboration of a number of doctors may or may not tend to minimize them. If, instead, it charges a fixed annual fee designed to cover all or most of the medical needs of the patients, then the economic interests of doctor and patient tend to coincide. If, in addition, the clinic is operated cooperatively, on a non-profit basis, then the system rests on its proper bottom, the doctor is freed from economic pressures that strike at the very roots of his professional integrity, and we have an organization of medical care roughly analogous to our system of public education; payment for medical care through taxation would complete the analogy.

The American Medical Association, with a membership of over two-thirds of American physicians, is essentially a trade association of one-man medical businesses. It has a record of extraordinarily valuable accomplishment with respect to the raising of standards of education and practice, the control and suppression of quackery, the pooling and dissemination of medical knowledge; its activities today in many if not most of its departments are conducted on a high level and in the public interest.

This matter-of-fact statement is made, not to conciliate the shoguns of organized medicine, but to point up the paradox of the present situation. For the American Medical Association is itself a business, with a net worth, as of December 31, 1935, of over three and one-half million dollars. Large though this figure is, it does not express the true importance of the A. M. A. as a business. As a matter of fact, the A. M. A. not only represents a pooling of the vested economic interests of its members, but has itself an institutional vested interest of the first magnitude.

In Chicago Dr. Olin West, secretary and general manager of the A. M. A., assured me that "lay journalists, almost without exception, have misrepresented the social aspects of medicine, because they haven't the slightest idea of what is represented by medical care." I have two answers to that: first, that as an occasional purchaser of medical services I am as much entitled to my ideas of what is represented by medical care as is the doctor—so is any other patient for that matter; second, and with all due respect to Dr. West, I must insist that I am not a layman with respect to his business. Or should we say, Dr. Fishbein's business? The A. M. A., for all practical purposes, is in the advertising business, and in that field I claim to be an expert.

It costs money to operate the A. M. A. apparatus. It costs money to print and distribute Dr. Fishbein's editorial statesmanship, just as it costs money to operate William Randolph Hearst's multitudinous publishing enterprises. Where does the money come from? In both cases most of it comes from advertising. The Journal of the American Medical Association is one of the most profitable publications in America. According to the treasurer's report, its gross earnings during 1935 were $1,493,472, of which the two major items were $601,559 from fellowship dues and subscriptions and $767,231 from advertising. The net earnings came to $604,672, a sum more than sufficient to finance the total 1935 expenditures of the A. M. A., which came to $584,975.

Medical products advertised in the Journal must be approved by the Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry, and food products must be approved by the Committee on Foods. This approval permits the advertiser to use, there and elsewhere in his advertising, the "seal of acceptance" of the A. M. A. The formula is not new; doubtless its adoption by the A. M. A. was dictated by public-spirited motives. (The placing of advertising in the Journal is not a condition of acceptance, and in fact the majority of the products reported upon by the council are not advertised in the Journal.) But in effect it is a business formula. Clearly the A. M. A. is not merely a professional organization. It is also a medical-advertising business, with Dr. Fishbein as its efficient and dynamic chief executive.

Many if not most of the manufacturers of "ethical" proprietaries who advertise in the Journal at $340 a page are also manufacturers of patent medicines sold directly to the laity and occasionally confiscated by the Food and Drug Administration. Hence I may be permitted to point out, not as a layman but as an expert, that Dr. Fishbein's business is directly allied with and dependent upon the big and notoriously iniquitous patent-medicine business which Dr. Fishbein so indefatigably denounces in print.

Does Dr. Fishbein understand this? As an advertising copy writer and general advertising and publicity handy man during the New Era and even before the war, I heard a great deal about Dr. Fishbein. Medical purists, including on one occasion the Cook County (Chicago) Medical Society, have rather frequently questioned Dr. Fishbein's competence and ethical sensitiveness as a popularizer of medical knowledge. But in the advertising business we always regarded him as a colleague; indeed, as an exceptionally smart and practical advertising man. One suspects that this largely explains his ability to defy criticism. As the chief executive of an important advertising medium, Dr. Fishbein is in a better position than any other single individual to shape the destinies of the A. M. A.

Yes, Dr. Fishbein is the boss. If anybody doubts it, I suggest that he invade, as I did, the stronghold of organized medicine on South Dearborn Street, Chicago. I saw Dr. Fishbein first—that appeared to be the routine. His geniality was undisturbed when I told him frankly that I was hammering him vigorously in forthcoming magazine articles. It had happened before, he murmured indifferently. And in a spirit of sweet helpfulness he loaned his copy of John L. Spivak's book about the "Medical Trust." Then Dr. Fishbein called in Dr. Paul Nicholas Leech, the secretary of the Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry, and instructed him what to give me. I suspect he forgot to instruct Dr. West, for the next day he prowled unhappily in the corridor while the somewhat discursive secretary and general manager of the A. M. A. told me, if not all, at least somewhat more, I am sure, than Dr. Fishbein would have liked.

Dr. Leech proved to be extremely helpful. He was able to prove what I already knew, that the Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry has a highly creditable record—within the limits of its assigned powers and functions. Thirty years ago when the council started its work, the medical periodicals of America, including the Journal of the American Medical Association with its then negligible circulation, were the accepted advertising media of the nostrum-makers; and the doctors, from the point of view of these racketeers, were merely useful stooges and procurers for the business of victimizing the public. In his book, "Forty Years as Advertising Agent," George P. Rowell describes how the makers of Fellow's Hypophosphites stopped all general advertising and pushed the sale of their product solely through the medical profession. The result was that in a single year an investment of $6,000 in the stock of this manufacturer yielded dividends amounting to $9,000. Said Printers' Ink at about this period:

The patent medicine of the future is the one that will be advertised only to doctors. Some of the most profitable remedies of the present time are of this class. . . . The general public never hears of them through the daily press. All their publicity is procured through the medical press, by means of the manufacturer's literature and through samples to doctors. For one physician capable of prescribing the precise medical agents needed by each individual patient there are at least five who prescribe these proprietaries.

The italics are my own. With certain qualifications that last sentence is as true today as when it was written. During the past thirty years, in considerable degree through the efforts of the A. M. A., the standards of training and the average competence of doctors have been greatly improved. Largely through the efforts of the council, the average quality and reliability of the "ethical" proprietaries offered to the doctor and through him to the public have been immensely stepped up. But a dubious and uncomfortable "community of interest" has been established. Paradoxically, the success of the council in regulating the "ethical-proprietary" business and in excluding worthless nostrums and unwarranted therapeutic claims both from the pages of the Journal and to a considerable degree from other medical publications has had the effect of stabilizing and intrenching the "legitimate" business of the big drug manufacturers. Unfortunately, many of these manufacturers make basic non-proprietary pharmaceuticals with one hand, "ethical" proprietaries with the other, and meanwhile stir up plain and fancy nostrums with their feet. They are big medical advertisers, and today as in the past they exploit the doctors as their stooges and salesmen.

A further result has been to plant the A. M. A. in the advertising business more firmly and much more profitably than in the days when the Journal, as well as most of the state and county medical publications, filled their pages with nostrum advertisements and their editorial columns with thinly disguised publicity "plants" for the same nostrums. Relatively, the ethical level of this profit-motivated system has been greatly raised, though it is by no means high enough from the point of view of either the public or the conscientious doctor. But the community of interest established between the A. M. A. as a publisher of advertising tends inevitably to color the policies of the A. M. A., particularly with respect to the social aspects of medicine.

In opposing group-practice and group-payment schemes the A. M. A. serves as loud speaker not merely for the rugged medical individualists, the little men of the medical business, but also for the drug houses and the manufacturers of medicinal foods. The latter are, of course, strenuously opposed to all such developments. Why? Because practically every group clinic promptly sets up a pharmacy which dispenses basic pharmaceuticals, instead of "ethical" proprietaries, with savings of around 500 per cent.

In justice to the Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry, it must be said that its members and its secretary appear to be acutely aware of this paradox. The council, composed of distinguished pharmacologists who serve wholly without compensation, would undoubtedly like to educate the doctors to prescribe non-proprietary pharmaceuticals which cost one-fifth as much as "ethical" proprietaries of identical composition. Among the posters sent out by the A. M. A. chemical laboratory is one which lists a dozen "ethical" proprietaries opposite the identical pharmaceutical substances, in parallel columns. The total wholesale price of the proprietaries was $31.65; that of the non-proprietary substances, $11.26. Significantly, when this list was brought up to date four years later, the cost of the proprietary name to the consumer has increased from $20.39 to $25.18.

The council has also published in the Journal and circulated reprints of excellent articles setting forth the economic advantages both to the hospital and to its patients of setting up adequately equipped and staffed pharmacies and obliging staff physicians and internes to prescribe the drugs listed in an established formulary. Dr. Ernest E. Irons, of Chicago, says:

The evils of proprietary prescribing arise not from the mere fact of the sale of a drug under a proprietary name but from the circumstances attendant on its distribution and its popularization under claims misleading alike to physician and to patient, which lead to its use in ways directly harmful to the user. The manufacturer who by real research discovers a new and efficient remedy is entitled to adequate commercial reward insured by the use of a proprietary name. . . . The council has rightly held, however, that the name should reflect the composition of the product and not the clinical use to which it is put. Besides the frequency with which proprietary remedies are advertised under unwarranted and misleading claims, other objections to their use are the added expense in their purchase, which is passed on to the ultimate consumer, the patient, and the tendency of their use to increase self-medication, a practice which leads often to serious harm to the patient.

There can be no question that the publications of the council have in general been of extraordinary value to both the physician and the public. However, one is obliged, somewhat sadly, to record the fact that the Journal does not always observe the implications of what its council preaches. The same issue in which the council exposed the exorbitant prices at which the "ethical" proprietaries are sold contained an advertisement of at least one of those very proprietaries.

A practical fellow, Dr. Fishbein. A while back, when some county medical societies threatened to take a flier of their own in advertising, he wrote:

The Journal of the American Medical Association feels that expenditures of funds of a county medical society for advertising announcements printed primarily to teach the facts of preventive medicine is not a proper expenditure for a medical organization. The question of the publishing of newspaper advertisements by county medical societies would appear not to be so much a question of medical ethics as one of common sense in the field of business. From this point of view, the burden is on the promoter to prove that the spending of money for such announcements provides an adequate return to the purchaser of the announcement.

I think it may be said that most conscientious advertising men, with the possible exception of space salesmen, would share Dr. Fishbein's point of view, and his opinion. Medical opinion is perhaps another matter.

Whose medicine is it? Should there be, can there be in the long run any selfish and invidious titles to the control and practice of an art and a science upon the free use of which the health and virility of our people depend? Medical science is a body of knowledge and skills derived not wholly, or even predominantly, from the research and practice of doctors as such but from every source of our industrial civilization. Chemistry, physics, biology, psychology, engineering—these and a dozen other departments have made major contributions to present-day medical knowledge and equipment. Moreover, the present resources of medical science have been made possible primarily by the investment of social capital—in universities, hospitals, research laboratories, financed both by the state and by private philanthropy. It is not capitalist individualism but capitalist collectivism that has delivered us from the terror of plagues, that has substituted knowledge for shamanism, the largely unpaid and unpayable devotion of the scientist for the venality of the quack. Medicine is partly socialized today. It cannot continue forever half free and half bound to the chariot of business.

[This is the third of a series of four articles by Mr. Rorty on medical politics. The fourth will appear shortly.]

Opening Gun at Homestead

BY HERMAN WOLF

Homestead, Pennsylvania, July 5

ON THE evening of July 6, 1892, Secretary Lovejoy of the Carnegie company said: "This outbreak settles one matter forever, and that is that the Homestead mill hereafter will be run non-union and the Carnegie company will never again recognize the Amalgamated Association nor any other labor organization."

On a late afternoon forty-four years later, Charles Scharbo, straight from his shift in the Carnegie mill, ended a historic meeting by reading the steel workers' new Declaration of Independence: "The lords of steel . . . have set up company unions. They have sent among us swarms of stoolpigeons. They have kept among us armies of company gunmen. Today we do solemnly declare our independence. We shall exercise our inalienable rights to organize into a great industrial union, banded together with all our fellow steel workers. In support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other our steadfast purpose as union men, our honor, and our very lives."

Slowly and without a word the audience formed into line and marched to the cemetery. On a hill-top from which one could see the smoke rising from the mill chimneys half a mile away, the steel workers swore anew their pledge to win that industrial freedom for which seven steel workers gave their lives at Homestead.

Highly skilled steel workers in the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers were the elite of the American labor movement in 1892, and Homestead was craft unionism's greatest defeat. On the ashes of that defeat John L. Lewis and his Committee for Industrial Organization hope to build a new industrial union.

There is a new, heavily-spiked steel fence around the Homestead mill. The workers claim the fence can be charged with electricity if a strike breaks. William S. Unger, assistant superintendent of the mill, which is a United States Steel subsidiary, vehemently denies this. Three times he carefully explained that the fence is "grounded and we couldn't charge it with electricity even if we wanted to." Mr. Unger denies everything. He denies that the plant uses company police. He denies that there were spotters at the rally held by the Steel Workers Organization Committee on July 5. Mr. Unger himself attended. He admitted that company foremen were there, too. So were 5,000 steel workers who stood for three hours under a broiling sun at the first labor rally Homestead has seen since 1892.

The most significant thing at the Homestead memorial meeting was the huge sign: "Join Now—One Union for All Workers!" As if to emphasize this point a cavalcade of thirty cars filled with white and Negro miners escorted Tom Kennedy, lieutenant governor of the state, to the meeting from Murrysaville, twenty miles away, and the miners' thirty-two-piece band from Morgan was there to show the steel workers the support on which they could count. Men of all ages and nationalities were at the meeting, many of them dressed in work clothes; though it was Sunday, they had just come from the mills.

Judging by the applause, the most important thing on the side of the C. I. O. is the abolition of Pennsylvania's hated Coal and Iron Police. According to Tom Kennedy, who besides being Lieutenant Governor, is also secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers, the state police won't be any help to the steel companies. "Governor Earle is head of the armed forces of this state and he's going to see that the workers are granted their constitutional rights," said Kennedy. He also promised the workers state relief funds if the steel magnates fired them for union activity.

I have spoken with Homestead workers in their homes and on the street. Within the last week they have all received company propaganda handed out in the mills. Some of the workers are opposed to the union. Others are eager for it "if it's the Lewis union." All agree on this point: The employee-representation plan is a subterfuge which nets them practically nothing. Before this drive is over, the employers will find that in these plans they have given the union just the nucleus it needed to get a wedge in the mills. In this area just south of Pittsburgh the union is making faster strides than it had expected because leaders elected under the employee plans are making real demands on their bosses. Two of the company-union representatives showed me their applications for the union the minute I approached them. I said, "That's fine, but how do you know who I am?" "We don't care," they replied like two happy school kids. "That was Unger you were talking to, wasn't it? Well, let him fire us. The union's here to stay this time."

Five billion dollars worth of steel is scared. For the first time the Iron and Steel Institute has issued a statement for the entire industry on a labor question, and its publicity department "mentioned" to reporters that there would be more advertisements to come and that they hoped their viewpoint would be "well taken care of." The C. I. O. reports that through the institute the companies have agreed that if any plant is struck, fellow employers will fill its orders at cost of production, thus allowing the struck company to keep its customers and make its usual profit.

The companies, in short, are preparing for a war, with no quarter given. But if the Homestead meeting is any sign, the workers, too, are ready for the battle, and will enter it with their heads up and their colors flying.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

JULY 4 was set aside by the Peoples' Committee Against Hearst of the American League Against War and Fascism as anti-Hearst day. I do not know how many people took part in the demonstration, but the committee worked hard to make a good showing. In one week at the end of June it held thirty neighborhood conferences, and 112 A. F. of L. unions have joined the trade-union committee against Hearst. When one thinks of the enormous influence exerted by the Hearst press, the readiness of advertisers to make use of it even when they are aware that the Hearst papers constitute the most dangerous anti-social force in the United States, it would seem like an almost hopeless undertaking to attempt to combat Public Enemy Number One. But that is not the case. The Hearst press is extremely vulnerable, and there is no doubt that the tools of Hearst who run his papers for him are worried by the rising tide of public hostility. Many of his newspapers are known to be losing money.

On the other hand, there is no doubt that Hearst is exercising a tremendous influence behind the scenes of the political stage. The Republican ticket is a Hearst ticket and must be so considered until both Landon and Knox disavow him and assure the American people that they are through with him, that they are not taking money from him for their campaign, and that he will have no influence whatever on their policies if they are elected. This they have not done. This alliance alone calls for the defeat of the Republican ticket. But the Democrats are not in too favorable a position to strike very hard along this line. It was the Hearst influence four years ago which gave the nomination to Franklin Roosevelt at the Chicago convention. Garner was Hearst's man, and it was a Hearst Senator, McAdoo of California, who, after the Roosevelt forces had agreed to the nomination of Garner for Vice-President, abandoned Al Smith and insured the choice of Roosevelt. I am reliably informed that Garner now curses Hearst loudly and emphatically, but the facts are as stated. Hence the attack upon Hearst in this campaign must come from other sources as well as from the Democratic Party.

As for Colonel Knox, some journalists have said to me that it is unfair to charge him now with being a Hearst man since it is years since he left Hearst's service of his own accord, under circumstances entirely creditable to him. At Philadelphia a writer whose opinion I trust told me of a conversation he had with Colonel Knox two weeks before his nomination, in the course of which Colonel Knox told my friend why he left Hearst. It was not one single thing, it appears, that caused the break, but an accumulation of events, the climax of which was an order from Hearst to break some business agreements that Knox had entered into. This Knox felt he could not honorably do, and so he resigned immediately, over the telephone in the presence of several outsiders. This is all very well, but it does not explain how Colonel Knox could originally bring himself to take service with such a base newspaper influence as William Randolph Hearst. I know very well the arguments that newspapermen in Hearst's service give you. They have to live; they have wives and children to feed; so many newspapers are disappearing that the field is narrowing and the choice of journalistic jobs likewise. When I remark that there are certain jobs that no honorable and self-respecting man should take, they say: "That is very easy for you to say, Mr. Villard, who have always had inherited wealth to render you free to do and say what you think best, but we've got to live and if we didn't take the jobs somebody else would, so what's the difference?" I am still unconvinced. No American loyal to our institutions and no journalist who cares anything about the honor and integrity of the profession can afford to take the money of this man Hearst.

As for Landon, his warm friend from boyhood days, William Allen White, did not hesitate to denounce him in unmitigated language for having even received Hearst at Topeka. Mr. White is not given to personal criticism of this type; in this respect he is something of a compromiser, or rather, he allows his rarely kind nature to temper his criticisms. But he could not stand for this act of Landon's and described it as first-class stupidity, betraying the provincial quality of Landon's political thinking. There followed the disgraceful episode in the California primaries, where there were two Landon tickets, one the Hearst-Landon aggregation, and the other the Chester Rowell-Landon ticket. There is no doubt that Landon told Rowell to go ahead before he yielded to Hearst and that he tried to ride both horses. It cost the Rowell group $75,000 to beat that Hearst ticket, but beat it they did. I am told that a lot of money came into the state of California from the East to help the Hearst ticket. Who put it up? Was it Hearst? And is Hearst going to be allowed to contribute large sums to the Republican campaign fund? Will Colonel Knox, who is said now to feel so strongly against Hearst, consent to this without protest? Even with the Chicago record behind them the Democrats ought to press these questions home and brand the Landon-Knox ticket by the Hearst name until those two men disavow him.

Meanwhile it is very gratifying that men and women in increasing numbers all over the country are joining the fight against Hearst—Hearst the friend of Hitler and of Mussolini, the fascist who is quite capable of doing his best to overthrow American institutions, if he thinks that thereby he can preserve for his children his enormous fortune, obtained by debasing the public taste and morals.

THUMBING the radio dials idly the other evening I happened to hear a familiar voice. It was that of Major Rupert Hughes who recently led a counter-revolution in California to preserve the independence of the creative artist. The Major, although wholly misinformed, charged gallantly against a goblin of his own conjuration. He seemed to see an all-embracing soviet which would include screen writers, dramatists, authors, and newspapermen.

The Major has engaged in all these activities, and he feared that under the pressure of proletarian propaganda he would be regimented and either forced to lose his artistic integrity or lapse into silence. Roy Howard, of the Scripps-Howard newspaper chain, leaped to his defense in the middle of the controversy, and together they managed for a time at least to stay the demons of conformity. The Screen Writers' Guild was badly wounded by the revolt within its ranks, and from the line of battle there sprang a nascent Rupert ready to speak his own piece upon any and all things without the slightest fear of any discipline as applied by his fellow-craftsmen. The fact that this danger was wholly in his own imagination did not alter the principle of the thing. Hughes had tossed the tea into the harbor. He was ready to sell his life for freedom of expression.

Naturally I listened with attention. In just which direction would this newly liberated spirit strike out? What old injustices would he attack? What new truths bring home to his vast invisible audience upon a national network? He spoke of Washington and love of country and Independence Day. His mood was highly patriotic. Among other things he mentioned the fact that Washington was a tobacco planter and that the early wealth of the country was largely dependent upon the success of this particular crop. And because of the connection between Washington, the Fourth of July, and tobacco the Major mentioned the fact that it was fitting that he should speak, rather roguishly to be sure, of the finest smoke of all—the Camel cigarette, which is made only from the purest selected leaves.

As the program developed I learned that Camels are "round and firm with no annoying particles to get in your mouth." Tony Manero, who recently won the open golf championship, could hardly have achieved this honor but for the fact that he smoked Camels constantly. They carried him "through every stage of tension and nervousness." Camels stimulate digestion. The Major was himself a little nervous, which may account for the fact that he finished with a flourish in which he announced that the lovely lady on the program would sing "Sampson's aria from 'Sampson and Delilah'." That was a detail. The Major will grow more accustomed to his spot as he gets used to his hard-won freedom. He will on subsequent evenings strut his artistic integrity with more confidence. Rupert Hughes wears no man's collar. His is a cigarette program. The Major is a creative artist who has come through. He is the master of ceremonies for the Camel Caravan.

Speaking of the intellectual side of radio, it has sometimes been said that whatever advantage the Republicans possessed through the 85 per cent support of the newspapers would be made up by the disposition of the radio in their favor. I imagine that the Democrats will certainly be able to get as much time in front of the microphone as their adversaries, but in some other respects the forces of Landon have a decided edge. The New Deal fares almost as badly at the hands of the radio commentators as it does with the newspaper columnists. At the moment Edwin C. Hill, Boake Carter, and Lowell Thomas are the top men of the networks. Mr. Hill is now on a sustaining program. His last sponsor was one of the oil companies, and his syndicated column is with the Hearst papers. In Philadelphia he did a piece for the New York Evening Journal in which he said that the Democrats were holding the most curious convention he had ever witnessed. Mr. Hill professed to find all the hotel lobbies crowded with professors. He saw, for the purposes of his article, hordes of men with horned-rimmed glasses ready to sovietize America.

Edwin C. Hill was one of the best reporters of his day, and the Democratic convention at Philadelphia was certainly curious. Nevertheless, professorial types were almost wholly absent. The throng did not assay one obvious intellectual to the gallon. It was as tough a bunch of delegates as I have ever seen. When any finely modeled brow bobbed up, it belonged to some newspaper reporter or radio commentator. The long-bow paragraph which I have mentioned is not intended as a gibbet on which to hang Hill as a partisan, but night after night his point of view is steadfast. He is frankly and candidly an utter conservative and bitterly against all aspects of the New Deal.

Boake Carter skips around a little more and sometimes changes sides, but he has been consistently anti-Roosevelt since the acceptance speech. Mr. Carter professed to find the President's words a call to an immediate class war, and he spoke gloomily of the situation in France and of America's rapid approach to a similar condition. The following evening Boake Carter was disposed to make a major political issue of the sudden revocation of the right to bring in $100 worth of liquor, duty free. He warned of the dire things which might happen to taxpayers under a highly centralized government.

Lowell Thomas avoids controversial subjects more than his two rival broadcasters, but the general drift of his comment is anti-New Deal. Whatever may happen as the campaign develops, the radio at the moment is by no means stacked in favor of the Administration. The reverse is true. Indeed, Franklin D. Roosevelt is the only eloquent New Deal commentator I have heard over the air in a month.

MAXIM GORKY: A CHALLENGE

BY ALEXANDER KAUN

TO THE end Maxim Gorky's life was a challenge to standards and conventions. His very death defied by decades the time limit set for him by the best lung specialists. He might have chosen for his life slogan the refrain of one of his stillborn youthful poems: "I have come into this world to disagree." From childhood to maturity his life presented a series of violent disagreements with established traditions of Russian smugness, be it wife-beating or worship of Czar and church and private property. Needless to say, society made him pay for his unseemly predilections. He tasted abundantly of blows and abuses, of hunger and cold, prison and exile, even to eviction by Pecksniffian hotel-keepers in the city of New York on his visit in 1906.

His initial and rapid success as a writer was primarily due to the challenging note of his tramps who lustily disrupted the twilight melancholy of Chekhov's whimperers. Gorky used the barefooted brigade as a megaphone for the denunciation of society's standpat philistinism and stagnant cowardice. He went farther. Through the mouth of the drunken outcast, Satin, he sang a hymn to man, the collective man. Here was a double challenge: to things as they are and to passive misanthropy. In his subsequent deviations and vacillations, multiple though they were, Gorky never swerved from the spirit of this early proclaimed code: hatred and contempt for social smugness, and faith in the potentialities of the organized will of collective humanity.

On its own merit Gorky's talent began to command respect only later, when purged of unevenness, gaudy exaggerations, and naive romanticism. "Childhood" marked the first of his well-rounded mature productions, revealing his unexcelled power as a recorder of the personally observed and experienced. Herein lay his strength and, obversely, his weakness. He floundered whenever he abandoned the empirical for the imaginary. "I know that I am a dray horse, not an Arabian steed," he admitted apropos of Leonid Andreyev's uncanny power of imagination and intuition. Gorky's robust challenge emanated precisely from his close contact with tangible realities. The life he knew, the life of the middle classes, of the lower and of the lowest, he knew as very few did, and he had no rivals in depicting that life quintessentially. His intelligentsia, on the other hand, are for the most part cardboard characters.

He once spoke to me of the three selves that struggled within him and often encroached on one another's domain: Alexey Peshkov, Maxim Gorky, and the Russian. Apparently it was the synthesis of the three—the man, the artist, and the citizen—that made the career of Gorky so eventfully rich. Yet one may assert without doubt that today the significance of Gorky for the Soviet Union and for the masses elsewhere lies in his life rather than in his art.

The sixty-eight years that he lived coincided with the struggle and ultimate triumph of the revolutionary movement. Rising from the lower depths to the peak of national acclaim, Gorky has been an eloquent demonstration of man's power to defy circumstances and environment. This is not the American story of a boy who has made good—by adjusting himself to the existing order of things. Gorky has continually challenged what appeared as society's fundamentals, and has persistently shaken the pillars of philistia, which seemed to stand firm and immovable. For him it meant more than revolutionary rhetoric to greet the pending storm in his "Song of the Stormy Petrel," to sing to the "Madness of the brave," to proclaim "the madness of the brave as the wisdom of life," and he lived to see the practical application of his hymn, "All for Man, All Through Man."

I plead guilty to having publicly regretted Gorky's return to Russia in 1928. For one thing, he wrote his best work while away from his turbulent home. Secondly, it could be foreseen that the multitude of public affairs would so engulf him as to undermine his precarious health and rob him of the leisure needed for creative work. Furthermore, Gorky had been a fighting non-conformist, and there was an incongruity in his role of acceptor and approver, which he could not help assuming once in the Soviet Union.

My fears were largely substantiated. The latter portion of his unfinished novel and the two plays of unfinished dramatic trilogy, written in the U. S. S. R., add little to Gorky's laurels. Gorky chided me for my "incurable skepticism" when I doubted his ability to attune himself to the new Russia so as to describe it adequately. Time and again he spoke of his passionate desire to write a "great novel" about life in Soviet Russia. This was not to be. As an author he remains the poet of the old Russia in whose burial he took such an effectual part.

It also came to pass that most of Gorky's time in the U. S. S. R. was taken up with sundry activities, from editing a number of not strictly literary reviews to addressing meetings and attending to a prodigious correspondence with his avid fellow-citizens. The greater part of his writing was of a polemical nature, directed against the enemies of the Soviets. The rebellious disagreeer had at last agreed, emphatically and vehemently.

Does it follow that Gorky's death was "timely"? The loss to literature may be questioned. There is no doubt, however, that in Gorky the man Soviet Russia has lost an irreplaceable asset. With all his conformity and enthusiastic loyalty, he time and again challenged Bolshevik bigotry and intolerance. His position as the nation's idol invested him with extraordinary authority and unique temerity. He alone dared oppose consistently the powerful Napostovtsy and their heresy-hunting activity. His was the only voice of protest against the cavalier treatment of Boris Pilnyak at the hands of Bolshevik Savonarolas. He publicly discounted the ballyhoo about proletarian art and literature and declared his indifference to whether he was considered "a proletarian or non-proletarian writer." Gorky not only performed the salutary function of a daring dissenter and critic of unsavory phenomena; he exerted enough influence to have matters changed. It is an open secret that Gorky was chiefly responsible for the dissolution of the Rapp, the fanatical association of proletarian writers. Soviet writers have regarded that event, in April, 1932, as the emancipation of literature from party bureaucracy and petty politics. One may also recall a number of cases in which Gorky successfully defended individual victims of the powers that be. Thus he championed Isaac Babel and his "Red Cavalry" against the onslaughts of General Budenny. More recently he squelched the over-zealous guardians of proletarian purity who took exception to the literary views of Dmitri Mirsky on account of his princely rank. Gorky did not unlearn to disagree. His voice was destined to sound a fearless challenge under a dictatorship or a democracy. His death is a grievous loss.

BOOKS

Huxley Agonistes

EYELESS IN GAZA. By Aldous Huxley. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

SOMEWHERE in this novel the hero quotes the closing lines of the most magnificent of Gerard Hopkins's sonnets-written-in-blood; and the thought occurs that with this book Aldous Huxley proves that his whole career has been moving toward a rediscovery of the truth, restated in the same sonnet, that "selfyeast of spirit a dull dough sours." At least it will seem true if we take the liberty of identifying an author with his hero, which is here somewhat more justifiable than usual in view of the fact that the hero is a prosperous sociologist, renowned for his ironic detachment and given to a kind of finicking distaste for any form of experience that is too unpleasantly concrete. Anthony Beavis is the Huxley hero, the one and only Huxley hero, aged forty-three, and finally confronted with the ancient problem of salvation for himself and the world. He is a projection, that is to say, of everything that his creator has thought, felt, and read in the seven years since his last novel (one may ignore the unhappy interruption of the fantasy that appeared in 1932). And to say that he represents a distinct enlargement in every sense over his earlier self is one way of indicating the considerable advance that this book marks in Huxley's development as a novelist. Whatever else remains to be said about it, "Eyeless in Gaza" is the deepest, the most serious, and the most complete novel of his career.

After the erudite snickerings and Rabelaisian guffaws, after the admirable collection of protozoic analogies, after the tired fornications in Mayfair boudoirs, the Huxley hero has become a stern but ardent moralist. Just before this transformation, it is true, he has begun to have doubts about the existence even of his own personality; he has apparently been reading Proust; and there are several pages of denatured metaphysics for the readers of the lending libraries. But all such doubts are dissolved in the warm light of his recognition that he can no longer live irresponsibly, that he has "duties toward himself and others and the nature of things." For twenty years he had thought all this nonsense—"nonsense, in spite of occasional uncomfortable intimations that there might be a point, and that the point was precisely in what he had chosen to regard as the pointlessness, the practical joke." His shock is the result partly of the lesson of experience, partly of his meditations on society and its institutions, and partly of his friendship with a certain Dr. Miller. Or it may be said that the doctrines of this spiritual reformer provide an interpretation, as well as a direction, for a life that would otherwise be without significance. Life and its interpretation are therefore presented simultaneously, so to speak, out of what may be called the drowning man's point of view in fiction.

This method, reminiscent both of the Jamesian "process of vision" and the movie flash-back, involves a discarding of the normal time order of narrative for the more or less fortuitous order of the memory. For Huxley, translating the lesson of experience, such a method has the advantage of dispensing no more of the lesson than the reader's preference for experience enables him to take, like a physician administering an otherwise too saccharine fluid drop by drop over a period of time. Moreover, it has the advantage of distributing more equally the disquisitions that are the fruit of the hero's recent readings in biology, chemistry, sociology, and anthropology. But it may be questioned whether this wilful playing with the normal time sense is not really evidence of a last infirmity in a writer headed toward nobility. The substance of the experience, as a matter of fact, is reducible to a single situation. It is that complication in his youth which caused Anthony Beavis to betray the feelings of his best friend's fiancée in order to win an idle bet from his mistress. As a revelation of the "piddling, twopenny, halfpenny personality" of the modern man it is a situation admirably suited to Huxley's general theme. The remorse suffered by the hero is an adequate psychological explanation for his over-eager surrender to the persuasive Dr. Miller, uttering from a mule-back in Mexico the immemorial formula of the Buddhist redemption, "love and compassion."

To summarize the stages of speculative reasoning by which Anthony arrives at the same formula would be to give more order to his thought than Huxley himself has troubled to give it. We know that he is opposed to both fascism and communism because each sacrifices the means to the end. Revolution always fails of its aims because it operates from the wrong motives and puts the wrong people in power. It merely creates new institutions to enslave the individual and set him against his fellow-men. Politically, therefore, Anthony—or Huxley—is an anarchist, unless the pacifism that we leave him practicing as well as preaching at the end can be considered a system. But "Millerism" is perhaps more strictly a spiritual and psychological discipline, like Yoga or Christian Science. There is much talk of "the proper use of the self," and also a serious defense of vegetarianism. Anthony's final meditations, to tell the real truth, read like the lucubrations of a Bloomsbury intellectual sunk irrevocably into the downy folds of the Buddhist heaven. Not the high strength of the Miltonic Samson struggling with real good and real evil, within and without, but Annie Besant and the "peace beyond peace." It is perhaps the last irony of this novel that it will be most appreciated by the Stigginses and the Burlaps, by those accustomed to commit the greatest enormities in the name of love, by the sort of people that Huxley has grown famous in satirizing.

The report that Huxley has turned sentimentalist will probably be little credible to many people. Sentimentalism implies lack of intelligence, and surely Huxley is among the most intelligent of living writers. Yet the contradiction may be somewhat diminished if it is admitted that the professional homo sapiens, "the chimpanzee on the upper side of humanity," is more likely to be thrown off his base than the so-called average man. Between his brittle intelligence and his sense of experience, between his intellect and his sensibility, there has always been in Huxley a breach which has prevented him from being a great imaginative writer. Confronted in mid-career with the reality of certain values to which he had hitherto paid little attention, his intelligence gives the reins to his sensibility with an abandonment that will shock some very much less "intelligent" individuals. For while a sense of the reality of human life does not make for any less love, it does render impossible a bubbling romantic belief in the kind of disembodied human goodness and justice in which Huxley finally puts his faith. It makes impossible any program for men or societies that is not based on some objective system of organization and control. But there is a sense in which Huxley, without undergoing a profound reorientation of mind and temperament, could have arrived at no other solution to his problem. From thinking too little of humanity the romantic ironist has ended by thinking too much: the wheel has come full circle back to Rousseau.

Scapegoats and Smoke Screens

THE JEWS OF GERMANY. A STORY OF SIXTEEN CENTURIES. By Marvin Lowenthal. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

IT IS well that the tragic story of the Jews of Germany has been told by one who is more a chronicler than a historian. Not that Mr. Lowenthal's facts are unreliable or his marshaling of them unscientific; names, dates, indices, bibliographies, organization—all the skeletal virtues are present. The dead bones live, however, because the author clothes them with the flesh and blood of a catholic and humane understanding, because he breathes into them a deep yet not uncritical love for his own people.

An academician might have feared to devote more than a fourth of a book covering sixteen centuries to a period of less than twenty years. Yet Mr. Lowenthal has not only stressed the Nazification of Germany and its orgy of Jew-baiting quantitatively. He has projected the entire history of German Jewry in relation to its three long and anguished years under the Third Reich. To do otherwise, given the compulsive significance of the present catastrophe, would mean making a catalogue, not writing history.

No distortion, even of emphasis, is required to show that the real record of Germany's Jews has been the record of German anti-Semitism; that that anti-Semitism has been constant in duration, cyclic in intensity, cumulative in effect; that its frenzied culmination under the Swastika is not a break with tradition but a link in it. Thus on page 3 the author records that the earliest documents proving the presence of Jews on the Rhine are a number of terra cotta bottle stoppers dug from the Roman ruins of Trèves, topped with sculptured manikins caricaturing Jewish features and satirizing Jewish ceremonials. A third-century adumbration, doubtless, of Streicher's Stürmer! And on page 331 he concludes:

Our readers will, at this late chapter, need no explanation of why the German faith selected the Jew for the object of its hate. He had been traditionally that object. When the Germans were Christians, he had been the killer of Christ. When the Mongols had threatened invasion, he had been the traitor. When princes and bishops robbed the masses, he had been the exploiter. When murders had remained unsolved, he had been the criminal. When pestilence had stricken the land, he had poisoned the wells. When the French Revolution overwhelmed the German states, he had created the revolution. When the stock market broke, it was he who invented capitalism. When the Germans lost the World War, it was the Jew who had "stabbed them in the back." When the masses arose, it was he who devised Bolshevism. The only point to be emphasized is that each old accusation strengthened the new and became an element of it. The tradition grew by accretion: each generation added a coat of paint and with each coat the Jew grew blacker.

More important than this recognition of the continuity of German anti-Semitism is Mr. Lowenthal's explanation of why the German Jew has been made the scapegoat. Repeatedly, though at times with insufficient explicitness, he shows the reason to be basically economic. Behind the Crusader's sword, the Reformation's proscriptions, the guilds' exclusions, the professors' racial theories lurked the same fact which explains so much of Nazi "Aryanism": the Jews—always a recognizable minority—serve as victims to fill the coffers or increase the corporate wealth of their persecutors, and as lightning rods to divert the unrest of the exploited masses. Mr. Lowenthal sums it up thus:

When times were good or promising, even competitors were acceptable and orthodox, for they added to the breadth and profits of the market. But when times were bad, woe unto the competitor, workman, and consumer who could be damned as a foreigner or unbeliever! No less than in the Middle Ages they stood at the mercy of bookkeeping. When the ledgers showed red, the outlook for minorities was black.

While Mr. Lowenthal applies, even when he does not acknowledge, the Marxist analysis of anti-Semitism, his closing chapters fall short in stating the wider implications of German Jewry's fate. These transcend his eloquent denunciation of bigotry, his demand for tolerance. They transcend even his statement that "Jewish liberties are bound up with general liberties and . . . the cause of all oppressed or threatened minorities is the Jewish cause." The vital, the primary implication—not for the Jews of Germany alone, or even for other racial and national minorities but for majorities everywhere—is the smoke-screen character of anti-Semitism. Though the barrage is directed at minorities, majorities today face enslavement under senescent capitalism and crescent fascism. And it is only as these majorities can be made to see the danger to themselves in Jew-baiting or its equivalent in other racial terms that they will end it. This truth—not to be whispered in dulcet tones or penned in subordinate clauses, but sounded in a clear call to united action—alone can salvage German Jewry, redeem the enslaved Third Reich, secure human freedom everywhere.

The recognition of this truth marches on. It underlies popular fronts in Spain and France, increasing unity among the left parties in the semi-fascist countries of Eastern Europe, rising awareness on the part of the American people of the fascist menace here, the section of the new Soviet constitution which confirms the Soviet conception of anti-Semitism as a crime against the state. Even in Nazi Germany it is gaining ground. A recent cartoon in the "illegal" press, which is passed from hand to hand, shows two German workers reading an official document. "I see," remarks one, "that a new Judenhetz [anti-Jewish drive] starts on Monday morning." "Well," answers the other, "that means another wage cut on Saturday night!" When enough Germans read it and get its point, the ghastly joke will end.

Slocombe's Menagerie

THE TUMULT AND THE SHOUTING. THE MEMOIRS OF GEORGE SLOCOMBE. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

IN THESE recollections the well-known English journalist gives a vivid picture of the European post-war political scene in terms of colorful characters. Before the war Slocombe was a radical poet. He became a staff member of the Daily Herald, the newly founded and struggling newspaper of the Labor Party, and settled down after the war as its foreign correspondent in Paris. In this capacity he was an observer at almost all the hopeless conferences directed toward the division of spoils which did not exist and the preservation of a peace which had not been achieved. He interviewed all the important statesmen. He was and still is an associate and friend of an international group of artists, real ones and fakers, male and female, and of many plain fools without profession but having their function as symptoms of society's ills. In the 427 pages of his book 724 people are mentioned, sketched, or fully drawn, impartially and objectively, with keen observation, the understanding of a liberal mind, and the hidden skeptical affection of an animal-lover. "It takes all kinds of people to make a menagerie," Lenin once said of an eccentric French Communist. Slocombe might have called his book "My Menagerie."

The emphasis of this "story of one person's relationship to living history" is on character, scenery, and atmosphere rather than on the issues involved. But the reader who is familiar with these issues will get even greater pleasure from the book than the anecdote hunter, though he will also be satisfied. The inside story is given of many incidents startling in their day. We see a clever and progressive and thoughtful journalist using his wide acquaintance to bring adversaries together, to smooth the path of political action. We have the remarkable story of how the first meeting of Litvinov and Chamberlain was arranged; of how the interviewer bargained with Gandhi in his prison cell. Here are chapters bursting with actuality—a visit to Spain, the dinner party with which the author celebrated the first British Labor government, an interview with Hitler.

After his interview with Hitler in 1931 Slocombe met in France, at the house of the American painter Gilbert White, a picturesque Beethoven-playing German who had himself been an intimate of the Nazi leader but was then discouraged over Nazi prospects. He deprecated Slocombe's fear that Hitler might succeed. "Adolf is lazy. He never reads a book, never listens to anybody. He will not work out a program. He knows nothing of foreign politics and is not interested in them. There is nothing to be done with him. He is a visionary." The man who spoke so disrespectfully was our Harvard graduate Hanfstaengl. Two years later the lazy Adolf was his god.

I read the book at one sitting, always interested, often touched, twice excited. At the end came the reflection that the correspondent of the great press is almost tragically bound to become a homogeneous part of the crazy world he describes. Slocombe even proudly reprints in facsimile a letter from the British delegation at the Hague conference of 1929, in which Snowden, Henderson, and Graham express their unqualified admiration for his work and state that in his articles in the Daily Herald he has given them great assistance in matters of political and financial import. The object of the British at this Hague conference was to get a larger percentage of the German reparations instalments. The Labor Chancellor of the Exchequer put up a twenty-four-day fight and obtained 80 per cent of his maximum demands—a sum which amounted to exactly nothing because within a year the reparations payments were canceled, completely and forever. During the dragging weeks of the conference the ailing Stresemann received his death blow, and with him the government of the last Social Democratic chancellor in Berlin. This conference will remain a classic illustration of diplomatic stupidity. Yet according to Slocombe it "will be remembered in history as the British Labor Party's first and greatest experiment in international diplomacy." And the petty-bourgeois countryman of Viscount Snowden also "rightly felt," that it was, "in the words of Southey's poem, 'a famous victory.'"

Even so, the laborite imperialist George Slocombe writes a beautiful English.

FRANZ HÖLLERING

An Antique Genre

WATERLOO. By Manuel Komroff. Coward-McCann, $2.50.

THE key scene of this novel of the Hundred Days is played between a little English soldier of fourteen and a little French soldier of the same age. At the height of the carnage of Waterloo, these infant enemies, both wounded, meet and together sail a toy boat in a ditch full of blood-stained water. The appurtenances are horrible; yet the scene is charming, even gay. To turn the fearful into the picturesque, to use horror as a backdrop for charm, this is Mr. Komroff's method. The fact that the backdrop is realistically painted, that battle, murder, and sudden death are unsparingly depicted, renders the simple, whimsical, comical action, played downstage center, all the more affecting. Mr. Komroff is an accomplished tear-jerker. His "Waterloo" is a good example of what nineteenth-century Frenchmen called "la comédie larmoyante."

The appearances of Mr. Komroff's book are sometimes a little deceptive. His clinical thoroughness in the description of wounds and of slaughter makes one occasionally wonder whether one is, after all, going to enjoy this novel. Yet one is reassured in good season. Only one of the characters whom one meets intimately dies an untimely death on the field of battle; and he is old, unimportant, and soon forgotten. The rest return to their homes to enjoy health, prosperity, and satisfactory sex relations. Mr. Komroff's technique is almost impeccable. It is true that his style is a little exclamatory, that his use of retrospective irony is reiterative and often obvious, that his dramatic soliloquies are definitely rusty. Still, it must be acknowledged in exculpation that, whatever its modern trappings, "Waterloo" belongs to an antique genre, and that what to modern taste seem the faults of the novel are the traditional embellishments of that genre.

Whether Mr. Komroff's skilful treatment is altogether appropriate to his historical subject is another question. There may be some doubt whether in the sentimental novel Mr. Komroff found the sturdiest, most suitable vehicle to carry the events of 1815. It is possible that, since Napoleon, Talleyrand, Ney, Fouché, Wellington are inescapably in the story, a shrewd scrutiny of their characters and motives might have been more interesting than a close-up of a nice English couple. Again, a student of military tactics or a retired colonel might conceivably believe Mr. Komroff's colorful account of the maneuvers around Waterloo to be oversimplified and inadequate. There are doubtless political historians who would consider Mr. Komroff's version of the welcome of the returning Emperor ornamental but obtuse. There are perhaps even persons, non-specialists in the Napoleonic era, who would rather hear the whole, hard, unpicturesque truth about the bloody collapse of a bloody dictatorship than smile through their tears over the battlefield of Waterloo; but then there is of course no accounting for tastes.

The Perfect Press Agent

THIS WAY TO THE BIG SHOW. THE LIFE OF DEXTER FELLOWS. By Dexter W. Fellows and Andrew A. Freeman. The Viking Press. $3.50.

I NEVER supposed I would find myself reading the autobiography of a press agent. Members of that profession are rightly suspect, even when they manage to avoid being tiresome. But it is obviously a very different case with Dexter Fellows, who so far as I am concerned, now that I have read his book, will always be the perfect publicity man, and indeed the only one who bears thinking about. He bears thinking about a great deal, as any genius does, or as any man does whose life and work are one and whose career in consequence is completely and pleasantly successful.

Dexter Fellows is he who comes to town in advance of Ringling Brothers and Barnum and Bailey Combined Shows and sees to it that the newspapers fill up in due time with stories of what will follow. Not that he writes the stories himself. He is so little a writer that he had to have Mr. Freeman in to do this book for him, just as he always has had newspapermen scribbling their heads off in his cause, or rather in the cause of his circus, though the two things strictly are one. No, the stories simply get written as the result of his presence, which in its noiseless way must be one of the most charming on record. He says he doesn't even have to say much to his friends the newspapermen. He drops in with a cigar in his mouth and his hat on the back of his head, and somehow the most wonderful columns appear next day—columns with words in them he never saw before, and with ideas he would give his soul to have fathered. The thing is for the most part mysterious, no doubt, yet three explanations of his success will occur to any reader of his book. The first is that he likes the newspapermen; he seems to know thousands of them, he mentions hundreds of them, and at least fifty of them must be genuinely his best friends. The second is that the newspapermen like him because of a trick he has of starting their imaginations off. It has been said of Coleridge that he was a man in whose presence it was impossible to be ordinary. In Mr. Fellows's presence it is evidently impossible to think flat thoughts.

The third reason is that Mr. Fellows believes in and loves the circus—loves any show with which he may be connected, not merely because he is connected with it but because it is plainly more important and beautiful to him than anything else. He assumes its greatness, and leaves superlatives to others. Tody Hamilton, the ancestor of all adjective abusers, said to him once: "Suppose a grocer should advertise fine, fresh codfish and his rival across the street advertised the largest, sweetest, absolutely the best codfish ever caught, with scales as large as quarters and meat whiter than snow—the finest yielded by the Atlantic Ocean. Which grocer do you think would sell the most codfish?" Mr. Fellows knows of course that the second grocer would prevail, but he is not a grocer. He is the lover of a certain art, concerning which he has amassed so much natural and fascinating knowledge that he needs to do no more than mention what is in his mind about it at the moment; then even the wariest editors ask him to sit down, and somewhere over a partition typewriters begin clicking.

In the old days when he represented Pawnee Bill and Buffalo Bill his job was chiefly to keep stories out of the papers—stories of "clems," or fights between the crew and the rubes, and stories perhaps of those thieving camp-followers who go by the interesting name of "grifters." Now that popular prejudice against the circus has died out he has another job. But his behavior must have changed very little; he still talks and is still believed. A reader of this book will hear Mr. Fellows talking to him; telling him of Buffalo Bill and Major Burke, of Annie Oakley and Johnny Baker, of the high day in London when the kings of Belgium, Denmark, Saxony, and Greece rode in the Deadwood coach with the Prince of Wales; of the tricks by which the grifters once robbed the rubes; of the temperature at the top of the big tent on July days when the audience wonders why the aerialists keep wiping their wrists with handkerchiefs; of the constantly open wound around Lillian Leitzel's right wrist; of the sleeping apartments on circus trains; of clowns, of daredevils, of elephants, of seals, of gorillas, of human freaks. Of course they aren't called freaks any more in these gentler days; they are queer people, strange people, human oddities, or (in their own language) artists. But no matter, they are part of Mr. Fellows's world about which we like to hear him talk. Mr. Freeman may be chiefly responsible for the following paragraph, since he is a writer and Mr. Fellows isn't; yet I think I can hear the older voice behind it. "A freak seldom seen these days is an ossified man. I recall two of them, Jonathan R. Bass and William T. Sapp. Bass began to turn to bone toward middle age, and the process of ossification proceeded so far that in the course of a few years he was practically solid from head to foot. When he was shown around in 1890, he was powerless to make a motion and appeared to be cast in one piece. He seemed well informed, was fond of conversation, and was an atheist."

RAIN ON THE JUST. By Kathleen Morehouse. Lee Furman. $2.50.

The crop of novels about mountain whites has this year been unusually large. Mrs. Morehouse's book is distinguished from many of the others by the sincerity and warmth with which she draws her characters, by their quaint, antiquarian speech, the cumulative effect of which is decidedly pleasant, and by an evident passion for the Blue Ridge itself. Despite a sentence on the book jacket which proclaims, "There is none of the lowland sordidness of the Jeeter family in Mrs. Morehouse's book," this is no pretty little idyl of mountain life. There is one patricide, any number of young ones got out of wedlock, a rousing earthy lady who drinks "corn" and entertains her neighbors (male), and a grave robbery. A little sister is the heroine, and in her are exemplified the virtues of industry, maternal affection toward her smaller brothers, and a kind of fierce chastity which protects her from a lecherous stepfather, although she, too, bears her child before she is a wife. Mrs. Morehouse is no second Caldwell, nor is "Rain on the Just" another "Tobacco Road" with virtue added. But it is a pleasant, human book none the less, well worth reading.

HUMOR OF THE OLD DEEP SOUTH. Edited by Arthur Palmer Hudson. The Macmillan Company. $5.

By the old Deep South Mr. Hudson means chiefly Mississippi (but also portions of Louisiana and Alabama) during three decades or so before the Civil War. The region became articulate then with a great rush and roar of wit, most of which was temporary but some of which has survived—though the essence of it all survives, according to Mr. Hudson, in common conversation today. The war put an end to it as a literary affair, so that Mr. Hudson's anthology of its best efforts amounts to a collection of antiques. His search has been thorough, and his representation of a culture is within the inevitable limits complete. His selections, however, are frequently too brief to have much meaning; and he has for some strange reason tried to dispense with the services of an index.

MARK VAN DOREN

GIVE US THIS DAY. By Louis Zara. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Like most writers with a sentimental core, Louis Zara remembers with greater skill than he observes. The earlier portions of this novel, showing the maturing Charles in silhouette against the poignant background of his immigrant Catholic family, are convincing, even if sentimentalized; and though the sexual crises seem to smack too much of Dreiser, Charles's fearful marriage to the girl upstairs seems genuine enough. Of course, foxy Grandmother Lucie, banal Alderman Brabett, and Wulf Knudsen, the oafish apprentice-partner, are all mere props straight out of Dickens. But above and despite them, Charles and his father, Thomas, stand out in acutely human form. If only Zara's artistry had adequately disciplined his sympathies, "Give Us This Day" would certainly call for more than passing praise. As it is, however, Zara tacks his social consciousness on to the body of his narrative apparently as an afterthought; one is consequently left unmoved by focal incidents such as Charles's days on home relief, his unwitting scabbing and beating therefor, his doughnut-selling venture, his wife's death from exposure, topped finally by his unsuccessful community bakery and his own death. Nevertheless, with this novel Zara's apprentice days are seemingly over. He should now have done with such technical exercises, dam up his sensibility, point his perceptions, and start cautiously on a novel befitting his indicated talent.

LEIGH WHITE

BEYOND SING THE WOODS. By Trygve Gulbrandsen. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

A stilted story of stereotyped passions, in which the Scandinavian tradition suffers a severe hardening of the arteries, "Beyond Sing the Woods" might well have been written in the period with which it is concerned—the fifty years which antedate the French Revolution. The author, Trygve Gulbrandsen, one of the heads of his country's largest tobacco factory and an ardent advocate of sports education, has been content to let a complicated and conventional plot of inherited hates and ultimate repentance control his characters rather than, in the best tradition of Scandinavian storytelling, to permit his people to rule their destinies. The story of how the elder son of Bjorndal avenges his dead is too familiar to carry conviction, as is also the collection of Norwegian forest folk who appear desultorily in these pages. We have, for example, the ancient peasant who speaks in epigrams and without whose supervision the Yule-tide ale must sour and the candles sputter out; the haughty beauty upon whose disdainful lip the proud elder son cuts a kiss which never heals; the bear-baiting, woman-shy hero who requires a third party to wrest the affirmative answer from his beloved. It is the more regrettable that Mr. Gulbrandsen should avail himself of such formulas since in the matter of identifying types he is by no means without philosophical insight. "Beyond Sing the Woods" has received exceptionally unkind handling in the inept translation of Naomi Walford, but it is unlikely that the original Norwegian, however vigorous, could have pumped much blood into Mr. Gulbrandsen's puppets.

REPUBLICAN SOCIAL SECURITY

Dear Sirs: I was very surprised to see your statement, in the issue of June 24, that the Republican social-security plank is "in advance of the Democratic Party in insisting that the revenues for social insurance should be derived from general taxation." You very properly add "although its qualifying phrase 'a direct tax widely distributed' sounds suspiciously like advocacy of a sales tax," but you fail to point out that the Republican program does not provide for social insurance at all as the phrase is generally understood.

Careful study of the Republican plank reveals that it is far less generous than the provisions of the Social Security Act, for it nowhere suggests giving aged people security as a right. Instead, there is to be a system of state-operated old-age pensions payable to people in need. Such a system already finds a place in the Social Security Act, where it exists, however, as a complementary scheme to the contributory plan. But whereas the pensions program in the act is to be financed out of general taxation (raised half by the federal government and half by the states) the Republicans would provide the funds for this less favorable type of security out of "the proceeds of a direct tax widely distributed." This may, as you point out, mean a sales tax, but it may also mean an income tax reaching down to the lowest income brackets, that is, a wage tax. Under the Social Security Act, however unsatisfactory may be the taxes which it levies on wages, those workers who pay at least get something in return. They obtain the right to old-age annuities with no questions asked about need and no necessity to take the pauper oath. Under the Republican plan they will pay taxes, and not only will they obtain no security as a right, but those people who live in states that pass no old-age pension laws will obtain no security at all even though they have paid a federal direct tax to finance old-age security.

The dual old-age security program in the present act is admittedly unsatisfactory in many respects. The Republicans offer in its place a single program which ingeniously combines some of the worst features of the present contributory and non-contributory schemes. Under it, workers could at best hope for the old-age pensions provided under the Social Security Act. And whereas under the present arrangement these pensions are financed out of general taxation, the Republicans, by a direct tax, would compel even the smallest income receiver to pay his share of this meager security.

EVELINE M. BURNS

North Sanbornton, N. H., June 25

[We find ourselves in complete agreement with Miss Burns's analysis of the Republican social-security plank. Our editorial did not contrast the illiberal Republican plank with the Social Security Act but with the party's complete silence on the subject in 1932. The fact that the Republicans happened to be sound, in principle, on one feature of social security is worthy of comment largely because of the reactionary nature of the platform as a whole.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

FOR THE INDEPENDENCE OF WRITERS

Dear Sirs: When Rupert Hughes wrote to The Nation in defense of his recent effort to break up the Screen Writers' Guild, he touched on many matters hardly worthy of comment, but his error in attributing to organized newspaper men and women a desire to hamper the fullest and freest expression should not be permitted to pass without denial.

Mr. Hughes wrote that he had staged his "personal revolt" when he detected that there was contemplated an "amalgamation of all guilds under a gigantic plan to organize and combine all writers in every field into one vast closed shop." And a little later he said that "if that amalgamation had succeeded and I had offended the ruling writers, I could have been debarred from shooting off steam not only in the movies, but in the magazines, newspapers, pamphlets, books, plays, the radio, television, everywhere. That was the grand plan." This is utterly untrue. An amalgamation of all guilds of persons in the writing field would have to embrace the Newspaper Guild. The guild's constitution provides that "no person shall be barred from membership, suspended, fined, expelled, or discriminated against by reason of sex, race, or religious or political convictions or because of anything he writes for publication."

In seeking closer cooperation with the Authors' League, the guild is interested in precisely the opposite objective to that charged by Mr. Hughes. It is desirous of assuring a greater freedom of expression. The guild has no desire to discipline the writers who make up its ranks or to interfere with their freedom of expression. It has never expressed any wish to exercise such discipline, and has not pursued a course leading in such a direction. It is not seeking a closed shop but a preferential shop. This is vastly different and leaves open the door to all who have a wish and a will to express themselves.

Mr. Hughes's insulting references to Heywood Broun will not mislead the newspapermen who know him and have a true estimate of his services; but on the chance that one reader of The Nation may have been misled, let me say that the members of the Newspaper Guild regard Mr. Broun as the most indefatigable worker in this country today in behalf of the development of an organization that will assure the independence of writers.

A PROBLEM IN PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION

Dear Sirs: In your issue of June 24 there appeared a letter to the editors from Augusta Alpert, director of a private school now being formed. Your correspondent advocated that progressive private schools should encourage classes of twenty-five and thirty students instead of smaller groups, not primarily as a measure of economy but in order to prepare the child for the social scene outside.

I agree that classes of twenty-five or thirty are to be preferred to the usual public-school enrolment of forty to forty-five. But are they to be preferred to classes of fifteen or eighteen? Although classes of twenty-five or thirty may not do a great deal of harm to pupils in the fifth grade and higher, nevertheless the children in kindergarten and the lower primary grades are fortunate if they can receive more individual attention. These small children, stepping over the threshold of the highly individualized home life, need to be inducted gently, not en-

A GOLDEN TREASURY OF THE WORLD'S WIT AND WISDOM

Edited by NORMAN LOCKRIDGE

The London Times: "If all the world's books were suddenly destroyed, and this book alone escaped, mankind would still be rich in literature."

The N. Y. Times: "To turn the leaves of this sturdy volume is to be moved with admiration . . . and warmed by gratitude that it has made so easily accessible such a treasury of wit and wisdom."

James Branch Cabell: "You have made, to my finding, a fine book in which the wit of mankind at large is shown at its very best, in, as it were, the double rôle of a scalpel and a sky-rocket. To say that I have tremendously enjoyed this book, is to understate matters."

CONTAINS, COMPLETE, 10 OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS OF WISDOM UNOBTAINABLE AT ANY PRICE

John Cournos: "The book is a joy."

Carl Van Doren: "Impressive and satisfying."

John Erskine: "An extraordinary amount of wisdom. The book will delight all thoughtful people—and it ought to make any reader thoughtful."

Morris Ernst: "A few more volumes like this and the preparation of briefs will become a really simple matter."

Theodore Hall: "I know my desert island book now; one could take this volume to Bouvet Island or Indefatigable, and still have the whole range of humanity with him."

masse, into the complexities of social living. Their physical requirements alone make the care of large numbers difficult. They must learn how to dress, how to handle paints, hammers, saws, even how to eat without adult help. They should be given every opportunity to converse. It is obvious that these skills and habits can be acquired better and more quickly in a group of twelve or fifteen than in a group of twenty-five or thirty.

In the first grade when, in many schools, children begin to read, groupings of twenty-five or thirty work hardships on teachers and pupils alike. The individual differences are great, and the teacher often needs assistance. The same thing holds true in the grades where the beginnings of arithmetic or penmanship are taught. And can you visualize the chaos which would result in a modern school shop or art room if twenty-five or thirty pupils were working at one time on individual projects? Such a large grouping is possible only if all pupils are painting a daffodil or cutting out a Christmas tree. But that is not progressive education.

In a few progressive schools where there are large kindergarten and primary classes the children are subdivided into smaller groups under highly trained assistants. Other schools use the services of practice teachers from teacher-training schools, or of apprentices, and sometimes of volunteer lay workers. Thus such large classes are virtually aggregates of small units.

Finally, with reference to the statement concerning the preparation of the child "for the social scene outside," I would merely ask this: Is it wise to condition children or adults to an unfamiliar situation by introducing it at the very beginning in an exaggerated form?

IT HASN'T HAPPENED HERE—AT LEAST NOT yet, and not entirely. The report of the American Civil Liberties Union for the year ending June 30 is on the whole more encouraging than that of the previous year. The federal government has played a very small role in suppression. No new federal repressive legislation was passed; the relief administrations have on the whole upheld labor's rights to organize and bargain collectively; the National Labor Relations Board, in spite of adverse court decisions, has continued its good record; there has been no serious Post Office censorship; labor injunctions in federal courts have practically disappeared. State and local agencies, on the other hand, have continued to be active. In nineteen strikes, troops were called out to suppress the picket lines or otherwise "maintain order"; Massachusetts passed a teachers'-oath law and a law requiring salute to the flag in schools; New York passed a resolution calling for an investigation of "radicalism" in schools. There were twenty-four lynchings in 1935 as against fourteen in 1934. The American Legion continued to lead among those agencies engaged in attacking the Bill of Rights, with the various chambers of commerce, the D. A. R., and the Hearst press not far behind. On the whole the most violent repression has been directed against labor—and the organizing campaign of the C. I. O. may be expected to accentuate this particular struggle. The most important activity for the coming year is promised as a result of the La Follette resolution to investigate violations of civil liberties, passed by Congress in the session just ended. This will not only strengthen the groups already at work in support of the Bill of Rights, but by its disclosures may very well bring in new champions in those persons who were unaware of how our repressive forces operate. There are still large numbers of Americans in these United States.

AMID SUNNY FRATERNITY, THE TRIBOROUGH Bridge was dedicated last Saturday in New York City. Parks, playgrounds, swimming pools, landscaped highways, topped by the graceful arches of the three bridges, shone in their pristine glory. Over this noble prospect the President, the Governor, the Mayor, Mr. Ickes, and Mr. Moses took turns congratulating each other, while down below on Randall's Island policemen happily ate picnic lunches on the grass. Only one still small voice raised an inharmonious note in this symphony of good-will. On the river underneath, a boat chugged up and down bearing a banner with the words, "Moses Fires Union Labor—Why?" In all the publicity given the opening of the Triborough, well-deserved emphasis was laid on the energy and initiative of the Park Commissioner, and no one will deny that both in that capacity and as director of the Triborough Bridge Authority, the city has a right to be proud of Mr. Moses. But Mr. Moses's labor policy gives us pause. If he should answer the question on the banner he would have to say that ten leaders of the architects and engineers employed in the design division of the Parks Department were dismissed for having organized their fellow workers into a union and for having voted a half-day sit-down strike for the redress of certain grievances. He would have to say that he has steadily done his best to bar unions from the WPA, from which practically all the labor on his various projects has been recruited. He might add that on four different occasions he has ignored the decision of the WPA appeals board to reinstate men whom he had dismissed. The Park Commissioner is too valuable a civil servant for the city to lose, but precisely because he is of value, his anti-labor bias has power behind it, and that is something the city should know.

THE LABOR FRONT CONTINUES ACTIVE, WITH battles being fought and won, and greater ones impending. The Remington Rand strike still drags on, with company tactics getting nastier and nastier. The strike of 12,000 workers in the plant of the Radio Corporation of America at Camden seems likely to be settled on terms satisfactory to the workers, and the 5,500 striking workers of the Wheeling Steel Corporation at Portsmouth, Ohio, have won their fifty-two-day struggle. An interesting point in connection with the Camden strike is the vote in its support by the Philadelphia Central Labor Union, representing 200,000 workers, in spite of President Green's request that A. F. of L. unions ignore it because the strikers belong to an industrial union independent of the A. F. of L. Of impending strikes the most important is that which experts are predicting in the steel industry when the workers organized by the C. I. O. come to grips with a parcel of owners who have to be shown that 1936 is not 1892, or even 1919. It looks as if the industrial drama might make this autumn a bad season for the political troopers.

THE SCOURGING RECENTLY ADMINISTERED by Mr. Roosevelt to economic royalists has distracted public attention from their predecessors, the Tories, and their predecessors the money changers. Proof continues to crop up that the money changers, driven from the temple on March 4, 1933, have since returned and made themselves comfortable again. It will be recalled that one of the New Deal's most vigorous wrestlings with the powers-that-be was its victorious fight to separate deposit banking from investment banking. It was felt, rightly, that it was too much for human flesh to bear the double burden of safeguarding the money of trusting depositors while at the same time seeking to sell them engraved wallpaper and other debentures. Unfortunately, the use of corporate whiskers is making a nullity of this, as of other New Deal reforms. Last week it was announced that the J. Henry Schroder Banking Corporation had organized Schroder, Rockefeller, and Company to take over its security business. In this regard it follows precedent. J. P. Morgan and Company now has Morgan, Stanley, and Company; Chase National Bank has the Amerex Corporation; Brown Brothers, Harriman, and Company have Brown, Harriman, and Company; First National of Boston has the First of Boston Corporation; Lazard Freres has Lazard Freres and Company. Thus by legalistic legerdemain an old abuse reappears in a new guise, and the use of corporate dummies makes it possible again for the banker to make a profit selling himself securities. In our next depression a new New Deal will probably bring forth new legislation. And new loopholes.

BEFORE THIS ISSUE OF THE NATION APPEARS on the newsstands, some action will probably have been taken in the much-heralded dispute between Mr. Green's A. F. of L. and Mr. Lewis's C. I. O. The most ardent proponent of suspension for the eight unions which make up the C. I. O. seems to be Mr. Frey of the Metal Trades Department, who demands no compromise with the insurgents. He is heartily seconded by Mr. Hutcheson, president of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters, whose indignation is doubtless augmented by the memory of what the New York Times delicately calls a "fistic encounter" with Mr. Lewis at the last A. F. of L. convention. Mr. Green, on the other hand, seems to be in a temporizing mood. He hints that maybe the whole unfortunate affair can be postponed until the next meeting of the executive council just before the convention in September; meanwhile he hopes that further conferences with the representatives of the C. I. O. may result in having them see the error of their ways. To date it must be admitted that Mr. Lewis does not seem disposed to admit error. His forthright speech over the air on July 6 was thoroughly uncompromising. The C. I. O. would proceed with its organizing campaign, he said, in spite of all that the American Iron and Steel Institute and its allies the bankers could do. He did not say in spite of all that the reactionary forces of the A. F. of L. could do, but this was implicit in his remarks. If we were a mass-production worker, we should be inclined to place our bets on Mr. Lewis, whether he had been "disciplined" by the A. F. of L. or not.

THE PROPHECY OF A DIRTY CAMPAIGN IS being realized. Paul Block, publisher and Hearst crony, has reprinted as an advertisement an editorial attack on Governor Lehman which drags the Jewish issue into the campaign. An interchange between the New York World-Telegram and John Hamilton, Landon's campaign manager, underlines the issue. We wish that Republicans and Democrats alike would not vie with each other in keeping anti-semitism out of politics by talking about it.

WHILE CLOUDS OF AEROPLANES OVER LE BOURGET demonstrated to the people of Paris the remarkable advances that have lately been made in French military aviation, some 20,000 veterans of the World War gathered at Verdun and pledged themselves to peace. Many of them, it seems, were survivors of that desperate battle of twenty years ago. Representatives were there from many foreign countries—even 500 Germans. There were no speeches; only tolling of bells, playing of dirges, sounding of bugle-calls, and the oath solemnly taken by each individual, "This is for the peace of the world." A moving ceremony, but one wonders how effective. France is a capitalist country, and capitalist countries will still "go to war whenever there is anything to be had by it," so long as those who must do the fighting can be herded into the trenches. Peace is not to be had through pledges like that of Verdun, but through militant action on the part of the exploited classes—a firm refusal to fight the battles of the privileged class, and an equally firm resolve to defend the interests of the masses against aggression.

IN GEORGES CHICHERIN, WHO DIED JULY 7, the Soviet Union lost a leader who, during its most critical period, was virtually indispensable. No one in the Soviet ranks could have achieved the seemingly impossible task of bringing the Bolshevick outcast back into the scheme of international affairs—no one but this old-line aristocrat with the Marxist flame aglow under a polished exterior, this pre-war Czarist diplomat with years in Siberia and in British jails testifying to his revolutionary sincerity. Chicherin brought to his work an untiring energy that habitually turned night into day, a brilliant and profound erudition that forced English newspapers to acknowledge him as Lord Curzon's match, and a combination of tact, tolerance, and character that brought him into close understanding with liberal industrialists like Walter Rathenau and arch-conservatives like German Ambassador Count Brockdorff-Rantzau. The long-range validity of his policies is only now being recognized in full. In 1921 he concluded the Rapallo Treaty with Germany which brought his country the first recognition by a major power. He used the inferior position in which Germany was then held by the Allies to cement a friendship that held fast until Hitler changed the German view of Russia from a commercial hinterland into a field for military expansion. In 1923 he formulated the Dardanelles policy which his successors today are maintaining at Montreux in a much stronger position. His efforts were responsible for the beginnings of the slow dissociation of the Soviet government from the Communist International, which two years ago enabled Litvinov to perform the U.S.S.R.'s most useful economic feat by gaining reestablishment of diplomatic relations with the United States.

CANADA'S CONSTITUTIONAL PROBLEM IS similar to but in some ways more serious than that faced in this country. Like the United States, Canada has been without any national legislation on minimum wages, social insurance, or regulation of working conditions because it was generally accepted that these matters fell within the jurisdiction of the provinces. When the depression made some form of national action imperative, Mr. Bennett, who was then Prime Minister, pushed through a series of laws whose claim to constitutionality rested on the treaty-making power of the dominion government. These acts implemented agreements reached at the International Labor Organization which, when ratified by a certain number of states, were held to have the standing of a treaty. Should the Privy Council in London sustain the Canadian Supreme Court, the dominion government will face a difficult task in finding a basis for the enactment of social legislation. At present a constitutional amendment can only be obtained through the devious channel of an appeal to Westminster. While the majority of provinces favor a change in the constitution which would shift the power of amendment from Westminster to Ottawa, the province of New Brunswick has opposed the proposal on the ground of safeguarding "provincial rights." Despite seventy years of federation, sectional jealousies are still very powerful, particularly in the eastern part of Canada. New Brunswick has recently adopted a bill which imposes a heavy tax on all outside corporations doing business in the province which, if copied in all the provinces, would threaten the continued existence of a national economy. Strong and vigorous national leadership is essential if the dominion is to emerge unscathed from its present economic and political crisis.

BY THE DEATH OF HENRY WRIGHT, THE creative forces in architecture, housing, and town-planning have sustained an irreparable loss. Years ago as a pioneer he analyzed the inadequacy of the planning of our houses and our cities, the unsatisfactory street patterns, the self-defeating wastes in building costs entailed by the overcrowding of land, and he offered solutions more suitable, more livable, and more economical. These early analyses, these brilliant solutions paved the theoretic way for the few community developments to which we can point. In most of these he had a direct hand—in the war-time shipping-board developments for which he was town planner, in the communities of Sunnyside, Radburn, and Chatham Village in Pittsburgh. Characteristically, these were collaborations. It was Wright who furnished the spark, the brilliant clue, the jump forward. Important as has been his contribution to the current physical scene in the way of signposts, his vital influence on younger men in architecture and town planning is of even greater significance. In his informal summer schools at his farm, in his courses at universities over the country, in his town-planning atelier at Columbia, he was constantly priming the young men of talent and imagination with new ideals and new technical equipment for carrying them out and also imbuing them with the courage to fight for a system that would permit their use. To these men and to all who had come under his influence, Henry Wright was not only an example of technical brilliance and originality, but the model of the creative professional man at his best.

Compare the Platforms

WHEN you open this week's issue of The Nation you will find inserted in it a four-page supplement of the party platforms for 1936. Following the admirable example established in previous election years by the editors of the World Tomorrow, which has discontinued publication, we are presenting for American voters a comparative view of the position taken by the six major party platforms on the basic issues of the 1936 election campaign. One of the platforms chosen—that of the Chicago Farmer Labor Conference—is a platform without a national ticket. But it has been included because of the historic importance of the emergence of a farmer-labor nucleus in American political life. Moreover, even in the absence of a national ticket, there will be local and congressional farmer-labor tickets in the field that will build on the position established by the national conference.

Compare the platforms. There is a healthy clearing of vision that results from placing side by side in a matter-of-fact way the pronouncements of the various parties on such issues as unemployment and relief, on housing, on munitions, on labor relations, on civil liberties. We are all too prone, when we read a party platform at all, to read it as we might read an oration and be carried along on the tide of its eloquence. We don't see the gaps and omissions. We mistake rhetoric for reality. We don't smell the evasions or glimpse the straddles. But distil out of all the verbiage and attitudinizing the actual and concrete proposals of any party on specific issues, and something is gained. The promises still remain, of course, promises and not fulfillments. But at least we know what is being promised. And that is a real gain, however small.

The six platforms fall, at least for us, into three groups. On the one hand, there are the Socialists, Communists, and Farmer Labor positions. Despite great historical divergences among the respective groups behind them, and despite great differences in the theory and tactics of those groups, the platforms themselves have an underlying community of viewpoint. On the other hand, there are the Republican and Union Party positions. These also, despite basic differences in history and class composition, have an essentially similar character. What ties together the three groups on the left is a common concern with achieving an economy of plenty by expanding the welfare of the working and unprivileged classes rather than by freezing the present position of the dominant business groups. What unites the Landon and Lemke candidacies is a concern, basically reactionary, with resisting and suppressing every move toward socialization. Despite some of the populist phrasings in the Union Party platform, its silence on the issues of public ownership, the Supreme Court, and civil liberties is eloquent. Somewhere between these two positions stands the Democratic platform, essentially liberal, hemmed in by the fear of advance and the impossibility of retreat.

The editors of The Nation will develop their own position in the campaign in a succession of editorials that will follow this one. For the present we wish only to say that of all the issues presented we consider the really basic ones to be the place of the Supreme Court in the economic order, and the issue of labor relations and labor organization. Not that the others are in any sense unimportant. There has never been a time in our history when every issue—whether dealing with economic policy, international affairs, or human relations—had a more fateful importance for us. But in every period of history there are certain problems that constitute the gateway to the others and represent the crucial and immediate line of advance. Today, in America, those problems are two. One—the Supreme Court—has to do with a political institution that blocks and will continue to block any important effort toward the control of business enterprise and the achievement of security. The other—labor organization—has to do with the only possible base for effective political action in the direction of economic plenty, international peace, and a genuine American culture. Above all the smoke and din of the campaign battle, we must keep these two issues as the poles of our thinking.

Retreat to the Old Diplomacy

ON JULY 15, the League's first experiment with economic sanctions came officially to an end. By all standards of power politics the experiment has been a failure. Despite the fact that the penalties were enforced better than anyone had considered possible and that they had actually begun to squeeze Italy, the attempt was abandoned under circumstances that make it most improbable that the same tactics will be applied again. If it were only a matter of scrapping some of the more debatable sections of Article XVI of the League Covenant, the situation might not be without hope. But we are actually confronted with a complete collapse of the principle of collective law. The League machinery remains intact, but the organization is devoid of power and prestige. The developments of the past fortnight indicate that Europe is already disintegrating, and that the neighbors of Nazi Germany are searching frantically for allies in the conflict that they know cannot long be postponed. Dr. Schacht's successful mission to the Balkans has threatened to destroy the Little Entente and the whole French system of alliances in that area. This development, together with the Austro-German accord which has just been agreed on, give Berlin hegemony over an area roughly equivalent to the territory controlled by the Reich and Austria-Hungary on the eve of 1914.

Next to Hitler, Mussolini has been the chief beneficiary of the collapse of the collective system. Six months ago he was a pariah among the nations. Today, he is the most sought after man in Europe. In an effort to obtain his support against Germany, the Blum government has repudiated sanctions and broken its mutual-assistance pact with England. London itself has removed a good share of its fleet from the Mediterranean in the hope of conciliating Rome. Despite these concessions, Mussolini has refused to participate in the Dardanelles conference, and has apparently reached an agreement with Hitler on the troublesome Austrian problem. No one expects Italy to line up on the side of Germany in an actual conflict—any more than it did in 1914—but if Hitler can keep both Rome and London neutral, at least temporarily, he will be in a stronger position than the Kaiser was twenty-two years ago.

It is true that the League's capitulation to Italy and the Locarno powers' surrender to Germany on the remilitarization of the Rhineland have removed threats of war. As long as potential aggressors can obtain what they desire without fighting, there is little danger of an actual conflict breaking out. But unfortunately, as Japan has shown in North China, an aggressor's appetite does not become satiated with easy conquest. Meanwhile, by their indecisiveness and cowardice, the democratic countries of Europe have frittered away their most precious resource—the tremendous prestige associated with collective security. When the inevitable war with Germany comes, scoffers will say, as they mistakenly said of Britain last fall, that the war is merely a conflict of empires in which no principle is at stake. If England continues its present policy of relying solely on diplomatic intrigue and the force of its armaments, the criticism will be wholly justified. For England especially, this defiance of world opinion is a very serious matter. Britishers have made no bones of the fact that they are counting on the aid of the United States in the next war. In a conflict in which Great Britain was obviously seeking to defend the principles of collective security against fascist aggression, this country would certainly lend at least its moral and economic support. But in a war of empires, provoked by the system of secret alliances, the American people would think many times before they lent aid to Great Britain or any other power.

What has been happening in the past few months cannot inspire us with much belief in the political animal as he has been operating on the European scene. All the much-vaunted structures that have been painfully built up to further international accord and place barriers in the way of war are clearly lying in ruins. The best that may be said for the League is not much: amid the general desolation it alone has any chance at all of serving as a nucleus for later efforts to build collective sanctions and a collective will in Europe. But to say this is already the bitterest indictment of the present European plight. When the Roman world was overrun by the barbarians and Roman culture was all but snuffed out, a few centers were still left in which the embers could be kept alive for a later era. This is the League today, waiting for the time when Europe will build up again something like a collective will for peace, and a collective organization to further that will.

Until then we have the old diplomacy all over again. If you can stomach the task, try reading again the history of European diplomacy in the years just before 1914 and then read the daily newspapers today. The similarity is so striking that even a professional international optimist should be able to notice it. To follow European events today is like reliving an old nightmare. All the old features of the pre-1914 situation are here: the alliance system, the armament race, statesmen mouthing platitudes about peace while aeroplane formations fly overhead and every possible industrial plant is feverishly conscripted for the production of instruments of death, courtesy visits of diplomats to European capitals, jockeying for positions, and realignments, accords like the present German-Austrian accord.

There is one new element of importance in the European situation. That is a growing recognition that if the old diplomacy is ever to be broken down and collective security achieved, the foundation for that security must first be laid by democratic movements in each of the important countries of Europe. Russia, in her own fashion, has led the way. Spain and France, however imperfectly in their own fashion, are following. Every victory of the organized forces of labor and the common man within each European country must prove a nail driven into the coffin of the old diplomacy, and eventually of the war system in Europe. Meanwhile the coffin is empty and the corpse that is to fill it thrives lustily.

Roosevelt and the Drought

CANUTE, the Dane, had many achievements to his credit, but what the school child knows of him is that he commanded the tide to behave itself. Franklin Roosevelt may perhaps win immortality in a similar way. According to a Times dispatch he "declared forcefully" that some way must be found to prevent the recurrence of periodic droughts. Must. But these droughts have been recurring for some fifty million years, if we are to believe the findings of the geologists. The high plains were a short-grass country, that is, a semi-arid country, when the tertiary horse formed his teeth. Scientists do not know what causes the vast currents of air that tumble in from the Pacific to turn periodically northeastward over the desert and, furnace-dried and superheated, to fall upon the unfortunate high prairie. What is known is that these currents are a thousand miles wide and several miles high, unlikely to pay much respect to CCC earth dams and scraggly shelter belts.

The problem is really one not of control but of adaptation. Twice a century, it is safest to assume, we shall have droughts covering some hundreds of thousands of square miles, growing worse for several years, then gradually receding. Between these major, widely extended droughts there will be many sporadic droughts, sometimes afflicting an unfortunate region for several years in succession. Other regions will have rain in torrents. But no farmer or stockman in the whole territory between the hundredth meridian and the Rockies can ever count with certainty upon a sufficient rainfall.

Plainly, the present economy of the semi-arid region is ill-adapted to the realities of the climate. A quarter of a million families have been virtually burned out in the last three years. They have no recourse but federal relief; and relief they must have until satisfactory plans have been made for establishing a more intelligent economy.

Such an economy will recognize the great variability of this whole region in capacity for sustaining plant and animal life and will therefore provide for the most painless practicable expansion or contraction of tillage and stock raising. Much of the land now tilled should be returned to the range; much of the better watered land should be reserved for the production of reserve forage, to reduce the losses from the forcible reduction of herds that now follows a sudden onset of drought. It goes without saying that whatever lands are capable of irrigation without excessive cost should be supplied with water, but such lands should be strictly coordinated with the economy of the adjoining grass regions, instead of being treated as mere oases of subsidized production for the national market.

However necessary such a reorganization of the economic life of the high plains may be, it remains to be seen whether the Administration will dare to undertake it. In the same interview in which the President promised to control the air currents he declared that there has never been a thought of evacuating any part of the drought-ruined population. It is, however, not only the drought states, but every county, every village, that oppose any reduction of population through economic readjustment. The business men, the lawyers, doctors, editors, preachers in the towns, have nothing ultimately to live on but the farmers and stockmen. Any reorganization that amounts to anything is bound to bring about a redistribution of population. A given area will not maintain so large a population by grazing as by mixed farming. It will not yield so large a gross production to be handled by the towns, even though it affords a satisfactory standard of living for the population that remains—something that mixed farming and unregulated grazing do not do—if the bad years are considered.

Mr. Roosevelt owes nothing to the small-town business crowd. They will beat him if they can. If he carries the agrarian states it will be because the underlying population, the farmers and ranchers and the town-workers associated with them, believe in him. They will not believe in him long if they find him placing the vested interests of the small-town oligarchy above their own vital needs. What the burnt-out farmer vitally needs is a plan that will give him a fair chance for a living, on land that may reasonably be expected to respond to his labor and skill, whether or not within his present county or state lines.

We have become somewhat panicky about the ravages of erosion on our farm lands. We have reason to be panicky. But there is an even more serious form of erosion, the weathering away of the hopes and energies of the farm population, upon which our national subsistence ultimately depends. The drought is a colossal agency of this most dangerous form of erosion. A quarter of a million American farmers are wrecked by it. Peace to politics: what does Mr. Roosevelt really propose to do about it? Reverse the error that transformed the semi-arid lands into unlimited private property, object of speculation and tragic deception? Or rock along with relief and futile patching in the hope that the next great drought will fall upon a remote Administration?

Olympic Trials

THE city of Berlin is being scrubbed inside and out. The fronts of buildings are being sandblasted, pavements are being relaid, the whole length of Unter den Linden is being planted with young linden trees, because the excavations for the new subway destroyed the old ones. In addition a new set of manners is being urged on the German people. Be Kind to Foreigners Week starts as we write and will end on August 16, at the close of the Olympic games.

And if the news dispatches are to be believed, this regime of politeness and cleanliness will be tested to the utmost before the games are over. German athletes have been undergoing secret training guaranteed superior to the training received by teams of other nations. At the recent try-outs, however, when athletes were being picked for the teams, it was admitted—sadly by German onlookers, not so sadly by foreign journalists—that the results did not seem to be very happy. Worse still, the men were far outclassed by the women! Only a dyed-in-the-wool Nazi can realize the full ignominy of the New York Times dispatch which declares that "Germany's hopes of making good in the Olympics depends on its women." In the famous pamphlet of Herr Bruno Maltz, sports leader of the storm troops, the Nazi position on sports for women was made abundantly clear. "We fight women's sports. . . . Women should remain womanly. . . . Look at girl athletes who have reached the age of thirty. They look like fifty: manly, the spirit of battle written on their faces, bony and bare of womanhood." What an irony if Berlin's face should be lifted only to see as its victorious athletes women who at thirty look like storm troopers or Herr Göring!

Nor is this the least of the trials which because of the Olympics the Nazis will have to suffer. The American team, some 350 strong, is halfway across the Atlantic. The leading athlete seems to be Jesse Owens of Ohio State University, who won the final trials in the one-hundred-meter dash, the two-hundred-meter dash, and the broad jump. Mr. Owens is a Negro. There are also Cornelius Johnson and David Albritton, who in the final trials broke all high-jump records with the astonishing leap of 6 feet, 9¾ inches. Mr. Johnson and Mr. Albritton are Negroes, too. Nor are they the only representatives of their race of which the team may boast. In Nazi Germany the only animal which is lower than a Jew is a Negro. Indeed, one of the gravest counts against the Jew, according to prevalent German racial theory, is that he consorts with Negroes and thereupon spreads the resulting Negro infection to the pure Aryans whom God has blessed with Adolf Hitler. How will these dark-skinned American athletes fit into a freshly sandblasted Berlin? Where will they sleep or eat or take their showers? What if they should win all the events not won by the defeminized German women? It is problems like these that must be keeping Propaganda Minister Goebbels awake these nights. To be one of the Nazi chosen people is not, if we may be permitted a solecism, a bed of roses.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Mr. Michelson Doesn't Write All the Speeches

Campaign Press Agents

Washington, July 13

GOD may or may not be on Roosevelt's side but the press agents certainly are. Especially the Republican Party's press agents. They don't want to be, of course, but they are bound to, for the battery of them currently being lined up to sell Mr. Landon to the voters comprises precisely the same species of organ grinders that passed Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover off on an unsuspecting but not undeserving country. In fact, some are the very same persons. They can no more emit persuasively liberal statements and speeches than a duck-billed platypus can emulate Lily Pons. And if there is one thing on which the Republican and Democratic high commands are agreed, it is that their candidates have got at least to sound and look liberal this year to fetch the votes.

To understand how impossible an assignment in camouflage that will be for the buncombe boys hired to paint Mr. Landon pink, one must first absorb a bit of knowledge about the mysteries of the political press agent's craft, and it is essential to begin with a realization that his positive contributions to the progress of a Presidential campaign are minor. His labors in that direction combined with those of all his aides and janissaries influence at maximum only a few hundred thousand scattered votes. These efforts consist largely in being the answer to the United Typothetae's prayer, an out-pouring of pamphlets, leaflets, handbooks, and handbills which serve principally as a form of patronage for printers, and of campaign propaganda disguised as news stories.

The work of the radio, stage, and movie divisions of the publicity staffs belongs in approximately the same category. The gentry who head these divisions are concerned chiefly with cozening time or space from the radio and newsreel companies, wangling for preferment over their rivals in the opposition party, cajoling big names in the amusement world into endorsing candidates as they endorse cold creams and cigarettes. They are either business diplomats or stunt-devisers. Sometimes their stunts fail through no fault of their own. For example, it was not their fault that Mr. Schmeling put Joe Louis to sleep just after the Democrats had arranged to capture the Harlem vote by having Joe announce he had attained the age of twenty-one and would cast his first vote for Mr. Roosevelt.

Sol A. Rosenblatt, former NRA Division Administrator in charge of codes for the entertainment industries, has been engaged by the Democrats to lead their radio and screen procurators. He will be assisted on the technical end of his radio activities by W. B. Dolph, a brother-in-law of Herbert L. Pettey, who recently resigned his secretaryship of the Federal Communications Commission to hire out to a New York radio concern. Pettey headed the Democrats' radio division in 1932 and was rewarded with appointment to the FCC post. Dolph has been connected with an independent station here and from that vantage point has been playing the radio applications game, a form of horsetrading in which the FCC holds the stakes. Eddie Dowling, a political song and dance man from Rhode Island, will head the Democrats' stage division. The names of the Republicans' radio, stage, and screen wizards have not yet been divulged.

The only other open and positive activity of the political press agents is the composition of speeches and statements. It has become the favorite dull-day resort of Republican journalists to overemphasize the extent to which the speeches of New Dealers are the product of Charles Michelson's pen. If he were to write all that have been attributed to him, Michelson on occasion would have had to equal in a single day the lifetime output of a Dumas or a Dickens. In reality, the press agent composes the speeches of only the more stupid and boozy political spokesmen. In most cases, the speeches of political hot shots are, if not the work of their own deliveries, the product of their personal staffs of advisers and secretaries. Where the party's press agents get in their work is in telling when and when not to loose these speeches upon the electorate. It is, in fact, in the negative field that the astute press agent earns his bread, butter, and caviar. His worth rises in accordance with his ability to suppress and especially with his ability to suppress genuine issues.

When mere numbers are considered, the Democrats' press battery, of course, far outnumbers the Republicans'. It is virtually impossible to call the Democratic roll. There is no end to it. It includes not only a dozen or so men employed directly by the Democratic national committee but a whole legion employed by the federal government. Each federal department has its press chief who, in turn, has serving under him a battalion of subordinate press agents, one or more to each bureau in the department. Many of them are men of higher competence than any the Republicans can command. Michael Straus, Ickes's chief press agent, a master of the subtler forms of his art, is a case in point. These men are paid $3,500 to $10,000 a year. Cummings's man, Henry Suydam, for example, whose present status is a little dubious due to a joker inserted in the current appropriation bill of the Department of Justice prohibiting the employment of "special assistants" who are not lawyers, gets as much as the Solicitor General of the United States or J. Edgar Hoover, the great G-man. The list merely begins with these men, who were hired under the selective eye of Steve Early, a former Associated Press reporter and, later, newsreel contact man here, who serves as Roosevelt's secretary in charge of press relations.

But all of them put together with their talents magnified and triple-distilled cannot counterbalance the fact that the press of the country through which they must work is overwhelmingly Republican and would distort their offerings even if proved holy writ. It is sheerest nonsense to hold, as my colleague Frank Kent, the always entrancing Mark Sullivan, and the Talmudical Mr. Lawrence, are forever holding, that these New Deal press agents represent the cream of American reportorial talent and have been lured away from the nation's newspaper owners with huge offerings of gold. Most of them were out of work and down at the heel when they were hired, and many of those that left newspaper jobs to take New Deal posts went for less money and because they could no longer stomach their employers' journalistic infidelities. It is also nonsense to maintain that these New Deal press agents have been able to subvert the press.

Certainly none of them has been guilty of so crass a piece of stupidity as that of Theodore A. Huntley, until this week the Republican national committee's chief press agent. Huntley in a flaming manifesto early this year accused the Administration of suppressing a report on the FERA's operations which Congress had ordered to be presented in January. At the time Huntley issued his blast, the report in question not only had been duly filed but had been distributed to the press and was gathering dust on many a reporter's desk here. Huntley, whose present status in the G. O. P. press organization is indefinable, has been operating in such a way as to arouse belief in the minds of novices that he actually was working for the Democrats, but those who know him entertained no such suspicions; they know that Ted would rather take hemlock than Democratic gold today. It was not always so; in 1924, he took some of that gold in exchange for writing John W. Davis's campaign biography. But then, perhaps, Democracy was a little different. Certainly it was only a short step for Huntley from Davis's biographer to secretary for Pennsylvania's (and Mellon's) Senator, Dave Reed. When Reed was defeated Huntley bounced into a Hearst editorship here and thence into his Republican committee berth.

No such boners are to be expected from the man who today succeeded Huntley as chief G. O. P. press agent, although Alfred Henry Kirchhofer is no less capable of discerning giants under Roosevelt's bed. He runs as managing editor a paper, the Buffalo Evening News, which is capable of discerning boondoggling in a project to disconnect the sewage disposal system from a community's water supply. Kirchhofer, who entered newspaper work via a Y. M. C. A. secretaryship and served Butler's paper from 1921 through 1927 as its Washington correspondent, is a dour fellow of no particular journalistic distinction save the rather dubious one of being vice-president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. He was Hoover's press agent in the 1928 campaign. Harry Jay Brown, who shared that experience with him, is scheduled to share his 1936 assignment, too.

Brown, a roly-poly warhorse, is a relic of that earlier day in American journalism when it did not seem unseemly for a reporter also to hold a place on the party payroll. He has been a Washington correspondent since 1897 and has been on the G. O. P. payroll, it seems, most of the intervening years. At present correspondent for such papers as the Boise (Idaho) Statesman, the Spokane (Washington) Spokesman-Review, and the Oakland (California) Tribune, he was one of Coolidge's press agents in 1924 as well as one of Hoover's in 1928. His chief talent is a knowledge of what Republican newspapers want to print. Two of Brown's and Kirchhofer's colleagues in the Hoover build-up also will assist them in their efforts to make Landon seem to be the man Bruce Barton had in mind when he wrote "The Man Nobody Knows." Those two are Roy A. Roberts, managing editor of the Kansas City Star, and Henry J. Allen, former Kansas Governor, former Senator, and former Hearst editor, who enjoyed the title of Hoover's chief press agent in 1928 and is now the publisher of a daily paper at Topeka. Allen, a bumptious fellow with no better sense than to think Mussolini grand, was elected Governor of Kansas while serving in France with the Red Cross in charge of its "home-communications service." He was appointed to the Senate to succeed Charlie Curtis. Both Allen and Roberts helped sell Landon to editors before the Cleveland convention.

Another important member of Landon's press battery is E. Ross Bartley, a pleasant, workmanlike fellow who seems destined to be the candidate's personal press-relations man. Bartley is so thoroughly Old Guard in his attitudes that his tendons, like those of Brown, Kirchhofer, Allen, and the rest, if dissected out would snap into knots that spelled "G. O. P." He got that way during the Harding Administration when he covered the White House for the Associated Press, and made friends with the Ohio gang.

The Democratic press battery is not much like Bartley, Kirchhofer, Brown, Allen, and the rest. It includes, in addition to Early and their chief, Michelson, M. Farmer Murphy, Leon Henderson, E. L. Roddan, Marshall Coles, and Norman W. Baxter. I hope to treat of them later.

The New Soviet Abortion Law

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, June 27

THE new Soviet law of June 27, 1936, on abortions, divorces, alimony, and so on, is a blot on Moscow's inspiring record for advanced social legislation. It has all the marks of a man-made document. Indeed, the men must have been old men with blurred memories. The law, moreover, is a mockery of the democratic discussion which stirred the U.S.S.R. for a month before its final promulgation.

On May 26 the Soviet government published the draft of a law entirely prohibiting abortions except when "the continuation of pregnancy constitutes a danger to life or threatens serious harm to the health of the woman." The bill would likewise encourage the rearing of large families, raise alimony fees, improve child care, increase the capacity of maternity clinics, and make divorce slightly more difficult.

In days gone by, the Bolsheviks would have immediately superimposed the law, and the population would have swallowed it. But this time a nation-wide debate was not merely sanctioned; the authorities insisted on its being free, open, and honest. They invited criticism and they got it good and hard. They deserved it, for the suggested decree was an extremely bad and unprogressive one. Citizens subjected every detail of the draft to withering fire. Letters published in the press and speeches made at public meetings tore the document to pieces, and plain peasant women and students offered amendments and alterations which were definite improvements on the woefully inadequate, mistaken paragraphs of the official law-makers.

Moscow for once apparently admitted its fallibility. Adverse comment was in order. One was not a counter-revolutionary if one did not regard as 100 per cent perfect every move and idea which emanated from the Kremlin. How often painfully loyal, orthodox foreign friends of the Soviet Union have tied themselves into knots trying to explain or explain away some Bolshevik measure! Sympathizers of the Soviet Union too often permit their reactionary enemies to drive them into a tactically weak position where they must defend the indefensible simply because others attack.

The public criticism of the government's anti-abortion bill was a unique affair. It was unhampered. A few politicians, as unaware as some foreigners of the deep social changes which have been taking place in the U.S.S.R., proceeded as was their wont on previous occasions. They called meetings, presented a ready-made resolution, and railroaded through the usual unanimous "Hallelujah" adoption. They were fiercely denounced by the Pravda and other newspapers. Although I know of one or two cases where minor officials sought to control or suppress expressions of unfavorable opinion about the draft law, and although a number of people, from long habit, thought it necessary to go through the motions of general approbation in order to sugar-coat the pill of their subsequent objections, the discussion was a real referendum of popular wishes. It appeared to everybody that the government could not possibly ignore the widespread vocal opposition to its proposals. The debate, one had to believe, must result in radical modification of the draft. This democratic consultation of the nation's opinion raised the hope that the country would be saved from the disastrous effects of the proposed law. Suddenly, however, Moscow dashed these hopes. Without warning, after four weeks of free discussion in which wise, invaluable amendments were offered on all sides, the Soviet government simply republished the draft with several minor changes. This miserable draft thereby became a law. The Komsomolskaya Pravda cannot be serious when it says that this is "a law approved by the nation." The Pravda must have had its tongue in its cheek when it affirmed that "the Soviet government listened attentively to the views and proposals of the toilers." That is just what the government did not do. It behaved as if no discussion had ever taken place. On the most important issue, abortions, the final law repeats the blanket prohibition, merely adding that women can get abortions where a parent suffers from a serious illness which may be inherited by the child. "Thanks for nothing" is all one can say about such an alteration. It should have been in the original draft.

It is a crime to ban abortions in the U.S.S.R. "Only under socialism," reads the law, "where exploitation of man by man is absent, where woman is a member of society enjoying full rights, and where accelerated improvement of material well-being is the law of social growth—only in such conditions can a serious struggle with abortions be undertaken." This is all very true. But Soviet conditions are not yet so good as to warrant the state in insisting that every pregnancy should mean a child.

In the U.S.S.R., to be sure, the social institutions of the state and the universal opportunities offered by a quickly growing nation do lighten the burdens of the family. Lydia Gribakina, writing to the Pravda from Rostov during the debate, told how her husband was killed by the Kolchak forces in 1919. She had to work and raise four sons. "Now," she declares, "they are noble men of our country. Dmitri is employed in the Arctic, Guri is a captain in the army, Benjamin graduated from the art academy and is an artist, and Herman is studying in the military aviation school. Two of them have been decorated by the government." Children, many other women argued in correspondence to the papers, do not interfere with employment or prevent participation in community life. "On the contrary," Pasha Angelina, the leader of a tractor brigade in the Donetz region and holder of the Order of Lenin, asserts, "we see thousands of women workers, collective farmers, physicians, teachers, who devote much time to their jobs and are simultaneously model mothers." Yes, but for how long and at what cost to health and to the work? Besides, that is all right with one or two babies, but not with five. "K. B.," a woman university student, wrote to the Moscow Izvestia. The editor published her letter under the caption "I Object." E. Firsava, a colleague of hers, took issue with her in the same daily. "Listen, dear K. B.," Firsava says, "I study in your university. . . . My son does not interfere with my studies. Indeed, the institute has helped me rear the child. You and your friend Galia are afraid that you will have to leave school if you become pregnant. But thousands of our students are bringing up their children in day nurseries. In these three years I have not once heard of a woman who left the university because mothers cannot live with children in the dormitories. Come to our institute (Yakimanka Street 40) and you will see that mothers live in bright, comfortable rooms, avail themselves of good nurseries in the same dormitory buildings, and receive special monthly money grants from the trade-union committee and the dean's office."

Such arrangements make a vast difference. But nobody argued against children altogether. The point is that the proscription of abortions must result in an endless number of children and in a situation which will swamp

Soviet child-care facilities even if they are extended and ruin families instead of strengthening them. Abortions, of course, are not good for the health. "Half of women's diseases," Dr. Kulazhenkova told a meeting of textile workers in Western Russia, "neurasthenia, miscarriages, barrenness—all these are the consequences of abortions." The extra burdens of a large family, however, will also undermine a woman's constitution.

The case for continuing legal abortions was put in a host of letters to the Soviet press. A woman economist wrote: "I cannot agree to the prohibition of abortions. At present a woman has equal rights with men, holds a job, engages in much social activity, and at the same time must bear, nurse, and raise children. To have more than two or three children means to give up her work and her social activity." "The prohibition of abortions," wrote another woman, ". . . must be looked upon as a grave infringement of women's personal rights." Said Nina Yershova in the Pravda: "It would seem that you want to return woman to the pots and dish rags, and tear her away from the political life of the country, from work and from studies."

"I assert," said N. Karpova of the Moscow University to the Izvestia "that it is impossible at one and the same time to be a good student and a worthy mother. . . . Just try to have a child when father and mother are studying, both are receiving state stipends, and live in different parts of town, in different dormitories." A young man at the Moscow Pedagogical Institute believes that by reason of the three-month enforced, paid vacation from classroom before and after pregnancy, a woman who wanted to have a child while attending university would lose a year of her course. Two women scientists told this to the Pravda: "We wish to enjoy the unhampered right to decide: To be or not to be a mother." "I am an artist," asserted Irina Soya-Serko in the Evening Moscow. "I have two children, one at school, the other a baby. Both were desired, both are warmly loved. But I want no more. They would compel me to neglect my creative work, and that I cannot accept."

Crowded housing in Soviet cities is another unanswerable argument against the illegalizing of abortions. "I have one child nearly three years old," wrote a woman to the Moscow Daily News, "and would gladly have another, but we already have four people (including my domestic worker) living in one little room, and in my opinion it would be a crime to bring another child into the already overcrowded room." This sentiment was echoed hundreds of times in the press. For instance: "Women with children who live in crowded living quarters must decide themselves whether they want another child or not." "In a room with an area of twenty square meters live I, my mother, my husband, and our two children. I want another child, but can I afford it in these conditions? House building should be accelerated, and in the distribution of dwellings, large families should be favored." "It is impossible so to improve living conditions in the big cities in the necessary short space of time as to supply big families with the required apartments." Eugenia Moskvina, a twenty-nine year old Leningrad factory worker, informed the Izvestia as follows: "I live in one room. It is crowded. I have two children. My husband is a student who still has three years to study. He receives a stipend of 110 roubles a month. I work and our average monthly income amounts to 500 roubles. I finish work, run to the nursery for one of the children. I come home. The room is not made. My school-boy son wants his meal. My head swims. Can I, in such circumstances, allow myself to have another child?"

"Life," as Stalin has truly said, "has become better, comrades, life is gayer." Yet life is still hard for many. Witness these concrete examples sent by readers to the newspapers: "I propose that the law include a paragraph about raising the output and improving the distribution of goods for children. At present, it is difficult to find rubber sheets, small bathtubs, and babies' cribs. The prices of these articles should be reduced." (A friend of mine recently paid 207 roubles for a metal bed for her baby. That may be a fortnight's salary.) "My boy has been walking around with torn shoes for two weeks because I have no time to stand in the queues. If, as the country grows more prosperous and the number of customers increases, and if a mother has not one but several children, how will she be able to purchase the necessary clothes for her family?" This from Tatiana Cherniak, a Kiev pharmacist: "A year from now there will be many more children in our country. But it is already difficult to obtain nipples, plaster, eye droppers, and the like. . . ."

In addition to the housing and goods shortages, there is the problem of education facilities. Nurseries and kindergartens are excellent as institutions, but far from perfect. They close sometimes on account of contagious diseases. Nor are there enough of them, even in Moscow. A woman wrote: "I am in charge of a day nursery. But conditions do not allow us to accept all children who apply." What can a working mother do in such a case? A mother states: "I have five children. If I sent only three to the kindergarten, that would be beyond my means. The law ought to reduce the charge for kindergarten care." The government does not supply school pupils with free text books. Every child of school age is an additional expense. The state is erecting hundreds of fine school buildings throughout the country. But in many cities, schools still have two shifts.

The Soviet Union has a tremendous number of births. Its annual excess of births over deaths is about three million—more than that of all the rest of Europe. Why do the authorities nevertheless wish to encourage more children? In the light of its great size, vast undeveloped resources, and tremendous material potentialities, the U.S.S.R. is an under-populated country. But if one considers its actual accommodations, its existing supplies of homes, goods, nurseries, schools, it is a terribly crowded country. Moreover, the rapid increases in these facilities have in past years, even with legal abortions, been partially cancelled out by the growth of population. What, then, prompted the Kremlin to introduce this anti-abortion, pro-large family law? And what will be its effect in a land in which other, less violent forms of birth control have been neglected by the people and by the authorities?

(Mr. Fischer's second article on the Soviet law prohibiting abortions will appear next week.)

Deporting Jesús

By PHILIP STEVENSON

ON June 29 Jesús was deported as an undesirable alien. Jesús Pallares is a skilled miner and an accomplished musician. He has spent twenty-three of his thirty-nine years in the United States. For nineteen years he worked here, supporting his family. Of the remaining four years, two in childhood were spent in school, the last two on relief. Born in the state of Chihuahua, Mexico, Jesús joined the Madero revolution at the age of fifteen, fought four years, and mustered out in 1915 with part of his lower jaw missing. He entered the United States legally and obtained work as a miner. As miners' standards went, Jesús did well. He was an exceptional worker. There never was a time when he could not get a job. On the whole he got along with his bosses. In 1923, during an unorganized strike at Dawson, New Mexico, when anarchists among the men wanted to blow up the tippie in answer to company violence, Jesús convinced them of the anti-labor effect of such tactics, and prevented catastrophe. Labor's best weapon, he contended, lay in solidarity of organization.

The onset of the depression, 1930, found him working for the Gallup-American Coal Company, a subsidiary of the Guggenheim giant, Kennecott Copper. In 1930 Gallup was unorganized. So when Jesús found himself being paid but irregularly for his prospecting work on a new entry, he kicked—as an individual—and like individual protestors in all depressed coal fields, was promptly fired.

Jobs were scarce now. For the first time Jesús was up against it to support his wife and four children. But after several months of unemployment he obtained work at Madrid, New Mexico. Madrid is typical of thousands of marginal and sub-marginal coal camps. The town is company-owned. The miners' homes are sagging, rotting shacks. Floors slant, roofs leak, plaster has fallen, doors lack panels, paint and kalsomine have peeled away. The shacks can hardly have cost $100 per room to build fifty years ago. Yet today they rent for about $60 per room per year. Miners live in company houses—"or else." Payment is chiefly in scrip, good only at the company store, and there is a company coal racket whereby miners who get about eighty cents a ton for loading coal are charged $3 a month for fuel winter and summer. The prices for powder and caps are exorbitant, and the miners are docked every month for an Employees Fund of which the company steadfastly refuses to give any accounting.

At first Jesús got by in Madrid. But as bad times got worse, his earnings shrank. The summer of 1933 brought wholesale layoffs and misery. The company, in order to nullify Section 7-a of the NIRA, established a company union. Jesús joined, only to discover that the union concerned itself with the boss's problems rather than the miners'. In Gallup the miners had defeated the company union, organized independently, gone on strike, and won substantial gains. So Madrid, too, sent for organizers.

But Madrid was tougher to organize than Gallup. The company was forewarned by the Gallup struggle. And the entire town, including the streets, were company property. Union organizers ran great risks in entering Madrid at all. Yet enter they did, thanks to Jesús and others who smuggled them in on the floors of cars, covered with blankets and bags of groceries. To this the company replied by spying on the union through its "lapdogs" (anti-unionists).

Jesús was elected local union organizer. But the union's demands remained a dead letter. Jesús and his aides decided to ask the aid of the federal government in enforcing Section 7-a. When the company prohibited all union meetings in Madrid, the unionists walked four miles to Cerrillos for meetings, passed resolutions, drew up petitions, framed protests, and sent them to the coal board, to General Johnson, to Senator Cutting, to the state Labor Commissioner. From the coal board came a promise of a hearing—if the miners would withhold their strike and wait. And wait they did—weeks—and sent more telegrams—and waited more weeks. Not until the tail-end of the busy season—February, 1934—did T. S. Hogan, chairman of the Denver District Coal Board, arrive in Madrid for an "impartial" hearing.

The affair was a farce. Jesús, attempting to present the case of his fellow union members, was repeatedly interrupted, not only by superintendent Oscar Huber and his faithful lapdogs, but also by government representative Hogan, who refused to recognize Jesús as the leader and spokesman of the majority. By patience and persistence, in spite of organized heckling, Jesús did manage to cover the question of the coal-code wage-scale, even forcing an admission from Huber that code rates were being violated. "Now about the house-rents," Jesús continued. But he got no further. At that point Huber asked for the floor, adroitly changed the subject, and that sorest of all points with the Madrid miners—house-rents—was never mentioned again!

Results of the Hogan hearing were zero. Grievances went unredressed. Union meetings continued to be prohibited. A new coal code went into effect, only to be violated even more flagrantly by the company. Plainly, the men must either strike or lie down. They struck—in the slack season. The strike failed. Jesús was marked for ridicule.

Under the NRA he could not be fired for union activity. He finished work in his "room" in the mine and was assigned a new location. His eighteen years' experience told him that he could make at best sixty-seven cents a day here—and the mine was then working only one day a week—while his rent alone amounted to $3 per week. Yet the boss refused him any better location. Then a fellow worker offered to share his place with Jesús. It showed a good seam of coal, and both could make a living there. Jesús asked the superintendent's permission to accept this offer.

"No. Take the place assigned you, or none," Huber said.

The alternative was peonage—progressive indebtedness to the company. Jesús refused. His fifth child was expected shortly. His savings went for food. Arrears on his rent to the company piled up. He was told to vacate his house or be evicted. He stayed put. The child arrived. Asked by a fellow miner, "What is it, boy or girl?" Jesús replied:

"I think it's a bolshevik!"

Soon after the birth Jesús was charged with "forcible entry" of his house. The "court" was the company office, the justice of the peace a company employee. Superintendent Huber, furious that Jesús had made a public hearing necessary, clung like Shylock to his pound of flesh. Evicted, blacklisted as a miner, Jesús moved to Santa Fe and for the first time in his life went on relief. The family of seven lived in one room, on two cents per meal per person—the starvation standard still current in New Mexico's relief.

Jesús protested his eviction to NRA Compliance Director J. J. Dempsey—today a New Deal Congressman. Dempsey refused to act and passed the buck to Hogan of the coal board. Hogan did not even bother to reply. Jesús then appealed to the National Labor Board. Chairman Garrison wrote to Hogan urging him to act. Hogan disregarded even this. He never acknowledged Jesús's letters.

The native New Mexicans, a Spanish-speaking peasant people, had never been successfully organized. Yet they were half the population of the state. If organized in their own interest, instead of the interest of the railroads and mines, they could be a force to help themselves out of their 300-year-old bondage. At least they could end racial discrimination in relief. So in the fall of 1934 Jesús began organizing for the Liga Obrera de Habla Española (Spanish-speaking Workers League) which concerned itself specifically with the problems of the Spanish-American rank and file. In November there had been a few hundred members. By February, 1935, the Liga had grown to some 8,000. The politicians were frightened out of their wits. Jesús was elected organizer for the whole district, serving without pay and hitch-hiking to organize the most remote hamlets on his days off from FERA work.

In January the Democratic state legislature had hatched a criminal-syndicalism bill which would have made it a felony punishable by fourteen years' imprisonment to be seen in public with a copy of The Nation or any printed matter advocating "any change in industrial ownership." The bill passed the House with only two dissenting votes. Senator Juan Sedillo, opposition leader, had given up all hope of defeating it. The steering committee, itself a majority of the Senate, had unanimously recommended its passage. On the morning that it was to be passed, 700 members of the Liga Obrera, carrying placards of denunciation in two languages, swept past astonished police at the Capitol, filled the Senate galleries, and demanded the defeat of this fascist gag legislation. Senators took one look—and changed their votes. To the acute chagrin of its big-business sponsors, the bill was beaten.

This time Jesús had won the enmity not merely of one coal company but of the organized rulers of New Mexico. On April 23, 1935, he was arrested while at work on his FERA job and jailed on deportation charges. After three weeks' confinement, a secret hearing was held in an attempt to prove Jesús active in "communistic" organizations. N. D. Collear, federal immigration inspector, acted not only as an initiator, investigator, and prosecutor, but also as judge and jury, and even as court interpreter!

To the amazement of Jesús, he found his opening remarks at the Hogan hearing of the year before cited as "evidence" against him. Jesús had said: "We have been most patient. . . . Mr. Hogan, I hope you come here to bring us full justice, if justice exists for the workingman. If you cannot see that we get it, we shall find other ways of getting it for ourselves."

Obviously Jesús referred to the strike which had been postponed at Hogan's request. At the deportation hearing, it was offered as evidence of "communistic" activity!

Here is an item from the testimony of a Madrid lapdog:

Q. Have you ever heard him make inflammatory speeches about the government?

A. No, not exactly—he urges the Mexicans to fight for their rights.

On such trumped-up charges Jesús was held for deportation under $1,000 bond pending a review of the case. The bond was promptly furnished, and Jesús was a "free" man—as free as a labor organizer can be in a vigilante-ridden state—as free as an alien can be who faces deportation and separation from his American-born children.

He continued his task of organizing the Liga Obrera so successfully that the rulers of New Mexico redoubled their efforts to be rid of him. After all, the government's case against Jesús was weak, involving only trade-union activity—a constitutionally guaranteed right. Could he not be provoked into open violence?

As a leader in the Liga Obrera, Jesús often accompanied delegations to the local relief office presenting cases of discrimination or deprivation. Recently, a worker in that office has disclosed in a sworn affidavit the methods employed against Jesús "in an effort to create reasons for his deportation." Says Esther Cohen, formerly of the New Mexico ERA:

Attempts were made by my office to intimidate Pallares by withholding relief and by inventing reasons by which he could be removed from relief jobs which were the only types of employment open to him. He was repeatedly called into my office where threats were made to starve his family in order to involve him in an argument which the relief agency hoped would give rise to violence on his part, which in turn would give sufficient reason for a complaint to the Labor Department. Such violence never took place, even though situations were carefully prepared in advance such as the placing of a hammer on the supervisor's desk within his easy reach. Nevertheless a complaint was made to Washington on the vague and flimsy basis that Pallares was a "troublemaker."

I gave Pallares's case history to Mr. Colyear [N. D. Collear], the immigration officer from Washington, who stated that he found no data therein which would incriminate Pallares to the extent of seriously considering deportation. He wondered if it would be possible to extract some information from Pallares himself by any means available which would further the plan to get him out of the way.

Towards this end Pallares was once again called into the office and this time a stenographer was planted where he could not see her and Colyear was also listening behind the closed door where Pallares could not see him. Again threats were made to "starve out" his ailing pregnant wife and six American born children to whom he was passionately devoted, if he did not admit that he was interested in organizing his friends into an unemployed council. . . .

At the hearing on his case before the Labor Department's Board of Review last spring Jesús was represented by an attorney for the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born. Among the papers on file in the case two remarkable documents came to light, the existence of which had hitherto been kept secret.

The first was a letter to Secretary of Labor Perkins from Governor Clyde Tingley of New Mexico, urging that Jesús's deportation be "expedited" on the extraordinary grounds that the Liga Obrera was "the New Mexico branch of the Communist organization." But the Governor, fully aware of how preposterous this charge was, and how unethical his interference in a federal judicial question, had been cautious enough to mark his letter "Personal and Confidential."

The second document was a telegram to the Immigration Bureau in Washington, so incautious as to be worth quoting in full:

Having trouble with Jesus Pallares on strike in this county. I understand he is under bond on account of the strike at Gallup, New Mexico, where the sheriff of that county was killed last spring. He is an alien from Old Mexico. We must act at once to save trouble and maybe lives in this county.

Francisco P. Delgado, Sheriff [of San Miguel County].

In four sentences the telegram managed to utter five deliberate falsehoods or innuendoes. 1. The sheriff's trouble was not with Jesús but with the strikers at the American Metals Company's mine at Terrero, New Mexico, who embarrassed him by their accurate shouts of "Scab!" 2. Jesús was not on strike—did not even live in the sheriff's county. 3. Jesús was under bond for deportation, not for strike activity in Gallup or elsewhere. 4. At the time of the death of Gallup's sheriff, Jesús was living 230 miles away in Santa Fe—was totally unconnected with the event. 5. The deportation of Jesús could not possibly save "trouble and maybe lives" so long as the sheriff insisted on breaking the strike by armed force and violence.

Curiously enough, two truths did creep into the sheriff's wire: first, that Jesús was indubitably "an alien from Old Mexico"; second that "we"—that is, New Mexico officials and the Bureau of Immigration—were acting in concert to railroad Jesús out of the country. And they have had their way. Jesús is deported.

New Deal Recovery

By MAXWELL S. STEWART

DESPITE all that Governor Landon and the Liberty League may say between now and November, it is no longer possible to deny that Roosevelt's three years in office have been marked by a vigorous economic recovery. Even the most irreconcilable of the newspapers opposed to the New Deal bear testimony to its success on their financial pages. The recent contra-seasonal boom in the steel industry, accompanied by a substantial improvement in all lines of business activity, has carried the Federal Reserve Board's unadjusted index of production above the 1923-1925 average for the first time since early in 1930. At its present level the index is not only well above the 1930 average but is within five points of that of 1927. By May, industrial production had regained more than 70 per cent of its depression losses, consumer expenditures had recovered 61 per cent, farm income had come back 52 per cent, and department-store sales had won 54 per cent of their lost ground. While it may seem ironical to speak of recovery when more than 11,000,000 Americans are still walking the streets, the fact remains that 6,000,000 men have gone back to work since 1933, and 3,500,000 more have obtained emergency employment under New Deal agencies.

The average voter is not particularly concerned whether or not the Democratic Administration is responsible for these gains. He paid no heed to Hoover's plea in 1932 that the depression was due to world conditions, and he is unlikely to inquire too carefully into the causes of the upswing. Nevertheless, it is an issue on which conscientious citizens must pass judgment. And it is an issue which is unusually baffling because of the complexity of the forces operating within our economic system. The New Deal has never possessed a consistent economic policy. In the effort to stimulate recovery the Administration has experimented with almost every conceivable panacea from tariff reduction and government retrenchment to silver inflation and price fixing. Some of these experiments have been conspicuously successful and others little short of disastrous, but all have been in response to pressure from highly articulate economic groups. If there have been inconsistencies in the New Deal, they have been due to the fundamental divergence of interests among many of these groups.

Monetary Policy. The most urgent pressure on the Administration was to do something for prices. Farmers, businessmen, debtors, and property owners were in a mood to support any measure which promised to halt the relentless march of deflation. It was only natural, therefore, that a gold embargo should be one of President Roosevelt's first official acts. At the time this was believed to be merely an emergency measure, but subsequent events suggest that Mr. Roosevelt had already determined on monetary depreciation as the cornerstone of his recovery program. Unlike Great Britain, the United States was not forced off the gold standard by external pressure. Despite extensive losses in the months just previous to the bank holiday, the gold holdings of the Federal Reserve System on April 19, 1933—the day on which Secretary Woodin announced our departure from the gold standard—were the highest in history, except for a brief period preceding England's suspension of gold payments. But a good share of the American public had inherited a naive faith in monetary nostrums from the days of the Populist and William Jennings Bryan, and it was not interested in the effect of American policy on the outside world. It wanted higher prices, and a cheap dollar was the most obvious means to attain this end.

While the Administration has been unsuccessful in its effort to restore the 1926 price level, no responsible economist would deny that monetary policy has played an important role in stimulating the recovery process. Four years of deflation, with its drastic reduction of wages, prices, and profits, had brought business to a standstill. The abandonment of the gold standard, carrying with it the threat of inflation, induced an orgy of speculative buying which served as an immediate stimulus to the whole economic process. For the first time in years profits surged upward. Business men were able to dispose of their goods at a higher level of prices than that which prevailed when they purchased their raw materials, and were further aided by the fact that wages tended to lag behind advancing prices. Between March and July, 1933, the dollar declined nearly 30 per cent in gold value, wholesale prices rose 15 per cent, and business activity jumped nearly 60 per cent. By mid-July the prospects of immediate inflation began to dim, and the dollar recovered sharply, followed by an even sharper recession in production. With the beginning of September the NRA replaced monetary policy as the primary influence on business; but the devaluation of the dollar at the end of January, 1934, was followed by a second, though milder, boom which laid the basis for the present recovery movement.

As against these gains, the devaluation of the dollar destroyed the last hope of restoring a functioning world economy, aggravated the general trend toward economic nationalism and ultimate war, and laid the foundations, in excess reserves of nearly three billion dollars, for a catastrophic credit inflation.

The AAA. Of all the discontented groups in the country in the spring of 1933, farmers were unquestionably the most vocal. To them the depression was the final blow after years of hardship following the post-war collapse. Yet they had been hit more severely by the crisis than any other important group. Their gross cash income declined from twelve billions in 1929 to barely five in 1932, while their indebtedness remained practically unchanged. The subsequent rise in farm income to eight billion dollars in 1935 cannot be attributed entirely to the AAA. Export commodities like wheat and cotton were immediately responsive to changes in the value of the dollar, while the series of disastrous droughts in the West has eliminated the tremendous carryover which formerly depressed prices. But with due allowance for these factors, it cannot be denied that the restriction of production achieved through AAA policy, the bounties and government purchases of surplus stocks have at least temporarily contributed to saving the American farmer from bankruptcy.

In achieving this a series of complications have been introduced which make the permanent solution of the farm problem more difficult than ever. As a result of the artificial stimulation of American cotton prices, countries like India, Brazil, and China have found it profitable to expand their cotton production until they have taken over a large portion of our foreign market. For the Southeast, already under severe disadvantages in competition with the Southwest, this shift in world demand threatens to be catastrophic—especially for tenants and sharecroppers, who are the true marginal producers. Similarly, the United States appears to have lost the greater part of its once great market for wheat—thus reducing the producers of this basic commodity to a position of more or less permanent dependence on federal charity. Closely associated with this is the still unsolved problem of how to provide American consumers with sufficient purchasing power to absorb the great increase in agricultural production that is needed if the American people are to have an adequate diet.

The NRA. Most heralded and most controversial of all the Administration's recovery measures was the NRA. The National Industrial Recovery Act was essentially an attempt to compromise the demands of labor and business for government aid. It had three objectives: 1. To raise mass purchasing power by increasing wages in advance of prices. 2. To spread work by the shortening of the hours of labor. 3. To eliminate cut-throat competition by concealed price-fixing. The first of these objectives, which was the one most widely advertised, was attained only in a minority of instances. Although there can be no doubt that the codes raised the wages of some groups of workers by more than the increased cost of living, real wages of industrial workers as a whole were actually lower during the early months of the NRA than at the depth of the depression in 1932. Instead of wages rising in advance of prices, as was the theory behind the NRA, price-increases started before the NRA codes were adopted and more than offset the higher wages for most workers. At least a third of the employees of the country were exempt from the jurisdiction of the NRA, and these particularly suffered from the general price increases brought about by the codes.

Although the NRA never put back to work the 4,000,000 persons that General Johnson predicted in the early days of the Blue Eagle, it added about 1,750,000 to the industrial payrolls of the country. This was achieved by lowering the average work week of industrial employees by approximately 6 per cent. Since money wages tended to be increased rather than cut when hours were reduced, hourly wages for the working-class rose by approximately 10 per cent. Weekly earnings, on the other hand, increased only 3 or 4 per cent as compared with an 8 or 10 per cent rise in the cost of living. This left the real wages of the average worker about 5 or 6 per cent lower than before the codes were adopted—which was the price paid for sharing jobs with 1,750,000 newcomers. As far as the workers as a whole were concerned, therefore, the NRA turned out to be little more than a gigantic share-the-work movement, although certain of the most needy groups were undoubtedly benefited from the program. The American Federation of Labor is probably correct when it states that 839,000 workers have been deprived of jobs because of the lengthening of hours since the invalidation of the NRA, but even with these additional hours labor's income has just about kept pace with rising living costs. Out of fairness it should be added that this negative appraisal of the NRA takes no account of the undoubted stimulus to labor organizations obtained from section 7-a of the national recovery act.

It is almost impossible to say how much of the startling increase in business profits which occurred in 1933 and 1934 can be attributed to the NRA. The net income of all corporations operating at a profit showed a rise of 35 per cent in 1933, and 32 per cent in 1934. Excluding utilities and banks, the increase in 1934 over the previous year was 64 per cent. Since labor costs are dependent largely on hourly wage rates, one is probably safe in saying that business earnings did not rise as rapidly as they would have without the NRA, despite the advantage of price-fixing. This conclusion is borne out by a 42 per cent rise in profits in 1935 without the benefit of the codes and a more than 50 per cent increase in the first half of 1936. The fact that in two years of the NRA the business index never touched the pre-NRA level also raises serious doubts regarding the Blue Eagle's merit as a harbinger of recovery.

Government Works and Relief. Conservative critics of the New Deal have directed their attack chiefly on the alleged extravagance of its relief and public-works programs. From the standpoint of efficiency, the record is indeed open to criticism. The Administration would have difficulty in showing a dollar-for-dollar increase in the material wealth of the United States to compensate for the eight billions appropriated for the various public-works programs. It has fallen down completely in the case of housing. Although vast housing projects were to have been the backbone of the recovery program, less than seventy millions were actually spent for this purpose in the first three years. And all the projects now under way will provide accommodations for only about 20,000 of the 15,000,000 families who are now living in homes which fail to come up to minimum housing standards. On other types of public works the Administration's record is only slightly better. We find, for example, that in April, 1936—after three years of the New Deal—only 265,000 persons were employed on PWA projects.

As far as the emergency was concerned it did not really matter whether the government obtained value received for every dollar it spent. What counted was whether the money was actually being distributed to the needy. Here the Administration's record is somewhat more satisfactory. The CWA, the FERA, and the WPA have varied considerably in different localities and under changing rulings, but they at least have served a useful purpose in providing aid for millions of needy families and in thus increasing consumer purchasing power at the point that it was most needed.

The Silver Program. Of all the New Deal policies, the silver-buying program is the most obvious illustration of the Administration's largesse to highly organized minorities. Under the guise of raising the purchasing power of the vast populations of India and China and of strengthening monetary reserves, Congress passed a bill on June 19, 1934, authorizing the Treasury to purchase silver on the world market at a price not to exceed $1.29 an ounce. Subsequently, the United States launched an aggressive buying policy which ran the world price up to eighty-one cents an ounce from the twenty-six-cent level which had prevailed early in 1933. Thereupon Mexico was forced to abandon the silver standard, and various South American countries and China took measures to prevent the export of silver. Frightened by the disastrous effect of its policy abroad, the Treasury curtailed its purchases and the price collapsed, leaving the United States holding the bag with hundreds of millions of ounces of silver purchased at higher levels. Even today the government is paying seventy-seven and one-half cents an ounce for domestic silver which is worth forty-five cents on the world market. And owing to large gold imports in the past year, the Treasury is farther from its avowed objective of maintaining a quarter of its reserves in silver than it was before the program was launched.

Tariff Policy. The Administration's tariff policy is particularly significant in that it represents a direct reversal of the policies of the preceding Republican administrations. It places the interests of consumers, exporters, and farmers ahead of the highly organized industrial interests. It is also important as the one phase of New Deal policy that is not avowedly nationalistic in its conception. Unfortunately, only a handful of reciprocal agreements have been concluded under the new program, and most of these have been in effect such a short time that it is difficult to pass judgment regarding their value. Where preliminary figures are available, there has been in each instance at least a slight gain in both imports and exports. The rise in imports has been particularly impressive and important as a means of correcting our top-heavy trade balance, but it is difficult to say how much of this increase may be attributed to the drought, how much to general economic recovery, and how much to the reduction in duties under the various trade agreements. Nevertheless, the new policy has aided in halting the pell-mell stampede toward economic nationalism. It has also served a useful purpose in removing tariff action from the realm of Congressional log-rolling and substituting more scientific means of determining tariff rates through administrative agencies. These gains were largely offset, however, when the Administration ignored the recommendations of the Tariff Commission and invoked new trade restrictions on imports from Germany and Japan under the anti-dumping provisions of the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

The conflict between immediate domestic pressures and the conditions for a stabilized economy has been apparent in all phases of New Deal policy. In 1933 the President was faced with a choice between attempting to restore the international economic system with its self-regulating mechanism and creating a national economy in which the old controls—that is, gold and capital movements—were no longer operative. The old system had broken down, partly because of the unwillingness of the United States to assume the responsibilities of a creditor nation, and partly because mass purchasing power failed to keep pace with production. In rejecting monetary stabilization at the London Conference, Mr. Roosevelt cut loose from the traditional system and embarked on the uncharted sea of national economic organization. Having turned aside from financial orthodoxy, it was not particularly difficult to find means for temporarily stimulating buying power. The question is whether in tampering with the balance wheel which the gold standard offered he has not created a series of new problems more difficult than the old. Devaluation has increased the deflationary pressure on the gold countries and is directly responsible for our huge immobilized gold stocks with their tremendous inflationary possibilities. The AAA has wiped out a large part of the foreign market for our chief agricultural commodities; and the Administration's relief and work programs have left us a heritage of debt as a burden on production.

RECOVERY

INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES

Meanwhile, the New Deal has done nothing to correct the inequality of wealth which has created our present insecurity. With the self-adjusting mechanism of the old system gone, economic stability can only be achieved by regulating the stream of mass purchasing power so as to prevent the accumulation of surpluses. The Social Security Act is a gesture in this direction, but its benefits are so limited, the period of payment so brief, and the coverage so inadequate that it falls far short of the need. To assure an uninterrupted flow of real income to the masses of the population, the funds for social security and relief purposes must obviously be drawn from groups who otherwise would not utilize their full income for living purposes. This the New Deal has ignored for very obvious political reasons.

The Democratic platform might have been more restrained in claiming credit for the upturn of the past few years if the voters as a whole were more familiar with the recovery record in other countries, many of which have pursued policies diametrically opposed to the New Deal. When we congratulate ourselves that the American index of business activity has climbed to within 15 per cent of the 1929 level, we forget that Great Britain is 15 per cent above that level; and that despite the severe crisis of 1930-1931, Japanese industry is 50 per cent over the 1929 average. Sweden's industry is also 10 per cent more active than seven years ago, while Denmark has gained 25 per cent. France, the Netherlands, and Poland, on the other hand, are still 20-25 per cent below normal. Generalizations are notoriously dangerous, but it is impossible to avoid noticing that all of the countries which have progressed beyond the 1929 standard have depreciated currencies and that the countries which have clung to gold are still in the throes of depression. Except for Belgium and Czecho-Slovakia, the United States has the poorest record of any country with a devalued currency. While it would not be wise to push the point too far, the inference is that apart from devaluation the New Deal policies have been of very dubious value. Possibly a reservation should be made regarding public-works expenditures, since Sweden and Germany, as well as the United States, have apparently been benefited by large-scale government spending. But apart from these temporary and necessarily limited devices, there is no evidence that the alphabetical magic of the New Deal has solved the basic problems of capitalism.

Election Forecasts

By AL GRAHAM

(Mr. Graham was sent by The Nation to interview a group of political experts on the prospects of the election. In presenting their views we want to make clear that they are not necessarily our own. Editors The Nation.)

SENATOR CONSOMME: Landon will be defeated by at least a billion votes. Don't ask me how I arrived at this figure. All I know is that if it isn't a billion these days, it isn't a figure.

CONGRESSMAN BEIGE: Landon will carry the East, sweep the West, surprise the South, and give Coney Island something to think about. You know the old adage: "As goes Coney Island, so goes Luna Park."

FORMER MAYOR MCPLUMP: The Yankees can't lose. With boys like LaMaggio, DeGehrig, and O'Gomez they can't lose. Incidentally, who are they playing?

FORMER MAYOR WHITHER: Go away and let me wilt, singing willow, tit-willow, tit-wilt.

CIRCEAN J. DEBACLE, Radio Commenator: I favor Landon over Knox, Martin Van Buren over James K. Polk, and Moon over Miami. B-U-L-O-V-A Hamilton Watch Time Marches ON!

CONGRESSMAN PEACHY: Home is where the heart is. Every cloud has a silver lining. As ye sow, so shall ye reap. Politics makes strange bedfellows. Seven, come eleven!

E. J. MAYHAP, Economist: I predict a $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{victory} \\ \text{defeat} \end{array} \right\}$ for the $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{Landon} \\ \text{Roosevelt} \end{array} \right\}$ forces, with $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{Knox} \\ \text{Garner} \end{array} \right\}$ winning the Vice-Presidency. Vote for one.

E. J. LUCID, Statistician: Kansas, with a Republican majority of .078 in the last straw vote, will probably go to Hoover and Dawes. Missouri, according to the Literary Digest poll, should elect Funk & Wagnalls. That leaves Vermont as the only doubtful state, with 000 omitted.

E. J. PELLICLE, Political Analyst: Of course, the Democratic platform includes a mean average rainfall plank; but this is offset by the Republican plank providing for a daily high and low tide. If the third party expects to get anywhere, it can't overlook the platform possibilities of the much-maligned ring around the moon.

EX-SENATOR DISSONANCE: The only thing the New Deal Has given us is a game called "What's This?" By the way, what's this?

EX-CONGRESSMAN HANDIES: What this country needs is a New Deal with teeth in it. Something that could be sung to the tune of "O Susanna, don't chew pine for me; I'm off for Alabama with bicuspid on my knee."

EX-CONGRESSMAN FOOTIES: Or how about a song called "Three false fangs! See how they bite! See how they bite!"

EX-CONGRESSMAN GREASE: Slogans, bah! Songs, phooey! Mud will win the war! It's good to the last sling!

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE tragedy of Geneva is really beyond describing. But this much is clear: If the League perishes the responsibility rests squarely with the men, mis-called statesmen, who have ruled England and France. I have carefully read Eden's and Baldwin's speeches announcing the great surrender. They have left me totally unconvinced. Baldwin bravely says that he does not care if others beside Lloyd George call him a miserable coward; he prefers that to war. Both men say England has no reason to be ashamed. It gave a lead to the League, but it did not dominate it or dictate to it. They are certain that sanctions could not have been better enforced or Ethiopia restored without war for which they admit England was not prepared and nobody desired. It is quite too bad that the Italian armies succeeded so amazingly quickly, but that was not the fault of the League. So sanctions are called off and Mussolini is given the victory and let us now plan how to strengthen the League—probably by doing away with the very power to declare and enforce sanctions!

To Haile Selassie's noble, eloquent, and touching appeal for aid and justice no answer is given because none could be. His statements cannot be controverted nor the complete justice to his cause denied. If he and his people have been outraged, robbed, abandoned, and dispossessed, why let us forget all about them. Better luck next time. Let's see if we cannot patch up some device which will work another day, even if the chief backers of sanctions are then as hypocritical, as cowardly, and as stupid as those of France and England this time. So the robber and rapist, the violator of treaties, the murderer of men, women, and children by poison gas, goes scot free. It is even decided to dodge the question of recognizing the crime as an accepted fact and of its validation by diplomatic recognition. I submit that nothing more shocking can be found in the annals of modern history. One dictator is allowed to defy and defeat not only the League, which had given him a careful trial, heard all the evidence, and found him guilty on every count, but the public opinion of the world. What can we say to youth in the face of this? Can we assert that the world is ruled by a benign Providence or that the present rulers of the great nations involved are worthy of anything else than utter contempt? Certainly we cannot deny that the worst offenders are the successors of Gladstone, who put the moral weight of England on the side of the Armenians, and Campbell-Bannerman, who dared to defy public opinion by his opposition to the Boer War waged by his own country.

For the first time in the memory of man we have seen English statesmen tremblingly hoist the white flag because of the threat of a nation running amok. Then, I hear it said, you wanted war? Of course not. My opposition to all war is unshakable as long as breath remains to me. I wanted no battleships sent to the Mediterranean. I agree with my friend, Lord Ponsonby, who in a recent admirable speech in the House of Lords said: "Every man, ship, aeroplane, tank, or bomb that you add and that you spend your treasures upon is bringing you nearer the tragedy of war. I say that, not only of this country, but of every country." It was a fatal mistake to send England's mightiest battleships to the Mediterranean. It provoked Mussolini to threaten war; it might easily, as everybody admits, have caused war. Baldwin and Eden insist now that the English were not ready for war and did not desire war in any case. Then, why, in God's name, did they court it? Nothing could illustrate more clearly the crass stupidity of the Baldwin government. Is it responsible statesmanship to send your ships to the Mediterranean to be ready for war or provoke it when your country will not fight?

Any responsible statesman embarking upon the sanctions policy would have weighed the consequences, would have considered in advance every possible contingency, including the speedy military victory of Italy, and would have thought out what would take place in that event. But, says Baldwin, all the military men assured us that that could not happen. Possibly they did in London—but not in Berlin. There the officers especially assigned to follow the Italian campaign pronounced it admirably planned and certain to succeed promptly. The excuse is only an indictment when one considers the horrible blunders of the British brass hats during the World War. It was Baldwin's and Eden's duty to be ready to face just such an event or not go in for sanctions at all. Yet these are the men who tell England that now she must prepare for war as never before!

What was needed was a resolute determination to impose no sanctions unless oil and other raw materials were included and then to follow up this move by the withdrawal of all ambassadors and consuls from Italy and all foreigners residing there save those wishing to remain at their own peril. Still other peaceful boycott measures were available. But the determination to win was not in the hearts of the British or French leaders. They should never have tried the new weapon of sanctions unless they were sure of themselves and their program. They hoped that it would not explode in their hands. It did and it has blown English prestige sky high, and perhaps destroyed the new peace machinery as well. Never has Britain's national stock stood so low; never has its empire been in such danger of collapsing. But the most horrible thing about it remains that the very measures Baldwin is taking to prevent war are certain to bring those airplanes over London of which he admits—for Hitler's information—he is deathly afraid.

ELISHA HANSON, who is very largely neglecting his utility practice these days in order to defend the freedom of the press, made an interesting address last week at the Bucknell University Summer School in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania. Mr. Hanson is general counsel for the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. He is an extremely able lawyer and lobbyist and palpably devoted to the cause of the clients whom he serves. They in return are devoted to Elisha, and in recent years he expresses even more closely than Walter Lippmann the point of view of the newspaper owners of America. Besides, Mr. Lippmann is on a vacation. When the freedom of the press seems at stake Mr. Hanson never sleeps, or if he naps he keeps his boots on and hangs his pants beside the bed.

Right now Mr. Hanson spies a new danger which he calls "propaganda." According to the lawyer it was practically unknown until George Creel was put at the head of the Committee on Public Information during the war. But now Elisha Hanson sees it sneaking up on unwary publishers from all sides, trying to slip into the news columns material which should have been carried around to the counting house and paid for at the usual advertising rates. He included among the groups which would take advantage of newspaper generosity in this matter, "business, trade unionism, farmer pressure organizations, social workers, religious workers, women's clubs, political parties, and the agencies of the New Deal."

To some extent I agree with Mr. Hanson. For instance, I have never cared much for the religious pages in American newspapers. I have seen long extracts printed from sermons which most certainly were not news. I am again in agreement about "women's clubs." Indeed I think Mr. Hanson might well have gone much further in this respect. A very heavy percentage of the material printed under the head, "Society," is pure puffery. There are even papers where "Society" is made up wholly of those near and dear to the advertisers. But, on the other hand, I think Mr. Hanson is wrong in citing the labor movement as something which has no right of access to the newspapers save through the purchase of advertising space. To be sure, he has not elaborated his position and I am not quite certain where he would draw his line. I cannot help suspecting that Elisha Hanson and others interested in newspaper prosperity have been thinking over the recent venture of the Steel Institute into national advertising. The sum spent for the full page advertisements in more than three hundred papers has been estimated as running anywhere from a quarter to a half million dollars. As advertising campaigns go this is mere small change, but it is one of the largest handouts I have ever known in the American newspaper business where no sale of a product was even indirectly concerned.

In explaining his position in the matter of news and advertising Mr. Hanson is quoted in the Herald Tribune as saying, "Each one of these groups is constantly trying to get its message across to the public. Each of them would, if it could, get that message across through the newspapers of this country. No one of them is content to sell its propaganda through the advertising columns of the newspapers. Rather all prefer the less expensive and more effective method of getting their messages into the news columns themselves."

But I am still curious to know just what Mr. Hanson's definition may be as to what is news and what is propaganda. Eugene Grace of the Steel Institute and John L. Lewis of the United Mine Workers of America vary in their idea as to the proper method of organizing the workers in the steel industry. Are their views on this matter news or not? Does each side get one bite and then no more? To some extent the Steel Institute has admitted the validity of the Newspaper Publishers' position as expressed by Elisha Hanson. It has already spent several hundreds of thousands of dollars to state its case in the advertising columns. But is this a wholly satisfactory or even fair method? The United Mine Workers constitute a powerful union with a large reserve fund in their treasury, but they can hardly afford to match dollar for dollar with the five-billion-dollar organization such as the Steel Institute.

And taking the problem into other channels, would Mr. Hanson think that a union of share-croppers should remain unmentioned in the American newspapers unless it goes out and buys advertising space? And how about a union of reporters? As a matter of fact, a few papers have given a good deal of space to the guild in their news columns. In New York the Times and the Evening Post have been conspicuously fair. No matter what the story, the Sun seldom goes beyond referring to "a newspaper organization" and it very rarely goes that far. In New York the Hearst press does not mention the guild. The Times carried two and a half columns on a story about the National Labor Relations Board and the Associated Press when the decision was rendered that Morris Watson had been discharged on account of guild activity. The Sun carried nothing. One of them must be wrong.

American publishers and editors have a delicate problem on their hands. It has been the custom to take money from John Doe, the Democratic candidate for Governor, and let him praise himself in advertising space plainly labeled as such. Naturally it has been the custom to take money from Richard Roe, the Republican candidate, on precisely the same basis. But the editors and publishers will have to draw a line somewhere. The Steel Institute can buy a full page advertisement for one issue. But suppose it wants to buy a page a day for an entire year? Wouldn't anybody feel that this was decidedly unfair whether the space was paid for or not? HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

SOVIET ART—A LETTER FROM TIFLIS

BY EMMA L. DAVIS

Tiflis, U. S. S. R.

IT IS a year now since I came to Soviet Russia to see how the plastic arts were being developed under socialism, how the artists organize, and what helpful things might be learned and brought back to our own artists. The plain truth is that over here I have seen more to be avoided than followed in the arts. Graphic work excepted—I shall speak of that later—the general level of painting and sculpture is appalling: muddy-colored illustrations and smeary, soggy plaster busts. A few people are "not bad," but this to me is even more dreary. The only exception I saw to this rule was the work of the sculptor Dmitri Tsaplin, but he is so entirely an individual, a harsh and earnest shaper of stone, that he proves nothing about the tendencies affecting lesser people.

Why, with every advantage of work, freedom of subject, and official patronage, does the Russian artist produce bad work? I believe it is because he falls between two stools: between what he is and was trained to be, and the amazing, sprouting life of which he is supposed to be the interpreter. In a nutshell, the Russian artist is a petit bourgeois from a stodgy academy, while Soviet life—the realest and best of it—is socialist.

The Soviet Union is an astonishing hodge-podge of the old and the new: superstition, invention, shopkeeper fearfulness, frontier bravado, solid merit, and worthless junk. All are to be found in any country, quieter, beneath. But here all are in the limelight. I landed in Moscow in the middle of the upheaval, with few letters of introduction and not many more words of Russian. The first item on my program was to find a—or the—artists' organization. And right here I discovered a grave shortcoming of the average Russian—no one could tell us who or where the artists were. Unfortunately the three slogans of the populace still are "Never mind," "Tomorrow," and "I don't know." Two weeks of stalking finally revealed a Society of Revolutionary (it ought to be written Reactionary) Artists.

I took my membership card from the New York Artists' Union, photographs of my work, and a letter from the Soviet Embassy in Washington, and feeling well armed, stormed the place. The only people about were a critic named Dourous, and a smug fellow with bedroom eyes. They were very polite and enthusiastic and evasive. I took their persiflage in earnest, partly because I understood Russian so little, partly because I was green and thought that all the professed Communists over here were the real thing. After a second and a third visit, when not one question had been answered, I lost patience. These were precisely the sort of people I had left New York to get away from—bourgeois hangers-on of the arts, if anything a bit worse than the domestic product because they substituted for positive bad qualities the negative ones of evasiveness and fearfulness.

They were afraid of me because I had not come with letters from American revolutionary organizations: a thing I could not then have sincerely managed as I did not know what my beliefs were on the subject. Let me say here that fear of this sort, so typical of the Russian bourgeois (though he may even belong to the party) is never found in the class-conscious worker, who is eager, direct, and conscious of freedom.

I tried another tack. A new friend introduced me to a well-known painter who managed to jockey me into an art organization—with difficulty, for I was "modern" and the Soviet Union is still in antimacassars. My heart sank when I saw the sort of things they liked—Sunday School trophies and Civil War memorials. There was a potter in the crowd who made vases and ash trays covered with a brown glaze with a purple glint in it—was it meant for a copper luster?—and with metallic blisters on the shoulders. He was clapped on the back and called a great master. They all drank much tea and ate many expensive cakes and talked inexhaustibly. There was not a craftsman as far as the eye could reach.

However, they gave me a visa and a contract and I tried it for a month. They did not like the piece I made for them. I cannot blame them much. I decided to get away from the whole second-hand-Paris, thirty-years-ago atmosphere; so I signed up on the Metrostroy, the Moscow subway, as an ordinary laborer. This was different and real, and I caught at least a glimpse of the good thing that is being done with people here.

To go back to the arts, things are quite as bad here in Tiflis. There is no taste, there is no standard, and junk is the order of the day. Nervous bourgeois gentlemen, quaking lest they do the wrong thing politically, sit in offices such as that of the Art Kombinat, in a helpless turmoil of telephone calls, questions, requests, expostulations, and delayed pay rolls, unable to do anything but roll up their eyes, shrug their shoulders, turn out their palms, and say "Tomorrow." They will all slide to hell on tomorrow.

Meanwhile the shop in front of this madhouse sells a naive but willing public statuettes of pioneers painted with metallic colors, ash-trays with puppies eating from them, clay pots painted in oil colors by a lady artist with crude imitations of Greek and Egyptian patterns, and a whole window full of cheap jimcracks.

Not long after I wrote this last paragraph I was in the corner Gastronom, or grocery store, where I saw something very fine—simply a stack of goods on display—tins of egg plant with labels of brownish paper, irregularly bricked up with round blue and white cartons of Gruyère cheese. On top of the column was a white glazed jug of liqueur. It was a first class still life; it had color and variety of form, and the textures were admirable. It was right in the day's work, too.

Posters are also excellent. In the Chamber of Commerce in Moscow you can see truer and technically far better pictures of the life and feeling of the country than in the Tretyakoff Gallery, which has served Russia as a receiving vault for all the second-rate illustration since the last of the Ikons.

Another field of excellence is graphic work, book illustrations, and jackets. The Russians make wood blocks as delicate as seals, but with fine, solid spacing of the black and white. Very imaginative. Equally fine are drawings in pencil and litho. It does not much matter what they use; the ideas and the material employed to convey them spin out together as simply and rightly as yarn from a hank of fleece. There is talent aplenty here. What becomes of it when it tries its hand at Art with the big A?

The fault would seem to lie with bad personnel and tradition. When the shade of la Rive Gauche has been laid to rest with all the little painters who admired Bastien Lepage, when living conditions are fuller and more secure, and when propaganda is no longer defensive, then a new tide may be expected to rise and swamp the academies—a tide of the people, strong, sincere, and fresh. I think of it whenever I hear the soldiers singing as they clump through the streets. A chantey man sings out the verse and then the three-part chorus crashes in. The peculiarly Russian harmonies suddenly widen and narrow. The tenor voice comes out alone for a second in a queer, wild curl, and then the other parts lift under it at a full yell. Let people who feel that be trained in the other arts, with an experimental point of view, with sound workmanship, and they can do anything—at least in the Soviet Union, where the artist is not laughed at or wondered at but made use of.

Men of Good Will: Volume V.

THE EARTH TREMBLES. By Jules Romain. Translated by Gerard Hopkins. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

ALMOST everybody who has read what M. Romain has so far published of his "Men of Good Will" is agreed that it is an important undertaking, but there is less agreement as to just how important it is, or in just what its chief importance lies. Naturally, since the work is but half-complete, all judgments are provisional, but by now some of the questions we have raised are beginning to be answered. We have caught the measure of M. Romain's ability; we have roughly grasped the tempo and proportions of the work; we have a pretty good notion of his fictional and historical intentions. But concerning the most important thing of all, his philosophic intentions, his point of view, we are still in the dark; and until we know, we cannot hope to interpret and evaluate "Men of Good Will"

with any assurance of being relevant, let alone being right. I for one should not like to guess as to precisely what Romain is trying to say or, faced by so many characters and incidents, through whom and what he is principally trying to say it.

Nevertheless, one has by now begun to take M. Romain's virtues, simply as a novelist, for granted—to count on him to provide us with lifelike characters, sound motivations, dramatic scenes, convincing crises—and to concentrate our attention on Romain the social historian. We cannot help knowing, at least, that he is writing a work whose prime importance is its social importance, whose people have come to signify society in the modern world, and whose dependence upon factual reality is quite as great as its dependence upon the impetus of art. The skeleton for clothing "Men of Good Will" is not the familiar literary "notebook" of Flaubert or Henry James or Gide—though of course the foreplanning of a work like this must have been prodigious—but the French equivalent of something so factual and journalistic as Mark Sullivan's "Our Times." We are working with a novelist who must, if he wants to produce a living and revealing whole, remember things perhaps even oftener than he invents them. For he is striving creatively within an orbit of already created things; he is bringing his artistic determination to bear against what, socially speaking, history has already determined.

All the emphasis, for me at least, in this fifth American volume of the work, falls not on the personal but on the social and historical side of the picture: the railway strike of 1910, the maneuvering of armament makers, the formation and fall of cabinets, the impact of Left sentiment, the experience of undercover political workers, the details of Franco-German diplomacy, the imminence of war. We have thus penetrated into the main stream of the period, we are among people who are consciously playing their part in history-making. What we are given of their private lives is considerable and all to the good; but it comes second. It has the value of keeping us in the fluid human world which the novel, if it is to be a valid novel, is obligated to portray; and it has the further and, in this case perhaps, greater value of contrasting the world of the fireside, with its emotions and sensibilities and unique adventures, with the world of affairs, so pat, so shabby and, despite all the power it has to determine men's fates, so shallow.

Where all this will lead, what it will add up to, is of the greatest interest. It would seem to be leading us to see by what misdirections and mistakes capitalist civilization has hastened its collapse: it may even make us see that by whatever route it traveled, capitalist civilization was doomed to collapse. On the other hand M. Romain may do no more than sum up impartially all the thinking and action, all the points of view, proceeding out of modern life in France, and leave us, map in hand, to draw our own conclusions. That is all, so far, that he has given definite evidence of doing. That has been enough, of course, to prove his familiarity with all shades of thought, all ways of life, in pre-war France, and to express them with intelligence and irony.

Artistically, I doubt whether we shall be able to judge "Men of Good Will," when it is complete, as we have judged the novel, even the long novel, even the Proustian novel, in the past. It already constitutes, by the old standards, an impure esthetic experience. It is so cross-sectional, so expansive, so centrifugal in method as to violate the spirit of the novel as one of the time-arts. We feel more strongly that we are cutting across something than that we are going somewhere. And so we feel that Romain, for all his gifts of observation, invention, verisimilitude, psychological insight, is preparing for us a great document rather than a great novel. To date "Men of Good Will" is too expert, too clever for "art," but it is thoroughly in keeping with a minute investigation of the social fabric. Though he works on a scale which will always be rare with writers, Romaine is possibly the first to show us the implications of the social fiction of the future—where the creative impulse as we conceive it will only rewrite the realities of history, instead of using them as starting points or points of departure.

Without Benefit of Politics

TRUTH AND REALITY, A LIFE HISTORY OF THE HUMAN WILL. By Otto Rank. Authorized translation from the German, with a preface, by Dr. Jessie Taft. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

WILL THERAPY, AN ANALYSIS OF THE THERAPEUTIC PROCESS IN TERMS OF RELATIONSHIP. Authorized translation from the German, with a preface and introduction, by Dr. Jessie Taft. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

ONE can with much "truth" view life as a race, a fight, a ship setting sail, a business enterprise, a search for solace (man as valetudinarian), a nightmare ("fitful fever"), a recruiting of one's band, a building of a house, the paying of debts, and so on. One may consider it, with the churchmen, as a "preparation." Or one may prefer Goethe's secularized equivalent of preparation—with man having the vocation of eternal student, passing from apprenticeship to journeyman-ship, and incorporating the ideal end in the name chosen for his artistic identity, "Will Master."

Thus, one must also admit into the pantheon of metaphors Dr. Otto Rank's apparent preference for looking upon life as an endless dying and being born. Particularly in an era like ours, beset by conditions of crisis, we may note the relevance of a perspective shaped by an emphasis upon the "trauma of birth." On every side one picks up books wherein one finds authors symbolically slaying some portion of the self. Some men would even revise their family trees, treating their actual forbears as bar sinister and putting an ideal ancestry in their stead. After Byron, there have been many forms of symbolic regicide, as old authorities are deposed for new. Gide seems to identify his deepest sympathies with the role of bastard. Even those who talk of "evolution" are stressing the state of emergence, the process of "struggling to be born," though they mitigate the emphasis of those who talk of "revolution," a more dramatic and traumatic form of birth (the "r" being added to indicate the growl of the class struggle).

But though one must salute the relevance of Dr. Rank's key metaphor, one may not be so happy with the use he has made of it. Unless the reader is willing, as he reads, to supply supplementary material of his own, the contents may seem to him as remote as some primitive creation myth or as the weirdly fanciful structures of a Plotinus. Redemption, guilt, death, God, separation—the overtones of the vocabulary are almost those of the funeral oration. And one cannot help feeling that much of the anguish with which the author deals derives from that luxurious form of unemployment we call leisure.

It is my impression that the word "politics" does not occur once in these many hundred pages. In fact, there is not even an oblique handling of mass phenomena in any form, be it only a crowd at a football game. Dr. Rank completes the individualistic emphasis. His "analysis of the therapeutic process in terms of relationship" is focused within the limits of a private interchange between patient and doctor. The curative power of collective manifestations is given honorable mention, but no technique is offered whereby the private therapeutic situation shades into relationships outside the study. The infant seems to profit by a kind of "tapering off" whereby the change from a completely gratifying existence to an existence with resistances, is gradual. But Dr. Rank offers no "bridge" from the study to life, except the upbuilding of the patient's "will." Is it possible that he should be analyzed for the presence of unconscious cruelty in the way he dwells upon the thought of shoving the patient from the therapeutic nest, as though he resented the function of therapy-motherhood the patient-child had forced upon him? Freud, sturdy patriarch, wanted to retain his authority over his patients, in the form of the ideology he gave them. This may explain the fact that his disciples so often think of themselves as "splitting off" from him, rather than as carrying on the torch. But in any case, I think that Dr. Rank underrates the Freudian emphasis in this respect. To give a man a philosophy is to make him obedient and independent both, since he can respond to its authority even while manipulating it in ways peculiar to himself.

Dr. Rank devotes many pages to an explanation of the differences between his approach and that of Freud. In the course of doing so, he unintentionally discloses at least that Freud is the superior as a dramatist, and dramatics is by no means an unimportant aspect of cure. But whatever the reader may think of Rank's additions and revisions, there is a point of view that can make them look very much alike. Thus, after condemning Freud for his great stress upon the "infantile," Dr. Rank finally settles down to handling everything in terms of "birth trauma." For a time he proposes to avoid this by centering his attention upon the artist, which is certainly a more adult emphasis. But even when approaching human relationships with the metaphor of the artist in the foreground, he typically stresses the individualistically "creative" aspect of the artist to the neglect of the collectivistically "communicative" aspect. And eventually the artist is found to have dropped away, and the "birth trauma" becomes the focus of attention.

Freud's and Rank's emphasis seem equally "infantile" in the sense that they consider human relationships in terms of non-political or pre-political coordinates (quite as the child himself does). Both lack the Aristotelian emphasis upon the forensic that must figure largely in our dealings with contemporary reality (and that Dr. Rank himself might have come upon, had he persisted in his approach through art). Both lack even the Church's emphasis upon institutions (in incipiently political form) that identify us as members of corporate units. Both deal with psychological forms at too great remove from the economic and vocational realities.

It seems that, where Dr. Rank's system of therapy succeeds, it succeeds because it is simply one more way of doing what successful therapies have always done—i.e., it gives the patient an attitude, filled out with documentary substance, that enables him to be humble and self-reliant simultaneously. The question is whether the substance, as presented exclusively in infantile, pre-political, non-forensic, non-economic material, is sufficient to enable us to encompass our full contemporary situation with accuracy. Somewhat inclining toward Freudian patriarchalism, I like to think that a philosophy ("ideology") equips a man by giving him both a father-authority and an instrument for him to use with independence. But psychoanalysis must face another birth trauma, so modifying its identity as integrally to encompass economic and forensic thought. The Marxist challenge suggests that it does not encompass enough—hence the man who takes this philosophy as his father-principle may be like the man of whom it was said that he had a dumb pap.

KENNETH BURKE

Essays at Random

ESSAYS IN APPRECIATION. By John Livingston Lowes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

UNDER a title pleasantly reminiscent of Pater, the author of the incomparable "Road to Xanadu" gives us six long papers on subjects ranging from the Bible to Amy Lowell. The range itself is not more remarkable than the inclusion, as the very meat of the sandwich, of two essays dealing with the poetry of Hardy and of Meredith. It is rare enough in these days to find a reader of Meredith. When found, he turns out as often as not to have read "Richard Feverel" in college and "The Egoist" on a steamer. Mr. Lowes is a discriminating devotee and his ever-nuanced and familiarly roaming remarks contain two excellent points. He stresses the vigor, luminosity, and accuracy of Meredith's "reading of earth," and by extending this happy title phrase borrowed from Meredith himself he contrasts these qualities with those of Hardy's verse—a no less accurate but a much less sunlit and buoyant view of Nature. At the end of his book, Mr. Lowes comes back to the charge and demonstrates, by reprinting in verse form short prose passages from the novels, that Meredith is an unacknowledged imagist. Students of Harrison Ross Steeves will recall his own reading of Meredithian prose after that of a Walt Whitman poem to show the just value of mechanical definitions of poetry.

Hardy fares equally well at the hands of the critic, who proves himself thereby no less catholic than penetrating. One would expect it of a man who in dealing with Coleridge revealed his romanticism, in the sense of perceiving the greatness and wretchedness of man. Lowes says himself: "To love both Meredith and Hardy is more than a test of catholicity. It means possession of the power to appreciate at once the poignant beauty and the nameless dread that hand in hand walk with us through the world."

When it comes to the Bible the reader may feel that Mr. Lowes is a trifle bowed down by centuries of admiration. They do lend something to the object, as Hazlitt said, but why is the Bible the noblest monument of English prose? Because so many of its expressions have passed into everyday speech? But these are most often misquotations, and Mr. Lowes is guilty of one himself. Because of the moral fervor that breathes through the imagery? But that imagery can be considered fulsome and the fervor fanatical. Because of its influence on other prose writers? But was this greater than that of the Renaissance dramatists who preceded it or of Addison who followed? Certainly the jargon which comes from imitating the King James version and gives us morsels like the Lang, Leaf, and Myers translation of the "Iliad" is to be deplored and subtracted from the total of "great good influence." Ruskin's admirable prose is often called Biblical and adduced as proof of derived merit, but it really bears little resemblance to the Hampton Court gentlemen's pomp and circumstance. It is exceedingly direct and colloquial, and the big guns that boom in it now and again could be echoes of Marlowe as well as of the royal scribes. Mr. Lowes's adoration of the English dress given the sacred Book has one other weak spot. He tells us of the "inexpugnable racial tendency of the Hebrew mind to express not only emotions but ideas in apt and telling imagery." That "racial tendency" is suspect a priori, but let it pass; it is absurd because logically it makes all poets Hebrews while it asserts the doubtful proposition that all Hebrews were poets.

The penultimate essay, on Amy Lowell, is more than charitable; it is sympathetic. It shows a wide knowledge of her work though it omits—is it conscious choice?—all mention of her

BIRTH CONTROL

IT comes as a startling fact to many couples who THINK they are well-informed, that they ARE in REALITY, AMAZINGLY IGNORANT OF THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE. "When no trouble is taken to learn how to make sexual intercourse harmonious and happy, a variety of complications arise. Very often wives remain sexually unawakened, and therefore inclined to dislike sexual intercourse. When that happens, husbands do not experience what they long for, and are apt to be sexually starved. Neither husbands nor wives on these terms attain to harmony, and the result is nervous ill-health. . . . The cause of all this is not want of love. It is want of knowledge."—A. H. Gray, M.A., D.D.

"FROM a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly." Many men feel bitter, in a resigned sort of way, about their "frigid wives." As a matter of fact this problem, which too often is one of the "bungling husband," frequently vanishes completely when both husband and wife know exactly what to do for each other. IN THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE, Dr. Hutton describes the sexual act in such detail that no one need any longer remain in ignorance of exactly how it should be performed. In the foreword to this work Dr. Ira S. Wile declares: "A knowledge of the science of mating offers greater assurance of successful marriage."

WHILE completely frank, Dr. Hutton handles the subject with excellent taste, and, as the American Medical Association says, "with good judgment as to what constitutes general medical opinion."

The Sex Technique in Marriage is a book for husbands and wives to read together, if they wish to remain together!

Political History: Old Style

THE STORY OF CONGRESS. By Ernest Sutherland Bates. Harper and Brothers. $3.

SINCE the publication of his history of Congress, Mr. Bates has already been taken to task by spokesmen for the professional historians and political scientists. The historians, as usual, are prepared to quarrel with his interpretation of this or that fact or character in American history while the political scientists apparently object that he has not attempted an analysis of Congress as an institution—as a mechanism in the general scheme of American government. Studies of this type are naturally very popular among political scientists, and when they are intelligently done sometimes result in books that, far from being dry as dust, are commentaries of great interest and penetration. But a man may justly choose to write his own kind of book, and Mr. Bates may justly contend that an institutional treatment of Congress would be superfluous. There are already available at least two classics in this category, Woodrow Wilson's "Congressional Government" and Lindsay Rogers's "The American Senate," as well as George Rothwell Brown's excellent book "The Leadership of Congress."

The real objection to Mr. Bates's book is that it is such a poor example of what it is apparently intended to be, and it is to be suspected from his preface that probably nobody knows this better than Mr. Bates himself. He has aimed to produce "a modest record of the doings of Congress for the information of the general reader." What has been said and done in the halls of Congress is to be recounted for his delectation, and Mr. Bates proceeds to do so after a fashion, Congress by Congress! His generous vest pocket edition of the Congressional Record makes, however, rather desultory reading. The trouble is that he has no real stomach for the job, and, indeed, he confesses quite frankly that "an adequate history of Congress would be a life work. And when one had finished it, he might have serious doubts whether his life could not have been better spent." It is apparent from this remark alone that he should have chosen a subject for a pot-boiler in which he could have become more interested and which would have enlisted his very considerable talents, which lie, however, in the direction of analysis of the contemporary social scene.

What Mr. Bates has been able to produce by relying upon the general histories of the United States is only another general history of the United States, which is marred however by its special angle. He adopts the economic interpretation as his general point of view but his book nevertheless remains largely an old style political history. Since Congress is a political institution, and is always engaged in political acts, it could hardly be otherwise. The feat of dressing up his political history proves too much for Mr. Bates. He realizes that a great part of the history of Congress is merely show, and while he devotes a certain proportion of his space to forensic eloquence, duels and fisticuffs, he has been unable to garner enough inside dope from his secondary sources to give anything like an intimate picture of the continuous spectacle which the national legislature makes of itself. The historical fraternity will doubtless think that Mr. Bates has often been too trivial but the truth of the matter is that he has not been trivial enough.

WILLIAM SEAGLE.

False Witness

MEXICAN MARTYRDOM. By Wilfrid Parsons, S.J. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IT IS the cry of the Catholic Church in Mexico that, though it tends strictly to its own spiritual business and never attempts to drive its flock in specific political directions, it nevertheless is treated as if it were the political and social enemy of the present Mexican State. Such treatment, it holds, constitutes a baseless and fanatical persecution on religious grounds, thus making the Church in Mexico a religious martyr.

This is the thesis upon which Father Wilfrid Parsons's book, "Mexican Martyrdom," is built. To uphold it, the author has drawn heavily upon the prevailing ignorance, among American readers, of Mexican history, Church history, political doctrine and role in Catholic countries, and on the customary assumption that men of the cloth are all learned and upright scholars. And, in the hands of an amiable, respectful, and unposted reader, Father Parsons gets away with it, for his book is practically a masterpiece in bearing false witness. The methods are: blandly state your arguments as if they were facts, and as if no evidence against them existed; attribute to the other side the lowest and most stupid possible motives, objectives, and methods; in presenting a piece of history, subtract all events that do not bear out what you want to prove; and always keep to a positive and righteous tone.

All those genuinely interested in the problems raised by the Church's frequent appeals for support in its Mexican struggle should read along with Father Parsons's book Ernest Gruening's chapters on the Church, in his book called "Mexico and Its Heritage." For the reader of scholarly training, there is one difference at least between the two versions that should make some impression: Gruening documents everything he says; Father Parsons simply "vouches" for it. Gruening writes obeying the scientific doctrine that generalizations must issue from facts; Father Parsons, however, proceeds the other way around—facts come second to generalizations—of a mystic character, moreover. In other words he writes history like a theologian, and his argument therefore does not make rational sense, because it obeys another kind of logic. It goes somewhat as follows:

First: the Mexican government is not justified in looking upon the Church as a political enemy. The Church stands aloof from political struggles. It advises its communicants only in matters of conscience, and can therefore rightly say that President Cárdenas is not going to be Mexico's peacemaker because he has not broken with the National Revolutionary Party, "and because of this, the people of Mexico is bound to be the victim of Socialistic dreamers who work in behalf of the proletariat, and look for justice without charity, outside of Christ." The Church as such takes no part in politics. What its followers do as Catholics is one matter, and what they do as citizens is still something else again. They can as Catholics and citizens, arm themselves and revolt, marching (frequently accompanied by a priest) and carrying banners hailing "Christ the King"; but between such activities as these and the Church, there is no connection whatsoever.

Without meaning at all to be ironic, one can go on for pages citing examples of the same sort of separation between act and responsibility, upon which the Church's claim to martyrdom in Mexico rests. It flows from the logic of mysticism, and is acceptable to Catholics only. It is the sort of logic that leads Father Parsons to contradict himself frequently, in minor manners, without apparently being at all aware of it. On one page he says the Church has an advanced social program, on another that "Catholics must disapprove the injection of agrarian and labor problems into politics." Then, he says that the Church "was an ally of the Government against the exploiters and large landowners, had the Government only seen it," but elsewhere "The only record I can find of the Church's opposition to the Government's policy of social reform concerns the land question. . . ." On page 138, "No open follower of the Church might hope to join a union," and on page 211 "Soldiers were placed in the entrances of factories taking the names of workers as they entered and forcing them to join the radical unions. . . ."

But the whole point is not a question of minor evasions and sophistries. It is one big one, which is that of appealing for the support of liberals in the United States, on the grounds of civil and religious freedom, while at the same time insisting (page 92) as the Church does implicitly and explicitly in Mexico and other Catholic countries, that in such countries its case is not the same as that of any civil or religious institution. In a country that the Church considers Catholic, freedom is not enough; it wants "to change the Constitution by making it more responsive to the clearly defined mind and conscience of the citizenry," and what happens to civil liberties under Catholic governments (Dollfuss, Oliveira Salazar, Gil Robles) the Austrian Socialists could explain.

Chronicles in Verse

BURNING CITY. By Stephen Vincent Benét. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

MR. BENÉT keeps to the middle of the road in his verse as in his thinking. Neither an innovator nor an imitator, he is an able craftsman who draws upon sources both old and recent. With some lapses his poetry is interesting, perceptive, and in good taste; it has also manifested, in a number of respects, steady growth. "Burning City" is a much slighter book than "John Brown's Body" and lacks its high spots, but in the best of the new poems Mr. Benét has eliminated padding from his rhymed stanzas, and his free verse, although it hovers too closely about a norm of iambic pentameter to have the greatest flexibility and variety, now sounds less often like prose.

Along with an advance in prosody, there has been a decline from "John Brown's Body" in poetic structure and in the quality of the poetic imagination. The most significant of the pieces in "Burning City" attempt, for our own time and on a smaller scale, what the Civil War poem accomplished with a high measure of success, namely, the finding of symbols for an epoch. Notes to Be Left in a Cornerstone tries to tell a future archaeologist what New York in our day was like. It describes the buildings and the violent seasons, it enumerates the types of people, it hints at the city's loneliness and it seeks to generalize:

They were a race
Most nervous, energetic, swift, and wasteful
And maddened by the dry and beautiful light
Although not knowing their madness.

Still the city fails to come alive; the people are shadows, and the generalization eludes the poet: "It is not just to say any one thing about them."

Liberty League Liberty

by GEORGE SOULE

Author of "A Planned Society", "The Coming American Revolution", "Does Socialism Work?", etc.

Three and a half million dollars were spent by one industry last year, in the name of "liberty," to defeat one Congressional bill.

The Republican platform of 1936 charges that "the rights and liberties of American citizens have been violated," that "the administration has promoted investigations to harass and intimidate American citizens."

What is the liberty that the American Liberty League and kindred organizations are defending? What, specifically, do these citizens want? How do they go about getting it?

In a series of three articles, to be published in The New Republic, George Soule takes a cool, straight look at the record of the words and deeds of these patriotic gentlemen.

The factual story of the Liberty League's conception of "liberty," in politics and in industry, told in these articles by an economist and reporter, is powerful ammunition in the fight for decency and freedom in America.

Do not miss an article in the series. Mr. Benét records faithfully and incisively the wasted lands and the wasted lives of our time. Yet his images do not quite assume the dignity of symbols. I say not quite, for the stuff of symbols is there, the all-swallowing Mississippi and the "giant dust-flower" of the ode to Whitman. But the images do not unfold, nor are they brought into intrinsic relationship; a pattern is lacking such as Benét was able to find even in the chaos of the Civil War, to which he gave imaginative structure by the subtle interplay of both personal and impersonal symbols. The crude definiteness of the impersonal symbols, cotton for the South, wheat and iron for the North, was relieved by the men—Brown, Lincoln, Lee, Davis, and the humbler characters—who made the war a conflict of desires and ideas as well as of economic forces. It is to be suspected that Mr. Benét does not know his contemporaries well enough to make them significant, nor is he enough of a prophet or a philosopher to grasp and symbolize the pattern of events. He is the critical historian who shrinks from the half-truths and savageries of prophecy and partisanship; lacking the evidence for a final judgment, he is content to chronicle. As such he has his place and a not undistinguished one; for an honest chronicler who is also a skilful poet is better than a score of false prophets without art.

RECORDS

FIRST let me help the editors of The Nation solve a problem. It is the problem that confronts a newspaper editor: He can have a concert written up by a layman, who will write of what a layman would hear at the concert and what everyone who reads the paper will understand. Or if he wants authoritative appraisal he can use an expert, who will talk about things which most of the audience would not hear and most readers will not understand. In this situation the editor likes to believe that if only the expert will use different words everyone will understand him; but the difficulty is not with the words, it is with the things the words refer to: if the reader has not experienced them, there are no words that he will understand. However, for the editors of The Nation the problem is solved by the fact that I am discussing phonograph records; for when I speak of qualities of music and performance which some readers know nothing about, they can listen to the records and hear what I refer to.

For example, in Mozart's early Violin Concerto in G (K. 216) they can hear what is already the true Mozart style and thought without the richness and subtlety of its maturity; they are, then, the better able to perceive, in the high-spirited first movement, the truth of Tovey's observation that Mozart wrote in the language of operatic comedy; but even in the melodic passages about 1¼ inches from the first groove and ⅜ inch before the last groove of the first record they can perceive the fact that he had something to say which transcended this language. They can also hear that these qualities of the work are admirably realized in the performance of Huberman with the Vienna Philharmonic under Dobrowen. I must, however, warn readers not to be repelled by first impressions of Huberman's playing: once they bring themselves to ignore its lack of sensuous attractiveness (which the Viennese recording engineers do less than nothing about) they will hear, in more subtle qualities of inflection and continuity, a wonderful feeling for the phrase. The warning is the more necessary because the stuff that Columbia puts into the grooves of its records generally spoils the results of the first few playings (three records with Album, $5).

Weingartner's directness with Beethoven is exactly what the music calls for. His set of the Fifth was the one to own; and the new one he has made has the additional virtues of a finer orchestra, the London Philharmonic, and finer recording (except the poor balance that spoils the last section of the Scherzo) (Columbia; four records, $6).

Columbia has issued a set of four records ($6) of arias from "Norma," "Sonnambula," "Forza del destino," "Traviata," "Bohème," "Mefistofele," "Andrea Chenier," and Cilea's "L'Arlesiana," sung by the late Claudia Muzio. Her voice is lovely, but she uses it trickily and without much taste, and is more successful with the moment-to-moment phrasing of Puccini and Giordano than with the sustained melodic line of Bellini or even Verdi. On a single Columbia record ($1.50) Ina Souez sings "Come scoglio" from "Cosi fan tutti": she has a beautiful voice and sings with excellent style, but does not succeed any too well with the florid passages. On the reverse side is "Fra gli amplessi in pochi istanti" from the same opera, which Mme. Souez and Heddle Nash sing beautifully.

Letters to the Editors

THE FOOD-AND-DRUG BILL

Dear Sirs: The article by your Washington correspondent under date of May 27, Champions of Poisoned Drugs, is so outrageously false, both in its statement of facts and its inferences, that I feel in justice to myself you should have an opportunity to correct it.

I was not a member of the subcommittee which had charge of the pure-food-and-drug bill. It did not come before me as a member of the full committee until after the subcommittee had concluded its work. I challenge your Washington correspondent to produce a word or syllable of mine to justify his statements respecting my position on the bill.

I voted to report the bill, and the amendment which your correspondent considered the most beneficial in the bill, that is, permitting multiple seizure, also received my support in executive session.

Although your correspondent expressly states: "It has not yet been possible to ascertain just which members of the committee are responsible for these betrayals of the public trust," nevertheless, he is reckless enough to attempt to portray the position of members of the committee on matters which came before them in executive session.

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL,

Member of Congress from Indiana
Washington, June 10

Dears Sirs: I made a number of errors in the piece about which Representative Pettengill wails. I gave too much credit for good faith to some members of the committee—Kenney of New Jersey, and Wadsworth of New York, for example. I gave less credit than they deserved to such members as Sam Rayburn, of Texas. But I made no mistake about Complainant Pettengill.

My sole reference to him was: "Pettengill of Indiana is another who rates profits for drug racketeers ahead of consumer protection." I did not say, or even imply, that he was a member of the subcommittee that had charge of the food and drug bill. And that finishes off his first point of objection.

His second point is a challenge to me to show by the record that his position was as I described it. The challenge sounds brave and bold. In reality, it is not. Mr. Pettengill certainly was aware when he made it that there exists no record of how he voted on any phase of the bill, or, for that matter, how any other member of the committee voted; no record was kept by the committee.

The reporter in such cases must turn to other sources for his information. He must turn, for example, to the drug lobby. Committee members kept the lobby in constant touch with every development in the committee's executive sessions, providing it with copies of the bill and its amendments before the public and other members of Congress were allowed to see them. The lobbyists certainly looked upon Pettengill as one of their friends on the committee. The Black committee earlier in the session had shown that Mr. Pettengill had set up light housekeeping with a railroad and utilities lobbyist here; perhaps this misled the drug lobby into thinking he was a friend of all lobbyists. The fact remains, however, that they delighted in the accounts their spies relayed of the viciously anti-consumer and anti-Administration thrusts made by Pettengill during committee sessions. They were delighted too with their spies' reports that Pettengill was voting consistently against Rayburn, who voted with equal consistency on the public's side. I have made a sufficiently exhaustive investigation on my own part to convince myself at least that these reports were not exaggerated.

But even if they were exaggerated, the fact that Mr. Pettengill did not sign the dissent appended to the committee's report on the bill would suffice to keep me standing firmly upon the assertion I made with reference to him. In addition, I have what I regard as authoritative information to the effect that the Congressman voted in support of Wadsworth's proposal to emasculate the bill's section on advertising control and that he stood for a similar weakening of the cosmetics section. I can particularize on these two points, if Mr. Pettengill would like me to do so.

I have been aware for some time that what I wrote infuriated the gentleman from Indiana more than any other member of the committee. I have also been aware that the reason it so infuriated him was that it made more difficult his fence-straddling act and threatened to defeat him in his efforts to cozen the League of Women Voters and similar organizations back in Indiana. Mr. Pettengill's chief political asset has been his ability to stand not only on both sides of the fence, but, in addition, on the fence itself. He no doubt remembers that public rebuke administered to him by Rayburn last year for practicing his art so assiduously on the holding-company bill. It is time for my brother alumnus of Middlebury College to move out into the center of the field.

PAUL W. WARD

MR. HARRIS AND THE WEBBS

Dear Sirs: In his letter to The Nation, published June 10, Louis Fischer complains that my "most inadequate" review of the Webbs' book on Russia was used to air my own "threadbare, shopworn, and uninteresting prejudices against the Soviet Union." Since I am not aware that I possess these or other prejudices against the Soviet Union, I wish he had been specific rather than mechanical and general in his criticism. I saw no reason to wax rhapsodical over the Webbs' break with the Fabian doctrine of the "inevitability of gradualness." But I did state in simple and direct language that the book is the definitive account of the political and economic system of the Soviet Union and therefore a monumental climax to the Webbs' fifty years of study of social problems; that it is unique because, unlike other accounts, it evaluates the system in terms of its own logic and social ideals; and, finally, that it shows that the Communist revolution has created the material basis for the remaking of man in Russia and is destined to spread to other countries.

It seems incredible that a journalist of Fischer's reputed integrity could completely disregard these features of the review and thus distort my intention. As a defender of the Soviet regime he seems to be more interested in combating my views on the dictatorship and on Comintern policy than he is in understanding the really fundamental problem touched upon in the review. This problem, the theoretical basis of planning in a collectivist economy, is, I repeat, inadequately treated by the Webbs. While I have never doubted the possibility of a correct allocation of resources under communism, I do not think that the arguments of the orthodox economists who deny it can be met by a simple assertion of political faith. Such arguments, in so far as they have scientific merit, must be met on their own grounds. The failure of the Webbs to do this provoked my criticism. It is too bad that Fischer's ignorance of this problem and of the importance that I, along with other economists, attach to it caused him to accuse me of a hostility to the Soviet Union that I do not possess.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION

The unanimity which was so striking a characteristic of the Democratic Convention reminded one rather of a machine than of a deliberative assembly, or a meeting of long-separated brethren speaking freely the fulness of their hearts. Meanwhile outside the convention almost everything was equally satisfactory. There was, of course, a great consumption of drinks in the different barrooms, but it led to very little disputatious talking, and we saw nothing that approached a breach of the peace. . . . Neither the resolutions nor the President's address explicitly asserts the powers of the President to do the things which his party applauds him for doing. That is a point upon which the members of the convention wisely refrained from argument. So they endorse his acts generally, without specifying particulars or attempting to reason out their position. The obvious truth is that the majority of the convention were so thankful to the President for not going further that they gladly forgave him for going as far as he did.

THE GIFT OF THE GAB

General Sherman made a few observations the other day at Dartmouth Commencement on Congressional debating. He said he had asked Chief Justice Chase whether, when he was in Congress, "he ever changed his vote by reason of any debate he ever listened to, and he answered that he did not believe he ever did." The discussions in the House are, in fact, very much like the duels one sees on the stage, in which there is a prodigious clicking of foils and a good deal of wriggling of the body, leading children and servant girls to fear that when one of the combatants flops on his back and tosses his manly legs in the air it is all over with him. Much of this unfortunate state of things is to be ascribed to the undue importance given in our colleges and schools to the mere "gift of the gab." Facility in speaking, assurance, and self-possession on one's legs are things which, in America, do not need much cultivation. The art which we need most of all to cultivate among the young is the art of having something to say, and of saying it in clear, pure, unadorned English. It is thought and not words that in the long run governs nations.

THE AUSTRO-PRUSSIAN WAR

Technically, nothing can be more illegal than the course pursued toward Austria by both Prussia and Italy. In the form of international law there is not a word to be said for them. Bismarck, too, is a man with whom no lover of liberal principles can have much sympathy. The same may be said of the King. But behind them both there lies a nation which has got fast hold of all the essential ideas of modern progress in which education, comfort, self-respect, and respect for law are perhaps more widely diffused than in any other in the world except our own, and which may fairly be said to contain all that is best in German character and thought. Anyone who extends the sphere of Prussian influence, of Prussian law and Prussian rule, no matter who he may be or what his aims are, renders, we believe, a great service to freedom and civilization. . . . Austria, on the other hand, has not a single claim on the sympathy of any human being. The House of Hapsburg has done nothing for literature, nothing for science, little for art, and has probably inflicted more misery on the world than any race with which it has pleased God to curse it. We, therefore confess that we hope the Prussians will make a clean sweep now that they are about it.

THE YOUNGER GENERATION

Looking around among our acquaintances we do not call to mind a single parent who is a terror to his children; and we rejoice that it is so. But we do know multitudes of parents who never had their children under their control; and this we cannot rejoice over. A spoiled child is an emblem of misery to itself and discomfort to all around. We assert that the enormous prevalence of abortion among married women is largely owing to the universal expectation that children will be a source of irritation and anxiety, undisciplined little nuisances, worrying their parents' lives and driving off their parents' friends. "Young America" is proverbially pert, obtrusive, and irreverent; unaccustomed to obey at home, our young men are apt to lack respect for lawful authority everywhere. Probably half the cost of our late Civil War may be fairly charged to the lack of habits of discipline and obedience on both sides.

The Shape of Things

WHISPERING CAMPAIGNS ARE A FAMILIAR item in American politics. Lies whipped like clothes on a windy line over Andrew Jackson's amours; over Lincoln's uncouth obscenities, Grant's drinking, Grover Cleveland's romantic peccadilloes. There was a nation-wide hissing of whispers over T. R.'s falsely alleged bibulousness. A suit was needed to quell the libel. In the second Wilson campaign whisperers were distributed over the country by trains de luxe; whispers, black and white, dogged Harding to his front porch. They are whispering now about Roosevelt, and some Democrats are disturbed. Needlessly. It is the lesson of American history that all bewhispered candidates (except Al Smith) get elected. Some think it is because of the whispering. If John Hamilton believes this, he had better start something monstrously abominable on Landon. But it is more probable that the function of whispering is symptomatic rather than causative. It seems to show where the mean spirited and contemptible tend to congregate; and that is not on the side of the American majority.

AGAIN SPAIN IS BEING CHURNED UP IN THE agony of civil war. As Mr. Manuel's article on another page shows, there is no real unity among the supporters of the left government, and it is this disunity and the consequent lack of governmental decisiveness that has made possible the fascist uprising. True, the various left groups managed to get and stay together long enough to sweep the country with a united-front election in February of this year. But immediately the new government was established, the coalition dissolved into separate and dissonant elements. Rendered impotent by division the government has been able to take only small and tottering steps toward social and economic reorganization. With the workers' groups at odds with each other, with the government frustrated, the situation has been made more critical by the existence of the groups—the church and the landowners—most bitterly hostile to the new régime. The rumblings of counter-revolution which finally burst forth in the military revolt of July 18 can be traced to them and to the fascists in the army. The Spanish have now learned that a labor government must move speedily to gain control of the military. This is not so easy, for the composition of an army reflects the larger social organization outside the army, while drastic changes in the social structure cannot be put through without army support. This is the dilemma of the Spanish leftists. At present the government seems in control of the rebellion, largely because of the support the armed workers have thrown to it, but unless Spain can genuinely unify her workers and have their mass support for drastic reforms, it will be an empty victory.

HAVE YOU HAD ANY TROUBLE BUYING Victor records lately? The reason is very likely the strike at the plant of the Radio Corporation of America in Camden, New Jersey, where the records, among other things, are made. The strike was called by the United Electrical and Radio Workers Union, which claims to have called out 8,400 of a possible 9,000 production workers at the plants, most of whom are still on strike. Attempts at negotiation and settlement with David Sarnoff, president of the company, and with General "Blue Eagle" Johnson, special labor adviser, have had no result so far. The company has seemed friendly and inclined to compromise; but in the agreement concerning an election to determine the bargaining unit for the plant appeared a clause which not only bound the company to bargain with the majority unit but permitted it also to bargain with any other unit it pleased. The National Labor Relations Board will hold a hearing on July 25, out of which an election may come. While these legalistic moves are going on, rioting and bloodshed have been taking place on the picket line and the New Jersey police have arrested nearly 400 strikers and lodged them in jails so crowded there is not room for them to lie down. Under the leadership of Supreme Court Justice Frank T. Lloyd, however, the courts have really set New Jersey apart in the matter of dealing with labor cases. On Thursday, July 16, 123 persons were arrested; 4 of them were held by Justice Lloyd for the grand jury on bail of $10,000 each; 93 were held for hearing on July 21 on $5,000 bail. The charges were assault and battery, disorderly conduct, or inciting to riot, although many of the prisoners seem to have committed no crime except to be employees of the Philco radio company. There seems to be no precedent for these extraordinary bail figures, even in labor-baiting New Jersey.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT HAS REDEEMED, after a fashion, two of the chief pledges of the Popular Front before the election, namely, reforms in control of the Bank of France and the armament industry. That both changes are popular was shown in the large majorities by which they passed the Chamber. When it comes to high finance we find ourselves in the position of Mr. Montagu Norman, who once said, "I don't understand it." But we can understand that the new set-up in the Bank of France is far from the nationalization which had been expected. The oligarchic rule of the famous "200 families" is ended, and a democratic governing council is substituted, in which the bank's 40,000 shareholders will have representation but no vote. The governor and two vice-governors will presumably be safeguarded against temptation through high salaries, pension-rights, and a prohibition against holding any private commercial position either during or after their incumbency. The new law for expropriation of armaments manufacturers allows the government to proceed at its discretion with the purchase of all or a majority of the stock of such companies as in its judgment should be under government control. Its ability to do so will depend, of course, upon its success in selling its bonds to the public. Even these somewhat tentative reforms are important. But they remind us a little of a man handling hot coals with his bare hands. Possibly Mr. Blum could proceed more boldly if he first undertook that reform which the German Social Democrats neglected, which the present Spanish situation proves to be most vital of all to a leftist government, a thorough democratization of all ranks of army and navy officers.

WHEN A COURT BITES A NEWS AGENCY, IT evidently isn't news. The most interesting aspect of the recent decision in the case of the Associated Press versus Morris Watson was not the decision itself—which was rendered by a group of judges who have distinguished themselves by fair-minded and public-spirited opinions, notably in censorship cases—but the way the Associated Press handled the story. Justice Manton of the United States Circuit Court, with Justices Swan and Augustus Hand concurring, found that Morris Watson had been discharged by the A. P. in violation of the National Labor Relations Law, and ordered his reinstatement with back pay. The A. P. sent out 192 words on the decision on the afternoon of Monday, July 13, just in time to make the last evening editions. Ordinarily a late story of this sort is given a follow-up the next day, but this was not done. Eighty-two of the 192 words were given to quotation from the decision asserting the right of an employer to hire and fire for cause. On December 21, 1935, Judge Merrill Otis in Kansas City declared the labor act unconstitutional. The Press Radio Bureau, which gets its news from the A. P., not only received a news story on the decision, but it was put first in a list of twelve "most-important" stories. The comparative handling, by the Scripps-Howard newspapers, of the Watson story and the story of Rupert Hughes's fight with the Screen Writers Guild is also interesting. The Hughes story appeared on the front page of the New York World-Telegram on Saturday and was given front-page treatment also on Monday. The Watson story was given thirty-seven lines on page fourteen on Monday, with no follow-up on Tuesday. This doubtless exemplifies what Mr. Roy Howard would call the freedom of the press.

HITLER IS NOT YET READY FOR DER TAG. While the armament race is in process and while the Reich is building an army fit to challenge Europe, a conciliatory gesture does no harm and may have positive advantages. This is probably the real explanation of the Austro-German treaty. Friendly relations between the two countries are publicly proclaimed; Germany, it is promised, will not interfere with Austria's independence. Meanwhile, peaceful Nazi penetration of Austria may go on unhampered; in time, perhaps Anschluss will be accomplished without anyone being aware that it was attempted. Karl Radek, in an editorial in Izvestia on July 14, cogently analyzes the German position. Germany must have Danzig and at the same time must not alienate Poland; by a process of economic and political penetration, German influence in the Balkans must be strengthened with a view to isolating Czecho-Slovakia. As far as possible, Italian friendship with Germany must be furthered—witness the recent new air agreement permitting Germany to use Italian islands of the Dodecanese group. And Germany must arm. But all these things take time. Partly to stave off a more hostile overt act, partly to make a move which will seem to indicate the good faith and peaceful intentions of the Reich, the treaty with a Vienna powerless to make effective resistance is offered to the world. Already in Austria the press and the radio have responded by refraining from any criticism of the Reich, especially with respect to the approaching Olympics. General amnesty is promised for all Nazi prisoners in Austria. The new treaty, in short, may well mean not the guaranty but the end of Austria's independence.

"RUSSIA SHALL NOT HAVE CONSTANTINOPLE." That was the refrain of the famous Jingo song all England was chanting when war with Russia was threatened in the seventies. On July 20 at Montreux Britain signed an agreement giving Turkey the right to remilitarize the Straits and giving the Russian fleet free access to the Mediterranean. She thus yields the principle of keeping Russia out of the Dardanelles that has been one of the consistent elements of her foreign policy for over a hundred years. That Britain has now given way means that she thinks a gesture of cooperation toward France and Soviet Russia, and, therefore, against Germany and Italy, is important enough at this time to make the sacrifice of her Straits policy worth while. The Locarno Powers' conference at London two days after the signature of the Montreux pact makes Britain's line-up with the Franco-Soviet group especially significant. Significant of what, unhappily, it is impossible to tell, because of the see-saw tactics of the British Cabinet. It may signify a bargain between the pro-French and pro-German factions of the Cabinet by which the stiffening against the Italo-German front at Montreux is to pave the way for concessions to them at London. On the other hand, it may mean that the pro-French faction has won out and will continue to be dominant when the Locarno Powers meet. But whatever the Dardanelles pact portends, it shows that there are two ways to break a treaty. It can be trampled under marching feet as in the Rhineland or it can be scrapped by request as at Montreux.

A CARTOONIST SOME YEARS BACK PICTURED one banker confidentially asking another, "What's this gold standard I've been hearing about?" The puzzled banker found living counterparts last week in the response of the financial community to the action of the Federal Reserve Board in raising the reserve requirements 50 per cent. Excess reserves have been at all time highs for several years and are expected to reach $3,500,000,000 by August 15, when the new order will reduce them to $1,900,000,000. To speak in astronomical figures, present excess reserves would allow for a credit expansion of $30,000,000,000. The new reserves would allow for a potential credit expansion of "only" $19,000,000,000. Theoretically an increase in reserve requirements reduces the amount of available credit. It should therefore tend to increase the interest rate and lower the price of government bonds which now bear unprecedentedly low rates of interest. Actually the new move had little effect on the bond market because the reserves will still be higher than at any time previous to this year. A few smaller banks may be adversely affected and have to call in some loans, but the effect on the nation's credit structure as a whole will probably be negligible. The move is chiefly noteworthy as an indication of some readiness to use the new credit controls given the federal government by the Banking Act of 1935. But would any government—even a labor government—when faced by the actual choice, move decisively to stifle a boom?

WE DON'T KNOW WHERE AMERICA IS GOING. But we do know where she is. She is at the crossroads. All our most noted opinion-slingers say so, loud and clear. From Morningside Heights, the Delphi of today, comes the voice of the oracle. "We," says Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, "are at the crossroads in the history of the world." Where they will take us he doesn't mention, but simply that we are at them. Representative William ("Bicycle-cap") Lemke is more explicit. We are "again" at the crossroads, he says, and one of them leads to economic slavery. Presumably the other is a dead-end as he doesn't say where it goes. According to Dorothy Thompson in the Herald Tribune it is not "we" but "Freedom" which is the crossroad confronter, facing order in one direction and anarchy in the other. Alfred P. Sloan thunders through the roar of General Motors that "the nation" is at the crossroads, with free competition or regulation as the alternative. President Angell of Yale doesn't seem to have a very clear idea what the crossroads are but contents himself with saying vaguely that they are "critical." Finally we come to "America is at the crossroads!" uttered in the solemn tones of the Liberty League. One road leads to constitutional government and the other—but overcome with the horror of it all, the league shudders and remains silent. It is consoling to know that America is not alone in this dilemma, for the Economist of London remarks that Leon Blum is also at the crossroads, while our contemporary, the New Masses, which always knows, reports that British foreign policy is at the same juncture.

EACH TIME LA ARGENTINA DANCED SHE brought new magic to the stage. Her death means the loss of a true and rare artist. At the age of nine she started her career as a member of the corps de ballet of the Royal Madrid Opera and two years later was given the position of Prima Ballerina. It was not long before the restrictions of the classical ballet form began to irritate her and she started her life-long study of the folk dancing of Spain. In this wealth of material with its forty-nine provincial variations and almost forgotten traditions she found for herself a means of expression which resulted in her name becoming synonymous with Spanish dancing. But it was not only these archeological researches into Iberian dance forms, costumes, and music that made her one of the outstanding figures of modern dance history. Rather it was her extraordinary personality and her ability to immerse herself in these traditions without losing the subtleties of their theatrical meaning. Each dance had so thoroughly been understood and studied that she became not only in the actual dancing but in the complete theatrical presentation—from her use of mime to her choice of costume—the instrument of expression of every dance she performed. There will undoubtedly be many followers and imitators who will try to inherit her mantle, but her abilities cannot be taught or learned. She is but another example, similar to Duncan, Pavlova, and Nijinsky, of those dancers who because of the depth of their artistry can make of their medium a universal language irrespective of the dialect they may have chosen.

Salvation from the Bible Belt

THE gathering of the Townsend clans in convention at Cleveland was by all accounts a remarkable affair. Although its leaders insist that the Townsend group is not a political party, the convention keynoters made their Republican predecessors at Cleveland seem mild and scholarly by comparison. The Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, with his references to Mr. Roosevelt as "a liar" and "great betrayer," could have given even the incredible Senator Steiwer some pointers on good taste, fair play, and political accuracy. The Rev. Gerald L. K. Smith, in the role of the irrepressible young man smashing his way into the leadership of a movement, outplayed even the irrepressible John Hamilton, and it is interesting to note that Dr. Townsend has the same touching admiration for the one that Governor Landon has for the other.

But the Townsend convention had three advantages over the Republican. It was bigger, it was folksier, and it had more surprises. There were some ten thousand delegates, and while they did not exactly form a deliberative assembly they did function as an audience. The folksy quality was everywhere: Dr. Townsend was photographed in suspenders and received the newspapermen shoeless, the clerical Mr. Coughlin spoke collarless and coatless, and the dynamic Rev. Mr. Smith, not to be outdone here as everywhere, recounted his plans and ambitions to The Nation interviewer from the depths of a bathtub. As for the surprises, the whole convention seemed to come out of cloud-cuckooland. The delegates applauded Father Coughlin when he attacked Mr. Roosevelt, and then applauded the "eloquent Cherokee," Gomer Smith, when he defended him. Dr. Townsend was one day against Mr. Lemke's candidacy because there were a dozen better men easily available as candidates and because "Lemke can't quite swallow the Townsend plan," and the next day he was for him, without explaining how either Mr. Lemke's caliber or his swallowing power had managed to improve. The same cloudiness which formerly surrounded Dr. Townsend's successive phases of support and non-support of Senator Borah seems now to invest his attitude toward Mr. Lemke. As for the Townsend organization itself, the gyrations of the officers, directors, field organizers, and "citizens maximi" were too bewildering even for the best trained newspapermen, who felt as Alice must have felt in Wonderland. If Dr. Townsend, the Rev. Gerald Smith, Gomer Smith, the Rev. Charles Coughlin, Mr. Lemke, and the Citizens Maximi did not exist, it would be necessary for another Lewis Carroll to invent them.

But the tragic thing for America is that they are not inventions but realities. Those men and women sitting there listening to the oratory—pathetically eager, infinitely hopeful, dangerously credulous—they too are realities. They are part of the human material that can be used either for building or destroying America. They came to Cleveland from California, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, New York; they came by bus or broken-down Ford or they sat up in the railroad coaches; they came bringing their battered suitcases and got dollar-a-night lodgings. They are the non-drinking, non-smoking, Bible-reading debt we are paying to our Puritan and evangelist past. Their faces show them narrow, bigoted, crotchety, millennial—but we must remember that for them the millennial dreams are only the dreams of security. They are not all America, but they are an important phase of middle-class America.

It is not hard to see why Coughlin, Lemke, and Gerald Smith tumbled all over each other in order to court these people. Their courting had about it something of the wolf eager for the fold. These leaders without movements, these politicians without parties or voters, these Führers without armies know a good thing when they see it. Dr. Townsend may be clever or naive, honest or unscrupulous, but whatever he is, he is no match for these newcomers into his movement. Their quarrels were quarrels over their prey, and even their patchings-up were intended mainly to keep the victims from being frightened off. The half-million faithful Townsendites and the even larger number of hangers-on would serve very handsomely to swell a political movement that promised them enough. And men like the Rev. Gerald Smith would not be reluctant to make promises.

The immediate importance of the Townsend convention is that it served to patch up an alliance among what is being called the "crackpot quartet"—Coughlin, Gerald Smith, Townsend, and Lemke. In this alliance Coughlin furnishes a radio audience, a paper organization, and contacts with those who would profit by a defeat of Mr. Roosevelt; Smith seems to furnish nothing but a rabble-rousing manner and a desire to wear the mantle of Huey Long; Townsend furnishes the organization and the followers; Lemke furnishes a farm support that probably falls far short of his claims. Analyzed from another point of view the alliance is one between a fanatical old-age-security movement, an inflationist-agrarian movement, and a red-baiting movement. In return for lip-service to the Townsend idea, Dr. Townsend has agreed to throw his followers behind the currency-control schemes of Coughlin and Lemke and the vicious anti-radicalism of Coughlin and Gerald Smith.

Let us make no mistake about it. The crackpot quartet has no intention and can have no hope of succeeding with the old-age-pension plan. Smith and Townsend let the cat out of the bag when they said that their goal was not the pension plan but the defeat of Mr. Roosevelt. The large portion of Dr. Townsend's speech that was devoted to the so-called budget extravagances of Mr. Roosevelt might easily have been delivered by Mr. Landon, and might indeed have been inspired by the same sources. These men recognize clearly enough that Mr. Roosevelt is the great hurdle in their path to what may easily become an American fascism. The Nation does not wish to throw the word "fascism" about loosely. But the interview with the Rev. Gerald Smith, which appears elsewhere in this issue, leaves little doubt of his fascist intentions and caliber and of the menace that he represents. Father Coughlin is more subtle but not less dangerous. And it is significant that in its issue of June 30 one of the vicious anti-Semitic sheets published in New York reports a speech before one of the Nazi clubs by one A. Tellian. He "discussed the prospects of Lemke becoming President. His platform was compared with that of Hitler's party as well as with the platform of the club, and it was found that in so far as the social aims are concerned, they are absolutely identical."

The unholy four can hope for no support from the majority of American workers, farmers, technicians, professional people, small business men. Their main reliance must be upon the fanatical, the bigoted, the psychically starved portion of the lower middle class. Gerald Smith is now talking of forming a youth movement to effect his purposes. Someone should tell him that he stands no chance. The youth of America, whatever their political direction, know that salvation will not come from the Bible Belt.

Program for Parched Land

THE world moves. Not more than five years ago wretched farm families trekking from sporadic drought areas would stop at the houses of the more fortunate who had enjoyed the boon of rain, to beg for a forkful of hay and a bit of oats for their skeletonized teams, milk for their sick children, or perhaps a corner in the hayloft for a desperate-eyed wife about to give birth to a child. The all-powerful Washington government took cognizance of such tragedies and recommended charity, an ennobling virtue and splendidly economical from the point of view of the federal treasury and the underlying income-tax payers. Today the government recognizes in the drought a major disaster which demands instant and effective action. Never again will the burning out of tens of thousands of farmers be regarded as merely a harsh incident in the training of rugged individualism.

The immediate relief plan of the Resettlement Administration is an intelligent one. Relief first of all, not only to keep the farm population alive, but to insure the maintenance of its equipment. The government will find forage for the "foundation" live stock, whose loss would cripple the farmer in his efforts to get back on his feet when a better year comes. The promise to assist the farmers in financing fall sowings of wheat and rye is of immense importance to the farmer's morale. Work will be found for as many farmers as possible on soil and water conservation projects which we may hope will be as useful as the limited time for planning them permits. But most important of all, these emergency measures are to be treated as only a preliminary to long-range planning designed to adjust the economy of the high prairie to climate and soil. No extensive relief will be given except to farmers who are prepared to cooperate in carrying through a plan for putting back into grass the lands that should never have been broken, and for developing intensively the lands that are normally fairly watered and need only good farm practice to restore the fertility stripped from them by continuous wheat cropping.

Why does not the Liberty League cry out against this program? It involves planning, baleful word, copyrighted by Soviet Russia. The Liberty League is silent because there are times when the most sterling—or sterling plated—principles must yield to common sense. There can be no literate person in the United States who does not now realize that the unplanned exploitation of our agricultural lands is undermining our institutions as neither foreign enemies nor the "enemy within our gates," Liberty Leaguers or bolsheviks, can undermine them. In the dust bowl some millions of acres of fair grass lands have for all practical purposes been blown away. Another hundred million acres have been rendered virtually worthless by water erosion; half a billion more have been seriously damaged. If we keep to our present course—and, for all the talk, we are still keeping to it—the next generation, struggling for its share of the world's shrinking food supplies, will read incredulously the records of our deep concern over surplus food production.

The unplanned use of our originally fertile soils has been proved a ghastly and disastrous failure. How about the unplanned use of our forests? That was proved to be a failure as far back as the time when Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot laid their heads together for the common good. How about the subsoil, our coal and iron, oil and natural gas, upon which our majestic industrialism is based? Our readers will have to forgive us for asking silly questions. Even morons know that we are running through our mineral heritage like super-drunken sailors.

Land and labor, as the old-fashioned economists used to put it, are the two essentials of economic welfare. We have played hob with our land. Our labor supply, thank God, is intact. But is it? Do eleven million men come out of a prolonged period of unemployment as good as they were when first laid off? Another silly question. Of course they don't. For some hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, the disposition to address oneself assiduously to economic tasks has been carried away by the winds for good and all, like the top soil of the dust bowl. Would planning be amiss here or shall we wait for the development of a real proletariat in the original Roman sense, a mob fit for nothing but the spawning of progeny?

The Tugwell long-range drought program is a plan for the conservation of both land and labor. In its present tentative form it is inadequate, not to say feeble. The handing out of information and microscopic loans will not do much to promote removal from bad land and closer settlement with intensive cultivation on the lands that are capable of sustaining a larger population. But this is really immaterial. What is material is that a process has been set in motion toward a rational ordering of our rural life. It is a process which, once in motion, will go on, no matter who may occupy the White House. Our agricultural economy will for a long time be badly planned. But planned it must be if we are to survive as a great nation.

Tom Mooney—Twenty Years After

IT is twenty years since Thomas Mooney and Warren K. Billings were arrested and charged with having set the bomb which exploded among spectators of the San Francisco Preparedness Parade on July 22, 1916. That bomb killed ten people and wounded forty others. It was also the direct cause—or possibly, even, the chief act—of a conspiracy on the part of big business in San Francisco, which has maimed the lives of two men and would even have brought Tom Mooney death by hanging had not a world-wide protest on the part of the working class moved President Wilson to intervene in his behalf.

The Mooney-Billings frame-up was part of the ruthless warfare which big business in California has been conducting for the open shop ever since the McNamara confessions in the Los Angeles Times case broke the militancy of the A. F. of L. and sent its leaders scrambling into the shelter of "respectability"—that is, due deference to the interests of the owning classes. As Louis Adamic has phrased it in "Dynamite," "Mooney and Billings in jail are an advertisement to the exploiters of labor that capital in California is able to keep labor 'in its place.'" This is why the State Supreme Court, with the honorable exception of Justice William H. Langdon, has steadily refused, when these cases have come up before it, to recognize the incontrovertible evidence of perjury and conspiracy. This is why no governor of California has had the courage to court his own political and economic destruction at the hands of the exploiting class—by granting a pardon to Tom Mooney. And this is why the financial and industrial overlords of San Francisco maintain the attitude lately voiced in private conversation by a prominent banker when he said, "Yes, Tom Mooney ought to be released so that he can be shot as he walks out of the prison gates."

Thanks to this intransigence of California capitalists, Mooney and Billings stand before the workers of the world today as victims of capitalist oppression. Tom Mooney especially has become, in his prison cell, a focus for all the violent emotions which class-war releases on both sides. For Mooney, before his arrest, was an energetic left-wing labor leader. He belonged to the Socialist Party. He had introduced, at the 1912 convention of the International Molders' Union, to which he belongs, a resolution calling for the industrial organization of labor. And at the time of his arrest he was attempting to organize the employees of the San Francisco street-car company. This record accounted for the conspiracy against him. It also largely accounts for his international fame as a symbol of the proletarian cause.

What sort of man have twenty years of unjust imprisonment made of Tom Mooney? Five years ago Lincoln Steffens wrote, Tom Mooney was stating his case, proving his (undoubted) innocence, and as he talked we all felt that he was not only innocent; he had become a righteous bore, an offense with his rights and his wrongs.

Jay Lovestone, writing this week in the Worker's Age, says of Mooney:

Twenty years of continuous dungeon life have not broken his body or his spirit. . . . What was to me the most welcome surprise of all was Tom's mind, his intelligence, his keenness and variety of interest, the extent of his keeping up with the kaleidoscopic changes in the American and world labor movements . . .

Of these two pictures neither, probably, is complete without the other. If Lovestone's were the whole truth, the fact would diminish not the injustice but the horror of Mooney's plight. And how could any man, unjustly imprisoned for twenty years, help becoming obsessed with resentment against the injustice that has wrecked his life? Granted that Mooney retains his interest in the labor movement. Granted that his knowledge of his innocence, the support of workers all over the world, have sustained his courage to keep up the fight for release, and his energy to direct it from his prison cell. There is also ample evidence that injustice has embittered his mind and made him capable of suspecting and turning against those very people who have sacrificed most for him. This is but human, and deepens his tragedy in the eyes of sympathetic people. It is proof of the terrible truth that stone walls do a prison make, and iron bars a cage.

Twenty years after his arrest, Tom Mooney is appealing once more to the Supreme Court of California, which will almost certainly deny him justice as it has before. If it does, the case will be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. Whatever the outcome may be, Mooney and Billings have taken their place on the roll of martyrs to the cause of American labor, along with the Haymarket victims, Sacco and Vanzetti, and so many others. And American labor, with all its backwardness, does not forget its sacrifices in the class war.

BY PAUL W. WARD

Midsummer Spy Madness

Washington, July 19

WHAT with the Secret Service caught spying on the Justice Department's Ogpu and a former officer in our Navy arrested on charges of selling "secrets" to the Japanese, you must if you've been reading the newspapers, think this has been Spy Week in Washington. But the truth will out, and the truth in this case is that it's always Spy Week in the nation's capital, and the manifestations of the one just past differ only in degree from those of its predecessors. They are all products of a chronic bureaucratic jitters and, save in the case of John S. Farnsworth, the arrested naval outcast, are scarcely to be taken seriously.

Every federal agency has its squad, platoon, battalion, or army corps of sleuths. The Treasury has no less than six different sets of them. Without exception, they spend a great deal of their time checking up on each other or on each others' bosses. There is scarcely a major agency in which wires have not been tapped at one time or another so that bosses might listen in on the private conversations of their underlings or of rival subalterns. There is hardly a major executive who does not have his secretary cut in and take protective notes on his own telephone conversations. Dinner parties have also felt the brush of intra-office and interoffice espionage, which was particularly rife about a year ago in the AAA and for a time promised to become a major intramural activity in Secretary Ickes's department. If the situation is worse under the New Deal than it was under preceding Administrations, it is merely because this one, more than those others, lacks the integrating influence of boodles; its executive officers in many cases are men who have achieved their present eminence without benefit of the spoils system and are often, therefore, more than a little self-righteous and suspicious of others.

The fundamental urge behind it all does not change from one Administration to the next. That is the urge of each bureau to outshine the others in ways that increase its chances of wangling favors from Congress. Those favors entail ever increasing appropriations, promotions, and salary boosts or, on the other hand, security against curtailment of powers, functions, personnel, and salaries. The current conflict between the Secret Service and the G-men is precisely one of that sort, and it differs from like conflicts of the past only in that, instead of being hushed up and settled by private negotiation in the sacristies of department heads, it has been dragged out into the open by J. Edgar Hoover and his boss, the Attorney General. And here the difference is really an accentuation of the similarity, for the conflict has been bared merely as a stratagem essential to the G-men's aims, which are those of self-defense. They have got so far out in front of all the other sleuthing agencies of the federal government as to have acquired the jealous enmity of them all. Furthermore, there is a growing suspicion among members of Congress that they themselves have not escaped the surveillance of the G-men and are even now or shortly will be the individual subjects of dossiers in Hoover's files.

Mr. Hoover's life has been made a little more uncomfortable in the last few days by public charges that his highly-publicized fingerprint section is, in reality, a sweatshop where underpaid young men work long hours of overtime for no extra pay and the collective-bargaining rights of workers are as little revered as they are in the steel mills and automobile factories. The Justice Department local of the American Federation of Government Employees has filed charges that seven employees of the fingerprint section have been fired for union activity and that to hide the real purpose behind their forced resignations on charges of inefficiency, a frame-up has been arranged involving misplaced prints in their files. The charges are persuasively documented in detail in a brief the local has laid before Cummings. The brief might have added that until recently all of more than a hundred men employed in the section had to be college graduates and that the bureau has decided to abandon that requirement because it found that a personnel of too high caliber bred "discontent." Its employees start at $1,440 and can work up to $1,620. The union's protest was filed just as word emanated from authoritative sources that Hoover had decided privately to make no attempt to enforce the recently-enacted Byrnes bill, designed to nick the business of Pearl Bergoff and his clan by impeding the shipment of strikebreakers across state lines. Hoover, you may recall, was the guest at Pittsburgh last October of a former G-man, Charles F. Ruck, who was identified by witnesses before the LaFollette committee as the chief of United States Steel's reorganized espionage system.

One of the charges against the Secret Service back in 1908 when it was reduced to its present state was that its operatives had shadowed a navy officer who had run away with another man's wife and that they had made a report which led to the officer's dismissal. The point is pertinent here because it brings us back to the Farnsworth case. There is a nasty story going around in military circles here to the effect that the real cause of the navy's grudge against Farnsworth is that he had a certain way with women which, not without some cause, aroused the enmity of two of his superiors and caused them to put him under a surveillance out of which grew the charges that led to his court martial and dishonorable discharge in November, 1927. The charges were that, contrary to regulations, this former lieutenant commander and naval-aviation expert had borrowed money from an enlisted man and then had compounded the crime by urging the man to deny that the loan had been made or solicited.

Whatever the merit of this gossip, it is at least true that in the intervening nine years Farnsworth has been hounded by the Navy Department, but no more so, it must be admitted, than all its other former officers whom it has cashiered. He has for most of that time been reduced to beachcombing in Washington, which means that he has been hanging around the fringes of the naval, diplomatic, and military supply sets, trying to recoup prestige sufficiently to get a job in keeping with his training. Such jobs are hard to get, with the Navy Department blazoning a man's record of disgrace in answer to all relevant inquiries, and they are even harder to hold under the circumstances. In consequence, it is little wonder that Farnsworth has been drinking heavily. The tremors he has exhibited since his arrest are those of alcohol, not fright.

His case would have attracted relatively little attention if it had not come close on the heels of the Thompson case at Los Angeles where a former yeoman, Harry T. Thompson, on July 6 was sentenced to a fifteen-year term in prison for selling naval "secrets" to Japan. It was the first case of its kind in the military and naval annals of the United States, according to the court that passed sentence. The same court has since alleged that the Thompson prosecution was a "test case" and that it and the Farnsworth case mark merely the beginning of a wholesale round-up of dangerous spies.

Secretary Hull quite plainly wishes that the gold-braided gentry with whom he shares the State, War, and Navy Building would cease playing such dangerous games and keep their melodramatic instincts in check. He was not consulted in advance of Farnsworth's arrest July 14, and he has the admirals in a sweat because he refuses to lodge a formal protest with the Japanese government and a demand for the recall of its emissary with whom, they allege, Farnsworth dealt.

On the other hand, it is a little difficult to believe that the navy is truly alarmed by the deeds it attributes to Farnsworth and Thompson and has moved against them in this sensational fashion for no other reason. At Thompson's trial it produced no proof that he had scraped up for his employers any information they could not have obtained from the daily press of the West Coast. The charges they make against Farnsworth are scarcely more weighty in a material sense. He admits having had dealings with the Japanese, and it is a fact, though not generally known, that he spent fifteen minutes in the Japanese embassy here on the morning of the day of his arrest. He also admits having received $1,000 from the Japanese for what he says were harmless monographs on technical subjects. He says that he was trying to impress the Japanese with his talents in the hopes of landing a job with them as an adviser on aviation, and that such pictures and documents as he submitted to them were all public pictures and documents which they might have obtained themselves. He adds that he made similar attempts to land jobs with the Russians, Argentinians, Peruvians, Brazilians, and Chinese but only Japan nibbled at his bait.

His accusers, who obviously are a little at a loss as to what to do with him now, allege on the other hand that he turned over to the Japanese a confidential manual called "The Service of Information and Security," but even Admiral Standley, chief of naval operations, seems to have doubts that the volume contained any valuable secrets. It appears that the volume deserves about the same secrecy-rating as the annual "confidential" number of your wife's sorority magazine and that, if Farnsworth sold anything that was truly a secret of the American military fraternity, it must have been the admirals' grip and the general board whistle. I am informed by naval reservists that they receive regularly through the mail correspondence lessons from the Navy Department that would be far more valuable to an enemy nation than anything in the manual at issue in the Farnsworth case. I gathered that the confidential information to which they referred dealt with new developments in ship and gun construction, and I proceeded to discount it accordingly, for certainly there is nothing about what should truly be naval secrets that our Navy Department wants to or does keep secret from other nations. The Nye Committee showed that our Navy Department fights with the munitioners to keep the making of the implements of war in private hands and that those private hands, lacking the patriotic feelings which keep the nation filling them with new orders for guns, bombs, shells, gas, ships, and planes, have never hesitated to deliver the benefits of their technical proficiency to other nations for a profit.

In short, the suspicion will not down that the Farnsworth and Thompson cases, technically well-founded though they may be, are merely the natural by-product of one of the two divisions of the military and naval caste, the very military and naval division. The other division is made up of those soldiers and sailors who, despite their training, have managed to retain perspective and some common sense in matters affecting their professions. They are in the minority, of course. The majority are like Captain William D. Puleston, chief of Naval Intelligence, a womanish old man who in his quiet way is one of the country's leading red-baiters. It was Puleston who a year or so ago told a Congressional committee the famous story about the Communists using comely gals to entrap those of our gallant sailor lads who could not be won to Moscow by leaflets dropped down ships' ventilators on visiting day. Puleston was also the chief force behind the Tydings-McCormack bill. Twice passed over by the selection board and doomed to retire shortly without having attained a rear admiralty, Puleston seems to think a spy hunt his best chance of going out in a blaze of glory, along with Rear Admiral Joseph M. Reeves who, as commander of the United States fleet a few months ago, signalized the onrush of the current spy scare by issuing a general order. The order forbade officers and enlisted men to have cameras aboard ship. Roundly blasphemed against throughout the navy as a silly mandate that would serve no purpose save to prevent men on foreign station from sending photographs of temples, junks, and rickshas home to their families, it had to be amended so that the midshipmen might take cameras along on their training cruise aboard the antiquated Arkansas.

Huey Long the Second

BY GEROLD FRANK

Cleveland, July 18

"I'D LIKE an interview," I insisted, scrambling along with the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith of Louisiana as he strode out a back entrance of Public Hall, where the Townsend convention was still in session.

"Sure," said Smith. "Come in the cab with us."

We got in—his wife, Mary, his secretary, the two of us. "How'd I do, mother?" he asked Mrs. Smith jubilantly. "I gave it to them, didn't I? It was up to par, wasn't it?"

"It sure was," said Mrs. Smith, patting his shoulder.

"They all agreed with me, didn't they?" Smith went on, mopping his face. "They all went with me, didn't they? I gave 'em everything. I always do."

He had given the Townsendites everything. He had the old folks ringing their cowbells and applauding themselves hoarse at one of the finest rabble-raising, Bible-quoting, "I'm-going-to-take-off-my-coat-and-give-you-a-red-hot-fightin'-speech" harangues ever sent through a loud-speaker system at a national convention. H. L. Mencken had his mouth wide open and his spectacles almost off his nose all through it.

Five minutes later the Reverend Mr. Smith was splashing vigorously in a tub at the Hotel Cleveland and I was sitting on the only available seat.

"You didn't see anyone disagreeing with what I said, did you?" he asked anxiously. "I speak from the heart. I don't have a cynical corpuscle in my body. I sweated like a Georgia pig, I tell you. Do I sound hoarse? That's not real hoarseness. I talk like that and sweat like that, six, eight, ten times a day. I just lose one voice and get another one on a different pitch. I never lose a pound, either."

He stood up and rubbed himself furiously with a towel. He is five feet nine or ten. He has sandy hair with a forelock, a bronzed, high-lighted face with high cheekbones like an Indian's, a large mouth with strong white teeth, a hawk-like nose, and staring blue eyes. He's healthy and likes being so. He weighs 200 pounds—"Huey Long and me used to weigh the same to an ounce. Wore each other's clothes. Huey—he was a genius."

The prevailing attitude of Townsend leaders toward Gerald Smith is fear. He's dynamite. He has a tremendous demagogic appeal. When he speaks he hunches his trousers, rubs his nose, dries the palms of his hands on his blue shirt-front, gulps water direct from the water pitcher. He has the gift of homely simile. "We walked out of the Senate room," he said, speaking of the Townsend investigation, "our arms linked together like an old steer and a young one galloping across the Texas prairies." He is cunning, ruthless—and proud of his ruthlessness, as a mark of Huey Long—ambitious, visionary, and naive. He makes no secret of his power. He makes no secret of his knowledge that he is a mob leader second only to his beloved Huey. At thirty-eight, he is still a little astonished that he has it.

"I figure I've been worth about $200,000,000 to the South. They like me down there. Democratic congressmen trade on me. They've always had the South in the bag, but now the threat of a Gerald Smith is making them come across with more money. We got as much federal funds as Mississippi and Arkansas together.

"You know what my ambition is? I think chaos is inevitable. I want to get to as many people as I can now, so that when chaos comes, I'll be a leader. I lead them now. Since Huey's death, 6,000,000 people have committed themselves to me—in writing."

"You mean they signed a pledge?" I asked.

"No," he said. "They wrote me, 'You're our leader. We'll follow you.'"

He began striding about the room, shaking the water out of his hair, still nude.

"People have tried to hang me, stab me, kill me. They've shot at me. A year ago last May they tried to hang me with a cable from my own sound truck. I was talking in Swainesboro, Georgia, to a bunch of Georgia planters. They began mobbing me. One man climbed on the truck and pulled the cable out. They were shouting, 'Hang him, hang him.' I walked out on a little platform"—here he jumped on a chair—"like this, looked them straight in the eye and said, 'The first man who touches me will die within the fortnight.'"

"I suppose they all believed you, didn't they?" I asked. "They're pretty religious down there."

"I believed myself," said Smith seriously. "I believed it was true, too. I was so right and good and honest and swell that I was sure any man who touched me would die."

"Let me tell you a little about my philosophy," he went on. "You've got to know how to lose the sense of the passing of time. I learned that from Huey Long. Many a man has lost a victory because he thought he had to go to luncheon at 12 o'clock. He got all cooled off by 1:30. You've got to be in a state of crisis to do things well. That means you've got to look over men and events, convince yourself that there is a crisis. Then you've got the mentality of a soldier in a trench. Nothing stops you. You're ruthless. When you're right and know you're right, you should now be ruthless."

Did he really think, just man to man you know, that the Townsendites would ever get their $200 a month?

"I do. Why not? Haven't we had a national income of $90,000,000,000 in this country? If we stop all usury and taxes, open our factories, run them day and night, set our machinery working the way it should be, can't we make it $100,000,000,000? One-fourth the population is over sixty. Can anyone prove to me that it's wrong for one-fourth the population to have one-fourth the income—especially since they're the people who've done everything and had all the babies. They're the fathers and mothers of every outstanding man in America, as well as every insignificant one. Why shouldn't the cream of the population skim off the cream of the nation's wealth?" he demanded, placing a foot on a chair and resting his elbow on his knee. "Doesn't a boy always put his mother first? Doesn't he let her go into the elevator first? We do it socially. Why not economically? Why shouldn't she get the first chance at the nation's money? You take your hat off to her when she gets in the elevator, but you let her starve when she gets old."

He began walking around, rubbing his bare chest, slapping his bare knee.

"These peanut-headed Jim Farley stooges ask how the Townsendites are going to spend all the money they get. Well, how did they build the country? How'd they build the Union Pacific, lay pavements, make roads, erect cities? How'd they have the babies? It's a fine appraisal of our American civilization that we can't give the people who built America credit for enough intelligence to spend the wealth they produced!"

"Do you think the Townsendites will grow in number?" I asked.

"I don't think in terms of organisms," he replied impatiently. "I think in terms of social organization. The people will keep on fomenting and fermenting, and some fellow like me, who's fearless and honest, will get on the radio, make three or four speeches, and have them in his hand. The people are beginning to trust leadership."

"But isn't there a chance that you may pass on, like Huey Long, and that some unscrupulous man will take the people over for his own purposes?"

The Reverend Mr. Smith looked out the window.

"That's the hazard of political and social stupidity and a dulness of the social consciousness," he said rapidly. "People don't awake except with pain—and in the panic of pain they do irrational things."

Would he and his 6,000,000 support Landon?

"I'm not supporting Landon," he said emphatically. "Roosevelt is licked. He's whipped. As we say down in Louisiana, not only whipped, but whooped! As for Landon, philosophically and politically he's no better than Roosevelt—but he's not in. He's not entrenched. If he sees Roosevelt kicked out, he's not likely to follow the same path."

And what would he, Smith, do if Roosevelt wins?

"Well," said the Reverend Mr. Smith, drawing on his trousers and slipping into another blue shirt, "if Roosevelt goes back again with his threats and his bribery, I'll impeach him."

He paused for a moment and thought heavily.

"When I say I, I speak as a symbol. I'll head a movement to impeach him."

He stood silent, then, staring reflectively at the door jamb.

"I wonder," he said. "D'you suppose it would have had any effect, that speech of mine, if Landon would have been in the audience and were elected tomorrow?"

Background of the Spanish Revolt

BY FRANK MANUEL

(Mr. Manuel's article reached us just before the outbreak of the fascist counter-revolution in Spain. Its analysis of the strength and weakness of the Spanish Popular Front is striking in the light of the recent events.)

Madrid, July 10

A STRANGER attending the session of the Spanish Congress on June 16 and seeing the unanimity with which a left Republican, a Communist, a Socialist, a Syndicalist rushed to the defense of the Popular Front, would never have expected the outbreak of a revolt. He would have come away with the impression that the revolution was progressing with a majestic sweep. Unfortunately this parliamentary display was deceptive. The ovations which Prime Minister Quiroga received from the whole of the left cannot patch up the bitter internal conflicts which are weakening the Popular Front government.

In 1931 Socialists and Republicans drove the king out of Spain to seek refuge on the race-tracks of Europe. A coalition government was formed to build a republic of "workers of every class," vast social projects were considered, and libertarian democracy was to open new vistas for an oppressed people. Within two years this reformist government lost its morale because it was forced to suppress Syndicalist uprisings and to shoot peasants who had wearied of all the legal red tape which surrounded the agrarian reform. The workers felt that they had been deceived by the bourgeois Republicans whom they had raised to power, with the result that the three Socialist ministers who held office, Prieto, Caballero, and Fernando de los Rios, lost much of their prestige among the people. Legislative and judicial ineptitude in Madrid left the country under the influence of the caciques, the clergy, the landowners, the money-lenders, and the local politicians.

Under these circumstances the Jesuits and the aristocrats were able to effect their famous coup in 1933 and to wreak bloody vengeance upon all elements of the left. Only in the face of this reaction did the workers and the bourgeois again draw together. The proletarian parties first attempted a revolt of their own, the uprising in the Asturias, but it did not receive the necessary support in other parts of the country and for the moment was a fiasco.

In his exile in Paris, Prieto, the Socialist leader, conceived the idea of a Popular Front which would include all left Republicans, Socialists, Communists, and Syndicalists. A whirlwind campaign was conducted for the elections of February 16, 1936, with Amnesty for the Asturians as the rallying cry. Azaña, the leader of the left Republicans, appealed to all elements and the favor of the Syndicalists was courted with great zeal. Much to the surprise of all the participants, the Popular Front won a decisive victory and, after three days of civil unrest, came into power.

On the morrow of the elections arose the same problem which had confronted the left in 1931. Who shall govern? This time left Republicans were sent into the ministries alone and the Socialists refused active collaboration. At the head of the state there is Azaña, a novelist, journalist, and lover of art. He represents that anti-clerical group of cultured Spaniards for whom one of the main aspects of the social problem is the preservation of the finer things in life. Some have considered him the strong man of the country, the one who led the first revolution and helped to achieve the revival of the left Republicans. To others he is intelligent, weak, vacillating, and most happy to have left the mêlée for the calm of the presidency where, according to the constitution, he must have no opinions.

Casares Quiroga, the prime minister, held the portfolio of the interior in the first Azaña Cabinet and of public works in the second. He is noted for his energy and administrative capacity. Though he came from an upper bourgeois family and was a successful lawyer most of his money was spent in fomenting the first Republican revolution. Of the whole ministry only he and his former assistant, who is now Minister of Public Works, may be expected to hazard extreme measures in favor of the workers. As Minister of War he holds a vital post and the manner in which he dealt with the rebellion of the officers of Alcala found favor in the eyes of the left.

Since the Socialists are the largest group in the congress, their refusal to participate in the ministry has placed the government in an ambiguous position. It would vastly prefer to have the Socialists partake of some of the responsibilities of these trying moments. But over just this issue, collaboration or not, the Socialist Party is divided into at least two groups whose mutual recriminations have been growing ever more scandalous during the last few months. The opposing organs of these two factions doubt each other's personal integrity, pass on to rank insults, and draw shrieks of joy from the monarchists, who agree with the accusations of both parties. This schism within the ranks of the Socialists is one of the real dangers for the progress of any revolutionary action. Prieto, the leader of the centrists who are in favor of participation, is backed by many of the intellectuals in the party, while Caballero, with the support of the General Union of Labor, heads the left Socialists.

The industrialists in the country are looking about for a Thiers, some ex-radical or ex-socialist leader who will stem the tide of the revolution through his influence over the masses. First Lerroux was their man; then, with very little discernment, they looked toward Azaña. Now that Prieto has come to represent the right Socialists and is in favor of collaboration with the left Republican regime, they are considering him for the post, but he has rejected their advances. In justifying his support of collaboration in the left Republican government, he argues that there is no need for the revolution to be fought out on the streets when it can be effected through government decree. First he would raise Spanish economy from its present low station and then he would pull the social revolution out of his bag. Prieto feels that the example of the Nazis, a revolution by a party which is in power, holds a lesson for Spanish socialism. Violent revolution at the present time would cause a state of anarchy from which the workers would be the first to suffer.

With whom will the masses go? It seems quite certain that they will follow Caballero, rather than Prieto, and that as a result Spanish socialism will lose its most intelligent leader. The same thorny problem, evolution or revolution, which has caused the disruption of so many Socialist parties in the past, is now reappearing in Spain. All the old arguments on both sides will be piled up, the debate will grow bitter, and then each group will go its way, leaving enemies where once there were comrades. The political experience of two years in power, 1931-1933, made some of the Socialists abandon their reformist position forever. If the reformist policy of collaboration had any validity in Spain they would not now be reviving agrarian legislation which they passed two years ago.

Because of his militant position the socialist youth organizations are all with Caballero. They pronounce frequent expressions of unity with the communist youth and in some sections have achieved a complete amalgamation with them. The situation has its paradoxical side. We witness the spectacle of the official Communists, in their pursuit of the party line which calls for the preservation of the Popular Front against fascism, appearing far less violent in their declarations than the left-wing Socialists. The Mundo Obrero, the communist daily, regularly eulogizes the activities of the Quiroga government for the expedition with which the agrarian reform is proceeding and hardly ever intervenes in the quarrel within the Socialist Party. Claridad, the organ of the Caballero group, on the other hand, is never sparing in its criticisms, either of left Republicans or of reformist Socialists. As expressed by Claridad, the formula of the Caballero faction is diversity in unity. They permit themselves to pursue their own revolutionary program, but they will rush to the defense of the Popular Front as soon as its existence is endangered. The Socialista, in defense of the centrists, attempts to chastise Claridad, but it adopts the tone of an old lady. "Ah, what would Pablo Iglesias have said if he arose from his grave to witness the goings on at Ecija. This is not in the tradition of our party with its fifty years of struggle and self-sacrifice. We refuse to engage in this battle of mud-slinging initiated by the Caballero group. We will remain in our virtue." And yet, every once in a while, it loses its temper and asks indiscreet questions, such as where Claridad obtained money for its elaborate establishment, intimating that a bank of Catholic reactionaries supplied the funds.

Claridad cannot understand the zeal with which Prieto is pursuing his ideal of collaboration with the present left republican Cabinet. The journal goes on the assumption that the left Republicans, many of whom were incarcerated by the reactionaries, have learned nothing. Considering the pronouncements of Quiroga, and the actual measures taken by his ministry, this may be an exaggeration. It was the duty of the Socialists to sacrifice their revolutionary anti-bourgeois program in order to save the state from fascism and they accomplished this by putting the left Republicans in power. Now it is high time that the revolutionary parties began to work in their own behalf.

Alvarez del Vayo and Araquistáin as journalists have contributed much of the theory to Caballero's position. It is their ultimate plan to create a Marxist-Leninist Party which will include the left Socialists and the Communists. Though completely communist in its revolutionary Marxist ideology and even in its praise of Soviet Russia, the Caballero group has not yet fused with the Communist Party. This may be explained by the fact that the Spanish wing of the Third International has come into prominence only within the last two years. Before this there was a scattered group of Communist parties, some under Trotsky influence, others independent, still others under the direction of the Comintern, while none of them held a dominant position among the people. Within the past few years official Communists of the Third International have made tremendous progress, especially among the youth. Much prestige has been won for the party by the adherence of numerous groups of intellectuals, especially the revolutionary poets like Rafael Alberti. French anti-fascist writers, Malraux, Lenormand, and Jean Richard Bloch, are regularly coming across the Pyrenees to cement relations between the two Communist parties. It would, however, be extravagant to expect that this Communist Party, which is just training itself under the leadership of a sturdy worker from Seville, José Diaz, and is only beginning to win adherents, will absorb the old Socialist Party with its elaborate organization. And so the two groups, left-wing Socialists and Communists, remain separate though there is hardly any difference of opinion on vital issues.

In the meantime the followers of Caballero, in their crusade to form a united front of all workers, have carried on extensive negotiations with the Anarcho-Syndicalists and actually got them to vote at the time of the elections. These Syndicalists, who are united in the National Confederation of Labor, as opposed to the socialist General Union of Labor, are sometimes most unpleasant bed-fellows for the Socialists. Rooted in certain parts of Spain ever since the days of Bakunin, they are the unknown element in the present agitation. This is the last country in the world where in a capital city one can still witness a meeting of 20,000 anarchists and listen to a lyrical eulogy of abstract liberty. They are in favor of libertarian communism and are opposed to all parliamentary forms. Organized in the National Confederation of Labor, they claim some 700,000 adherents in their thousand unions while the Socialists number them at about 500,000. The Socialists are continually complaining that though there may be some idealists among them and though the mass of the anarchists are loyal revolutionary workers, they cannot be relied upon during a moment of crisis. Thus during the revolution of October, 1934, throughout all of Spain, they did nothing; only in the Asturias, where their number was small, were they goaded into joining the Socialists and Communists. Yet they have a long tradition in some sections of the country, and great influence.

There is every indication that these anarchists will continue with their agitation and that strikes will be settled, only to be renewed again at the first possible opportunity. The problem then poses itself how the government and the right Socialists are to react to these movements in the street should they become violent. As long as these are mere strikes the government can play at economic liberalism and can warn the Civil Guard that it has no right to intervene. It can pass out stringent orders against any attack upon the people, backing up its noble intentions with severe punishments whenever the guards act without authorization. But when the movement assumes serious proportions, as of course in due time it must as a result of the cumulative effect of these general strikes, will the present left Republican government, with its strong Socialist tinge, repress the uprising of the people, as the former absolutist government did?

On May 24, in his speech at Cadiz, Caballero hoped to tame the anarchists by proving that there was no fundamental difference of opinion between the militant Socialist and the Syndicalist. "We, too, say that the bourgeois state must disappear because the bourgeois state is nothing more than an organization of oppression against a class, our class. And when this class triumphs and establishes a new regime, when the regime perfects itself, the state per se will disappear. This is the doctrine of the General Union of Labor." Thus the Marxist-Leninist withering away of the state is harmonized with the Syndicalist hatred of all its forms and institutions.

There is always the danger that the revolutionary movement will run wild, beyond the control of its leaders. The strike movements, which have touched every industry and every province in Spain, have put the people in a feverish state, aggravated by the warring of the two socialist groups. Nothing brings more solace to the heart of the corrupt Spanish bourgeois in the cafés than the sight of these two federations of labor sabotaging each other in strikes.

The liberals are much exercised over these strike movements which are spreading throughout Spain. They warn the leaders of the socialist U.G.T. that the violent Marxist tendency which made itself felt in 1933 alienated the people away from republicanism into the bosom of the monarchists. Unless these movements, which force the government to suspend its labor of reform, soon stop, there will be a complete disorganization of the Popular Front with results not unlike those of 1933. The fascist menace has been overcome only through the unity of the radicals of all kinds, but as soon as these groups fall out among themselves there remains the danger that the fascist Spanish Phalanx will arise in the midst of their quarrels.

Increasing the danger is the existence of the Civil Guard, a military body organized some sixty years ago, which has become one of the most disciplined corps in Europe. In the course of time this force, originally formed as a bandit patrol, has been transformed into the arm of the bourgeoisie against the workers. The Civil Guard in Spain is the real army. Since most of the recruits are drawn from among the sons of these guards, strong family traditions have become attached to this body. Children begin to prepare for the service at an early age in special academies where, along with a spirit of rigid discipline, hatred for the workers is implanted in their hearts. With such antecedents an intermittent battle between the Civil Guard, 35,000 in number, and the proletariat cannot be avoided. Why then does the government not advance with strong measures against this intractable body? The answer to this question reveals the pathetic position of Quiroga at this moment.

His government exists and nothing more. It lives with the continual threat of a fascist bludgeon or a military dictatorship over its head. All of its time is spent in settling endless strikes and all of its energy is wasted in survival. It is not undergoing any dramatic agony. It just moves along. Forceful measures are vital and it seems clear that the present government will not take them.

In the midst of these vacillations the ranks of the Spanish Phalanx increase and there are rumors about shipments of ammunition which have been received and stored away. For every hideout of Primo de Rivera's boys which is raided, for each arsenal of arms and collection of uniforms which is discovered, there are many others about which the government has no knowledge. Its own police cannot always be trusted to ferret out the enemies of the republic. The fascists can play upon the despair of the workers and the divisions within the ranks of the revolutionary parties. Wages have not risen since this Popular Front government came into power. "We'll have fascism yet. That's all we deserve," said one worker from the National Confederation of Labor. And though I do not quote him as typical, he is a symbol of what might result from the present situation—the lassitude of the working classes, a state of indifference into which the reactionaries might rush to take possession.

There are a million unemployed in Spain and there is no dole except the meager aid granted by the unions to their members. Under the aegis of Spanish industrialists economic conditions must go from bad to worse. Many of them are closing up their factories and are leaving the country. In spite of all the restrictions on the movement of pesetas out of the country, millions are leaving with comparative ease. Spain is impoverished and any exploitation of its resources is dependent upon a total reorganization of its economy. Under these circumstances the fascist menace is no mere oratorical blather. The Supreme Court has declared the Phalanx to be a legal organization and the inner conflicts among the workers combined with another parliamentary period of legal hair-splitting after the manner of the years 1931-1933—during which it took a year and a half to draft the agrarian reform—may yet open the gates for a brutal fascism.

The Soviet Abortion Law

BY LOUIS FISCHER

IN the Soviet Union, medicine is socialized. Almost all physicians work for the state, and all clinics, hospitals, and dispensaries are state-owned and state-operated. Private practice, however, is permitted, and the new and efficient Commissar of Health, Gregory Kamin-sky, has even encouraged it; the communal health facilities are sometimes inefficient or imperfect.

What will happen, in conditions of socialized medicine, now that abortions are strictly prohibited except when the health or life of the pregnant woman is imperilled? Exactly what happens in any other country. This is not only my view. It was stated times without number in the Soviet press during the popular discussion provoked by the government's anti-abortion bill of May 26, 1936.

During the two past years, Soviet newspapers have printed a number of items about the discovery of secret, private abortion stations and the trial and punishment of those concerned. As soon as it became more difficult to obtain a permit to abort, illegal operations increased. Dr. Martha Ruben-Wolf, a celebrated German physician now living in the U. S. S. R., contributed an article on this subject to the Moscow Deutsche Zentral Zeitung. She related how, some time ago, a misunderstood circular caused several Soviet counties to prohibit abortions. "Immediately, the number of underground abortions mounted. When, several years ago, abortions were temporarily refused in cases of first pregnancy, many young women paid for this mistake with their lives or their health. In May and June, 1935, thanks to a bureaucratic permit system, the requests of many pregnant women were indiscriminately denied. As a result, innumerable instances of self-provoked miscarriages were reported by the Botkin, Sklifassovsky, and Arbat hospitals in Moscow." Other evils, Dr. Ruben-Wolf fears, will accompany the proscription of abortion. "The dread of conception," she says, "will bring back old sex abnormalities such as homosexuality, perverse relations, sexual neuroses, and so on."

It will have been noted that in the discussion which raged around this unfortunate piece of legislation, the choice was always: abortion or child. But what about the alternative of contraception? The law makes no mention of this most pivotal problem. For this omission, the government was taken severely to task in a large number of letters which appeared in the press during the discussion. Dr. Ruben-Wolf places part of the blame on physicians "who do not give sufficient enlightenment on contraceptives to women after child delivery or after an abortion." Soviet women can get information on contraception in innumerable centers. Indeed, lectures on the subject are sometimes held in factories, clubs, collective farms. But the state, the medical profession, and the population have paid far too little attention to this phase. Many Russians, especially Russian men, have strong prejudices against contraceptives. M. Yeskoba, a woman physician at the Moscow Electrofactory employing 22,000 workers, most of them women, tells of her experience in teaching birth control. "There are many," she wrote in the Moscow Daily News, "whom we cannot convince, some who are predisposed in favor of abortions, others ignorantly skeptical, still others, strange to say, embarrassed by the whole idea."

Recently, however, a change has come about. "Since the publication of the draft of the anti-abortion law," M. Yeskoba related, "there has been noticeable a distinct increase of interest in birth-control methods. Women . . . are asking to be advised." Partly because women were not sufficiently educated and partly as a result of masculine pressure, the attitude toward abortions here has been much too frivolous. Any departure from this tendency would be welcome. But the authorities, too, are not free from guilt. In a country which has solved gigantic industrial problems—one has only to think of the latest example, the radical improvement of the transport system—it is certainly possible to produce high-quality mechanical and chemical birth-control paraphernalia. And if it is impossible, they ought to be imported. Moreover, though the facts of birth control are available to all, there has been no drive and enthusiasm behind the effort to disseminate them. Yet this is the weapon against abortions.

In the circumstances, it is natural to suspect that the government neglects birth control because it wants a larger population and large families. Indeed the draft of May 26, 1936, provided that a mother receive 2,000 roubles annually for five years for each child after her seventh, and 5,000 roubles after the eleventh. Letters to the press demanded that these premiums begin with the fifth or sixth child. Had the Kremlin accepted this suggestion, it would have been following in the footsteps of the Nazis who recently decreed a ten-mark monthly grant for every fifth and additional child born into a family which earns 185 marks a month or less. But in the law of June 27, the bolsheviks lag just a bit behind the Nazis: the bonuses begin with the seventh child. Five thousand roubles are to be paid after the tenth instead of after the eleventh baby. Is this the socialist way of bringing more children into the world?

Bolsheviks argue incessantly in favor of more births. They do not contend that more births in the next few years will help the nation in the second world war, assuming it comes. For if it arrives in less than eighteen years, the babies who will owe their existence to the abortion ban will not yet be able to bear arms. And I do not think the bolsheviks' anti-abortion policy has 1954 in mind. There is more cogency in the statement that modern wars are devastating and that if Russia is engaged in war she will lose many men and should therefore prepare for this eventuality in advance by increasing the birth rate. Soviet spokesmen, too, often seek to justify the big-family propaganda on the ground that the labor scarcity, already a problem, will increase as the nation's industries develop.

In my own view, these considerations are quite subsidiary, yet if repeated often enough with sufficient earnestness, they induce the innocent to overlook the more urgent reasons for family-life reform. The important fact is that the Soviet birth rate is falling. Between 1925 and 1928, according to Robert R. Kuczynski, formerly of the Brookings Institute in Washington, there was a "considerable decrease of the birth rate of European Russia," and especially in the Ukraine, White Russia, Moscow, and Leningrad. Fertility, he shows, is higher in small Soviet cities than in large, and higher in the villages than in small cities. With augmented urbanization since 1929, it is fair to assume that the birth rate is being further retarded. Moscow, which had a birthrate of 30.7 in 1925, dropped to 21.7 in 1929 and 15.3 in 1935. The total population of the territory of the U. S. S. R. increased 19 per cent between 1913 and 1933, but only 12.8 per cent between 1927 and 1933. The net annual increases in the number of inhabitants of the U. S. S. R., moreover, show a general decline since 1929. Thus the excess of births over deaths between 1926 and 1927 was 3,400,000; between 1927 and 1928, 3,600,000; between 1928 and 1929, 3,800,000; but between 1929 and 1930, 3,300,000; between 1930 and 1931, 2,900,000, and in the following two years an average of 2,600,000.

It will be submitted that abortions have much to do with this circumstance. Certainly. But the number of abortions is alarming. V. V. Paevski, in his Elements of Statistics, a Soviet publication which appeared in 1931, supplies some of the latest available data for Leningrad. In 1926, there were 43,416 completed pregnancies in that city; in 1927, 40,953, and in 1928, 39,058—this though the total number of inhabitants was increasing owing to internal immigration. In the same three years, however, the number of abortions mounted from 21,646 to 35,523 to 53,562. There were thus more abortions than births. It is not uncommon for a middle-aged Soviet city woman to have had eight or more abortions.

This situation, the authorities realize, must be altered. But they are attacking the problem in the wrong way. I frequently visit the marriage, divorce, birth, and death registration bureaus because they are one of the best contacts with Soviet life. Recently while I sat in one, a woman came in with her two-weeks' old baby. I moved over to her and asked whether she had wanted the child. She said, "Yes," and smiled down affectionately into its face. I then asked whether she would have known what to do to prevent its coming if she had not desired it. She replied, "Of course. We have a son of six, and from his birth till now we had no children."

"And why did you wish to have this baby at this time?"

"You see," she replied, "my husband was promoted and we received a second room."

More rooms, and more diapers, cribs, day nurseries would be the Marxist method of coping with a declining birthrate. If the Soviets want more children they should first create the accommodations for them. And if they think abortions are harmful, as they are in excess, they should increase the popularity of other forms of birth control.

A falling birth rate is, in itself, no cause for great concern. The U. S. S. R.'s total population is rising rapidly. The apparent contradiction is explained by the sharp drop in adult and child mortality. The percentage of child deaths in Czarist Russia was frightful. The change since then has been due, to some extent, to better medical service, living conditions, and infant care. But perhaps the increase in the number of survivors is partly accounted for by the reduction in the number of births per family. The proscription of abortions may raise the birth rate, but it may also raise the mortality rate.

The factor of birth rate played a role in the Soviets' declaration of war on unlimited abortions. There was another, if anything, a better, reason: unrestricted abortions led to laxness of sex life and enabled men to live with young girls and then compel them to submit to abortions. I think the Bolshevik leaders are disturbed by the irregularity of sex relations in the U. S. S. R. This, more than anything else, is what produced the law of June 27, 1936. Suggestions have even been heard to deny legality to unregistered marriages on the ground that they are less likely than registered unions to be lasting. After a costly period of experimentation, the Soviet nation seems to be settling down to more normal sex relations. The chief purpose of the new law is the stabilizing of the family. Theoretically, the Bolsheviks do not accept the family as the inevitable unit of social life. Practically, however, they have never deliberately disrupted the family; there is, as yet, no institution to substitute for it. But Soviet conditions in the past destroyed many families—the two generations which it always embraces were frequently at political and economic loggerheads. Today, that phase is ended. The family in the U. S. S. R. will be strengthened. Now and then, indeed, Soviet organs begin to point out that the insecurity of bourgeois countries is undermining the family.

It is natural, accordingly, that the law should contain provisions regarding divorce and alimony. "In order," it reads, "to fight against a frivolous attitude toward the family and family obligations," both parties to a marriage are to be summoned by the registrar before a divorce is granted. Divorce in the absence of one party whose first notification might be an official postcard disappears. Moreover, the cost of divorces is raised. Hitherto, the fee has been three roubles. The law fixes it at 50 roubles for the first divorce, 100 for the second, and 300 for the third and subsequent divorces.

These arrangements, when they appeared in the draft, did not please many commentators. Although one person would have put the divorce fee still higher as a punishment, she wrote, "for those who regard marriage frivolously," a wife said she would pay for the divorce if her husband wanted to leave her and had not enough money. Moreover, innumerable letters to the press stated that these increased charges would create no difficulties for the better paid but would make divorce less accessible to the poor. Some, accordingly, urged that the cost of divorce be in proportion to income. Who pays for the divorce? others asked. The draft was silent on this point. So is the law. The law, in fact, turns a deaf ear to all the constructive criticism and helpful suggestions about divorce which came from the masses in the course of the discussion.

If the working of the law on divorce leaves much to be desired, the provisions about alimony are quite deplorable. The draft devoted only four over-simplified lines to this highly complicated problem. It proposed that 33 1/3 per cent of a father's salary go to the divorced mother with one child, 50 per cent if there were two children, 60 per cent for three or more children. The law reduces these percentages to 25 per cent, 33 1/3 per cent, and 50 per cent respectively; but here again the excellent ideas brought out in the discussion were completely ignored by the government. Alimony in the Soviet Union is never designed for the support of ex-wives. A childless divorcee is not entitled to alimony. Alimony is only for children. But 25 per cent of a man's salary may be much more than one child requires. Alimony, in such cases, can become a business.

A woman is left with a child. She soon marries a prosperous second husband. She may not need very much alimony, yet her first husband, if he has to pay her 25 per cent of his salary, may be handicapped, during the eighteen-year alimony period, in creating a second family. If he earned 400 roubles, 100 would go to the one child of the first marriage and only 300 would remain for himself, his second wife, and their three or four or more children. Flat alimony percentages will give rise to unfairness, many protested. What was the sense, people asked further, in sending a man to prison for the non-payment of alimony? In jail he earned too little money and his children would merely suffer. Was there no other method of forcing him to meet his obligations? G. Elkin, judge of the Moscow high court, stated in the Izvestia that "court experience showed that questions of alimony could not be decided mechanically." One child receiving alimony is well, for instance, he said. Another is ill. An individual approach is necessary, he stated, in each case. The courts or special commissions ought to have this matter in hand. A district attorney reminded the government that the age of children should also play a role in fixing alimony. Did the lawmakers read these letters in the press? There is no sign in the final law that they did.

A host of personal tragedies will flow from this law. "Bootleg" abortion clinics will kill and cripple women. A hysterical cry will go up from women who will knock at door after door seeking an abortion permit. The youth will suffer. Perhaps, before many months have elapsed, the wailing and misery will compel the U. S. S. R.'s first Parliament to repeal this unjustifiable act at its first session in 1937. That would redeem Soviet democracy.

(Mr. Fischer's first article on the new Soviet abortion law appeared last week.)

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

FOR the first time I have had to ask myself whether the President is losing his political skill and intuition. His decision not to accept Postmaster Farley's resignation, but merely to give him a leave until after the election, seems like a first-class political blunder. I have no doubt that it is due to a feeling that he must be loyal to the man who has done his political work for him and taken a lot of blame that belongs upon other shoulders. But if, as the newspapers reported, he gave the leave of absence in the belief that that would be sufficient to allay the popular feeling against Farley and Farleyism, the President is quite mistaken. It is a pity that he cannot visit incognito some of our best moving-picture houses and hear for himself the whole-hearted hisses and boos with which the Postmaster General is greeted when his picture is thrown on the screen. It will not in any way mitigate the force of the Republican attacks upon Farley and what he typifies if he is on temporary leave and certain to return to the Cabinet if the President wins another term. That the Republicans are hypocritical in getting after Farley is obvious. The party of Mark Hanna and Matt Quay and Will Hays and Walter Brown and all of the Ohio gang has the nerve of a brass monkey to criticize anybody for playing politics when in the Cabinet. What has happened is that the public has grown more sensitive to the spoils system and that it is outraged by Farley's holding three jobs, that of National Democratic Chairman, New York State Chairman, and Postmaster General. Never before was so much political patronage concentrated in the hands of one man. I believe that the President will pay heavily for this in lost votes.

Doubtless the President may feel that he is showing courage and independence by refusing to give up Farley in the face of what he considers unjust criticism. Well, it is not unjust criticism of this set-up. On the contrary the public dissatisfaction about it, which I believe would continue if the Republicans should drop all mention of the Postmaster General, denotes a healthy public concern which ought to be heeded. Here is a case where it would not only be astute and good politics to listen to the voice of the people but would be raising the standards of government. It is not as if the President were going to have an easy walk-over and were therefore in a position to ignore widespread criticism. I have the growing feeling that he has got to fight hard to win. I do not base this upon the recent poll of the Institute of Public Opinion. His strength is with labor which rarely shows in a poll of the Literary Digest type. It cannot be denied that if the Lemke ticket is put in the field it is going to draw enough votes in some states, Connecticut, for instance, to make the state extremely doubtful for the President. Aside from that, in this election the attack will center on Mr. Roosevelt himself. So many Republicans voted for the original New Deal measures that the Democrats have some extremely effective ammunition in waiting. Hence Mr. Roosevelt is the safest target. He will have to defend himself against charges from all quarters notably with regard to the administrative weakness of his administration.

Under the circumstances what would seem to be the best policy for him? Not only taking the offensive but making clear-cut, straightforward statements as to where he is heading and what he proposes to do. If it is answered that it would be manifestly unfair to ask him to bind himself in these times when it is impossible to foresee what may be the economic future in this country or the political one abroad, the answer is that whether it is fair or unfair if Mr. Landon knows his business he will put to the forefront of every address some specific questions to the President which will have to be categorically answered or else ignored with unfortunate effects. It would be a great deal better to spike Landon's guns by as elaborate a program as possible. That will be especially difficult for Mr. Roosevelt because it is so contrary to his habit of mind. It may be impossible for him to do anything of this kind; I am only indicating what, in my judgment, a master strategist, sure of his ground, ought to do.

Certainly the President must be more specific than he was at Franklin Field. I find my first impressions of that address confirmed by many talks I have had about it since with a few of those who heard it over the radio. They invariably tell me that it lacked details and that it did not carry conviction with it. But the President must be able to arouse and to inspire if he is going to win. The great employers of this country are going to try to bring more influence to bear upon their workmen than ever before. The Administration is well aware of this danger—I was asked by a subordinate in Washington to suggest any way of heading this off. My answer was that nothing can be done to prevent a manufacturer's saying in a crowded elevator to some of his men, "Well, boys, if Roosevelt wins I'll have to close down." He may sincerely think so. I know one who does and he voted for Roosevelt four years ago. Does not this reinforce the point that this danger can only be met by the President's laying all the cards on the table? He has brought back from their posts almost every ambassador and minister to campaign for him. That is nothing new. Hoover did the same thing. But the Roosevelt diplomats might just as well have stayed abroad. They cannot win the election or aid in any worthwhile degree. Only Franklin Roosevelt can win or lose it—can win it only if he is frank, straightforward, sincere, and convincing, and comprehensive in outlining what he will do if reelected.

THE Townsendite convention in Cleveland may number among its successes the fact that it roused Henry L. Mencken from his lethargy and inspired him to write with much of his old gusto. Indeed most of the newspapermen who covered the gathering turned out highly readable and amusing copy. And yet I missed one thing in the reports. I saw little note taken of the fact that this was one of the most tragic assemblies of the year. One saw the logical and hopeful courses of human aspiration channeled into the gutters. Here was an object lesson in the highly unfortunate circumstance that mankind under pressure tends to seek the comfort of the father image. At least Freud would call it that. In its political implications the tendency is known as fascism.

Like troops who have been in the line too long the legions of the underprivileged turn for comfort to the nearest brass-hat. The fiber of the rank and file has been worn away. Out of their own potential strength they find it difficult to conjure up salvation. They clutch at Father Coughlin.

Of late it has become fashionable in radical circles to say that the good cause is better off without great orators and flaming personalities. Such figures are better left to the romantic who do not understand the vital truth that the mass always makes the leader. This is a dangerous half truth. No leader of any type can get much ahead of his support. Even Mussolini and Hitler hold power by performing their sleight-of-hand stunts before the multitude. But the true prophets should not become high hat. They must, perforce, compete with the priests of Baal somewhat along the lines laid down traditionally for the swaying of the multitude. It is up to the radicals to find within their ranks men who can use the radio more effectively than Father Coughlin, and the red clay parishes of Louisiana cannot forever be left to the Huey Longs and the Gerald Smiths.

To be sure, Earl Browder was more than ready to put in an appearance at Cleveland and Norman Thomas, who wangled an invitation as the lesser of left evils, was gallant in his courage when he faced a hostile audience. The fact that Mr. Thomas was not able to qualify as a veritable Elijah and show up the impotence of the tribal deities should not be scored against his ability as an orator. It was a tough spot. The convention was stacked against him. And yet, judging from rather fragmentary reports, his approach might have been somewhat more inspired. It is not sufficient to tell the Townsendites and the Coughlinites that the panaceas which have won them are unworkable. The case goes deeper. I think it is fair to say that even if every claim made by Coughlin were true and the revolving plan of Dr. Townsend quite easy of arrangement, the goals set by these gentlemen would still be all too insufficient. Certainly the trouble with the Cleveland groups is that as yet they are far too conservative. They want a new world without the pangs of childbirth.

One can go back of Dr. Townsend and Father Coughlin to the credulous days of the Hoover boom. No worker should ever be ready to sell his hope of the cooperative commonwealth for a way station in which chickens are to be found in every pot. Suppose the Townsend plan were practical and that it served to solve the problem of social security for the aged; would it not still leave us with crying perplexities in front of us? I do not remember that any speaker in the great hall took up the question of liberating American children from the mill and factory.

Ironically enough there was hardly a hint of the existence of class consciousness among the Townsendites, the Coughlinites, and the eight million bull frogs who have been organized, according to Gomer Smith, into share-the-wealth clubs of the Reverend Gerald Smith. Who was there in all the hall to speak of war and its creation by international rivalries? The only answer furnished was in the Lemke platform of complete isolation and 200 per cent nationalism which at the moment keeps all Europe under arms.

The Townsendites, I know, take great stock in their own respectability. They shudder at the word communism and they are easy prey for the red-baiting tactics of Father Coughlin. I do not know whether or not Thomas said it, but he should have hailed the delegates as "fellow revolutionists." I understand he did point out that the sort of social security for which they were asking would not be possible under the capitalist system. Sooner or later the Townsendites and the Coughlinites will learn that their leaders are promising them nothing more than an orange in the toe of a stocking. What they really want is a revolving world and not a revolving pension plan.

Even the Townsendites must come of age in time. It is comforting to believe that the whole scheme of economic inequity can be turned out overnight. It is pleasant to believe that it is possible to step right out of the ashes into a coach and four. But there isn't really any Fairy Godmother. Man gets what he needs by fighting and by organization. Some of the speeches made by the priests and preachers at Cleveland sounded beguiling. A fine feast of pie was spread in the sky by Coughlin and by Smith. But let these workers take heed when they return home and observe the passing of the days and the months and the dwindling of their hopes.

Townsendites will get precisely nowhere as long as they continue to think of themselves as safe and sane and the salt of the earth. As such they have lost their savor. They are red pepper or nothing. The next convention of these groups should be carried on without Coughlin, Lemke, Smith, or Townsend. And if it is to end right it will begin with the singing of the International.

BELIEFS IN POETRY

BY HORACE GREGORY

WITHIN the past five years we have had many promises of a hope for a new literature, a new poetry. The promise is all the more dramatic because as recently as 1930 such responsible critics as Newton Arvin and H. L. Mencken (both from extremely different points of view) found the best writing of our time crabbed, "obscure," introverted, sad, thin, despairing. Then, as now, it was said (and I think carelessly) that we were living in a time of transition. It would be better to say that our contemporaries have been and still are abnormally self-conscious. Even those who had not read Freud had absorbed his influence, quite as Matthew Arnold once wrote of Byron, "our soul had felt him." They had become conscious of themselves, of the world they lived in, of their beliefs (or what was once called the lack of them). Look how watchful, how aware they were in the first decade following the war:

And I myself on a swiftly tilting planet
Stand before a glass and tie my tie.

Freud was by no means the least considerable of the influences then at work among the writers. His power lay in his appeal to the literary imagination; through his analysis of the nerve-shocked individual who feared, more than all else, complete loss of personal identity, emerged the figure of the Greek King Oedipus. The powerful resurgence of the old myth gave tragic dignity to individual despair; it was a prop (to those who could afford expensive treatment) against the impulse toward suicide, against the individual temptation to re-enact the mass-destruction of the World War. To those who were unable to purchase such consolations the tragedy became the very lack of individual tragedy in modern life: "I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be," yet in each case the self-consciousness remained.

The obverse of Senlin's face before the mirror was that cult of anti-intellectualism which fled the process of self-examination as a science, but embraced it as a necessary esthetic. This counter-movement we may trace through the later plays of Eugene O'Neill, through an entire phase of D. H. Lawrence, and the authors of the new autobiographies—the John Middleton Murrys, the Saroyans, and last of all, Thomas Wolfe. If we re-read the minor poetry of the earlier period, we shall not fail to notice recurrent images of death, of dryness, impotence, of bone, of brain, of emptiness, of ice. I need not repeat the reasons why we tended to distrust the uses of "belief" during this period. Mr. I. A. Richards's "Principles of Literary Criticism" is a reliable index to that distrust, and the significant poetry of that movement will continue to bear witness to the flaws and merits of his criticism. We were certain then only of what seemed a belief in non-belief, a paradox which proved too ingenious, too fragile to endure beyond the hour.

Today, however, the stress is toward images of positive belief, of life, of rebirth, of machinery in motion, of re-awakened earth in spring, of men marching together: "Oh comrades step beautifully from the solid wall," of love, of hope: "New styles of architecture, a change of heart." We have come a long way in an opposite direction from post- (if not in fact pre-) war consciousness. It is to our good fortune that promise of a new vitality in poetry has been sustained by the writers of the left, who, as Granville Hicks reminds us, are the inheritors of a great tradition in literature. But beyond this healthy show of confidence, we must be prepared to protect the renewal of our hopes from the weedy growths of a too facile optimism. We must be watchful lest the revival of belief will not employ the mere assertion of beliefs as a barrage to conceal our fears of analysis and correction. We must inquire into the nature of poetic belief itself, by discriminating between what is false and what is true in literature, and by examining the meaning of belief in religion, politics, science, and all of those categories which seem to disintegrate the character of daily experience; and to perform that operation without killing the patient we must move toward a synthesis. No chart will plot the course for us—unless we are willing to accept a shallow world of contradictory responsibilities, that is, re-affirm the confusions of the present status quo. It is this conviction which must be confidently preserved if we are to learn anything from the errors and successes of our contemporaries.

It must be borne in mind that poetic belief, in the sense here employed, is a cultural term, with its associations reaching backward through a discontinuous heritage to the sources of a mythology. In this connection M. Paul Valéry, whose acid candor resembles the blindest naivete, once remarked: "Works endure as long as they are of use. That is why they are discontinuous." It is not tradition as opposed to absence of tradition that makes for literary controversy; it is always the choice of which tradition is most desirable.

Mr. Stephen Spender in "The Destructive Element" has made an eloquent, and I think, necessary claim for the heritage of the Symbolist technic in the new Left literature. Its usefulness was demonstrated by Hart Crane when he attempted to telescope the road home to American mythology, when he sought to redefine within the eight short sections of "The Bridge" the total meaning of his cultural experience. Crane's evocations of Powhatan's daughter, Cutty Sark, Walt Whitman, Columbus, Edgar Poe, Rip Van Winkle, Kitty Hawk—all contained within the symbol of his own time, Brooklyn Bridge—were legitimate ambiguities of poetic belief. Through them Crane had no need to justify the psychic horror of what might otherwise have been a mere personal experience as he rode the New York I. R. T. in "The Tunnel." In one passage of the poem he conceived of that experience (crossing under water between Brooklyn and Manhattan) as death by water transformed into subway suicide. Through rapid association we are given "Whose body smokes along the bitten rails?" Poe's death in Baltimore, then from Poe's "The City in the Sea," the "death that looks gigantically down." It was primarily through Poe that Crane merged his identity with one of the sources of American belief, an experience whose realistic horror (as Mr. Paul Elmer More observes) was a heritage Poe gained from the witch-burning, "Day of Doom" Puritans. Hart Crane revived and preserved for us that moment of vision, the penultimate sensation, which is both the weakness and the strength of all romantic poetry.

So far as he was able to merge his identity with the identity of an indigenous myth, "The Bridge" was successful. Crane's failure was a failure to recognize the sharp limits of his cultural heritage, to recognize that it was not continuous, that no one can embrace all elements of his cultural beliefs at one time, in one symbol. When moments of vision failed him, he was then thrown back upon the resources of what to him remained an imperfect technic, a defect which is also discernible in Shelley and Thomas Lovell Beddoes. Thus, Shelley's tendency was to overload eighteenth century humanitarianism with platonic meaning, which was quickly understood if one read his notes, but remained obscure if one did not. Beddoes's defect, on the other hand, arose from the perception of all forms of life as death. All were to be contained within a single ambitious work, a play, "Death's Jest Book," and it is hardly to be wondered that the play failed in its attempt at such a synthesis.

The most conspicuous failure to create a synthesis in our time is to be found in the forty-one "Cantos" of Mr. Ezra Pound. (This is not to deny the excellence of a few "Cantos," four in particular, "Cantos" I, XVII, XXX, and XXXVI.) The particular "belief" given expression in these fragments stems directly from the main-stream of Greco-Roman culture as it entered the Renaissance and was in turn absorbed by the Anglo-American tradition in literature. As long as these fragments of the Greco-Roman myth may be grafted to the roots of our own culture, they remain relevant to our own beliefs in poetry. We have, however, some thirty-odd "Cantos" that are related to scattered myths and beliefs, few of which are vital to the growth of the language, or to any other instrument of belief existing in our time. If we call them "meaningless," we mean that their beliefs are untenable, that to us their language is inadequate. The obscene language of "Cantos" XV and XXXIX is a confession of technical inadequacy; the many inaccurate uses of American slang is further confession of the same failure. Because he fails to discriminate in his choices of poetic beliefs, Mr. Pound seems perennially immoral; for this reason his failures to distinguish between the beliefs of Mussolini and Thomas Jefferson seem no more than a personal aberration, a refusal to keep his eye on the "object." It is significant that in his last "Cantos" published in magazines, his quarrel with the beliefs of his contemporaries has at last reduced him to a quarrel with his own medium.

Now, no one will deny that there is a conflict of technics as well as of beliefs in modern poetry; but if we are to move toward an actual synthesis we must regard beliefs and technics as related aspects of the same mythology. Something of the nature of this conflict has been indicated by Kenneth Burke in his essay on symbolic warfare in the current issue of "The Southern Review." At the present time there is to be noted a peculiarly self-conscious awe in the presence of machinery on the part of younger poets. Such self-consciousness too often takes the form of what Mr. C. Day Lewis calls "adventitious energy" in poetry; but what lies behind the uses of adventitious energy is even more dangerous. It implies (through half-denial) that an actual quarrel exists between poetry and science, and even Mr. Day Lewis is, I think, too willing to admit that poetry was born from magic and science is the great enemy of magic.

From here onward we are likely to confuse the specific terms of belief in science with those of belief in poetry; and here at once we embroil ourselves in an old and somewhat tedious controversy. We add to it, moreover, the mistaken notion that the introduction of machine images in poetry is of very recent origin (which is like the assumption that we oppose tradition with the lack of tradition). We are led to forget that Chapman and Dekker used images of sixteenth century war machinery, that Lord Herbert of Cherbury once wrote a memorable poem to his watch. It was their very lack of uneasiness in assimilating the uses of machine imagery that saved them from the charge of appearing adventitious. What we must accept, is the fact that there are as many ways of writing badly about the machine as there are ways of ineptly describing natural phenomena. To imply that there is lasting and deep warfare between poetry and science is to consider work that is properly beneath notice; and to carry that implication to its extreme conclusion is to say that poetry has become increasingly difficult to write ever since the invention of the wheel.

I do not mean to suggest that a renewed discussion of the meaning of meaning will refute those who tend to inflate the necessity of belief in poetry. My suggestion is to measure the distance we have traveled, by revaluating our literary past as it emerges into the present: to re-examine the worth of recent literary revivals in terms of their contribution to the writing of our time: to recover for our time the discipline implicit in the major poetry of John Milton. It is to be understood that such a program must not be too ambitious. And it is also to be hoped that the beliefs as well as the technics of the new poetry will be tested by a criterion as modest and severe as Friedrich Engel's explanation of the new language that came into being with the writing of "Das Kapital": "Every new aspect of a science involves a revolution in the technical terms of that science."

More Goods for More People

IN 1900, not one family in a hundred owned a horse and buggy; today, three out of four have cars. One family in thirteen had a telephone; now, one family in two. In 1900, modern plumbing and central heating were luxuries—less than 500,000 homes had electricity—radio and electric refrigeration were unknown. Today, 21 million homes are wired; 7 million families own electric refrigerators; 22 million have radio receivers.

In 1921, a MAZDA lamp cost 45 cents; it now costs 15 cents. You receive 80 per cent more light for your dollar because of greatly increased lamp efficiency and a lower average electric rate for the home. General Electric research developed these lower-cost lamps, helped devise more economical ways of generating and distributing electricity—to bring better light to more people at less cost.

Today, electricity is vital to industry, for the manufacture of most goods—from bathtubs to textiles, foods to furnaces—to meet the increasing needs and the purses of millions. In this progress, G-E research and engineering have ever been in the forefront. And still, in the Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, General Electric scientists continue the search for new knowledge—from which come savings, new industries, increased employment, more goods for more people.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

BOOKS

A Poetic View of the Naturalists

GREEN LAURELS, THE LIVES AND ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE GREAT NATURALISTS. By Donald Culross Peattie. Simon and Schuster. $3.75.

MR. PEATTIE, who is a naturalist of some note and who has earned an enviable reputation as a writer of "singing prose" about nature, has undertaken in this book to give a humanized history of the naturalists' contribution to biology. In fifteen short chapters comprising altogether about 350 pages of large-type text, he traces successively the work of the mediaeval schoolmen and herbalists, the contributions of the early microscopists of the seventeenth century, natural history at the court of Louis XV as exemplified by Buffon and Réaumur, the life and times of the great Linnaeus (three chapters), the precocious evolutionism of Lamarck (two chapters), the work of the relatively little-known wilderness plantmen, birdsmen and natural historians in America of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries (three chapters), the rose-tinted speculations of Goethe, Darwinism (two chapters), and finally the peculiar contribution of Henri Fabre with his remarkable descriptions of the habits of insects.

From this summary enumeration it will be obvious that Mr. Peattie's book does not compete with those intensive popularizations of science which seek to give the reader a rich lode of information in a single volume. Linnaeus, Lamarck and Darwin account for half the book, and the rest of the space is by no means portioned out among the next greatest naturalists, but is rather devoted to those whose work can be presented in an interesting setting. Even so one wonders why Gregor Mendel, whose work is both important and pastorally interesting, was left out of Mr. Peattie's book. Doubtless the explanation is that this is not intended to be a complete and exhaustive work about the history of naturalism, but a book short enough to be written throughout at a high pitch of literary craftsmanship.

For Mr. Peattie's book, even if it does not compete with the more encyclopedic popularizations and text books, has indeed its own remarkable merits. There is not a line which is not dramatically vivid and entertaining. The book can be read like a novel at moments of relaxation when the usual work on science would fag the attention. And holding the attention it does manage to convey ideas which are both true and valuable.

The only exception is the constant harping on the poetic beauties and marvels of Nature and the identification of these beauties with the scientific knowledge of the naturalist. "In Nature," we are told, "nothing is insignificant, nothing ignoble, nothing sinful, nothing repetitious. All the music is great music, all the lines have meaning." And we are also repeatedly told that from the naturalists we receive "a reflection of the immense reality they behold." It cannot be too much emphasized, however, that the esthetic viewpoint on Nature, even though it is so often the origin of our scientific interest in the biological kingdom, is out of place in the scientific picture. To the poetic naturalist Nature may be perfect, but not to the analytic scientist. Helmholtz, for example, delighted in piling up a huge list of imperfections in the eye as an optical instrument. Doctors find the vermiform appendix a nuisance rather than a blessing.

And yet Mr. Peattie concludes his book with a hymn to the naturalist, whom he identifies with the poetic naturalist, leaving all the analytic science to be carried on by the laboratory biologist. The hymn is all the more puzzling in that he has the naturalist "make a certain amount of submission toward the findings of the laboratory"; yet he is master in his own house, the mansion of the earth, where alone "are sunset glow, green leaf and eyes to see them: here is all we know of reality, all-sufficient to our destiny, our thoughts and passions. There will never be truer interpreters than the naturalists of this beloved, dusty, struggling, fateful and illustrious experiment called life on earth."

The confusion clears up of course if we take this as mere hyperbole, as the poetic license of an author enthusiastic over his subject matter. And with the caution that such passages on the beauty of nature and the vision of the naturalist are to be regarded as more poetry than scientific truth, Mr. Peattie's book can be safely and properly recommended to a wide circle of readers.

Competition Goes West

THE DECLINE OF COMPETITION: A STUDY OF THE EVOLUTION OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY. By Arthur Robert Burns. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $5.

ARTHUR BURNS has called his book the "Decline of Competition." A solid tome from a crusader for fascism or communism might be dismissed as an extravagant flight of wishful thinking. But if an ancient institution which imposed the laws of Nature—and of Nature's god—upon workaday activity has gone astray, it is not at his impious touch. As a spectator only, he has viewed the surging show from the sidelines, snapped a veritable multitude of close-ups, noted departures from correct industrial behavior, and set down an adventurous story subdued to a scholar's prose. If competition is headed West, it is because industrial activities have failed to abide by the rules which the books have set down for them.

It is evident enough—from within these pages and without—that competition is not what it once was. The trim lines of the affair of old had no place for basing points, phantom freight, the patent pool, a price resting upon a handful of "as if's." Its marching argument was not stayed by overhead cost, the open-price file, the tempo of technology, the chameleon antics of the corporation, the lawful evasion of the law. Its balanced order was not disturbed by the "institute" of sugar or steel, the agreement among gentlemen, the Christian respect for the other fellow's market, the great fellowship in commercial faith. In the grand series of close-ups which Arthur Burns has taken, it doesn't resemble its likeness in the picture-books. But is competition actually in eclipse? Or is it coming as well as going? Or is it assuming strange forms? Or is the familiar likeness, after all, only a spurious portrait?

Competition never did look quite like its picture. The authentic portrait is a glorified abstraction of the ways of petty trade. There are, apart from Euclid, many geometries; and there can be as many competitions as variations can be rung on a set of reasonable assumptions. Among small trades the maker of men's shirts, the fashioner of house dresses, and the mendicant of waste paper ply unlike acquisitive arts. The struggle of corner grocers for neighborhood trade and the rivalry of a million small cotton planters in a world market are quite different things. It is the alchemy of method which transmutes

FACTS and FRAUDS IN WOMAN'S HYGIENE

A Modern Guide Against Outdated Claims and Dangerous Products

By RACHEL LYNN PALMER
and SARAH K. GREENBERG, M.D.

This volume, the first of its kind, is of vital importance to every American woman who purchases commodities associated with those problems peculiar to her sex—those problems "about which many women hesitate even to ask their physicians." It is the work of an expert on consumer problems and of a noted obstetrician and gynecologist, and does for widely advertised articles of women's hygiene precisely what 100,000,000 Guinea Pigs accomplished in the field of foods, drugs, and cosmetics.

"Of the greatest importance to millions of women and girls."
May Cameron in the New York Post.

A glance at the table of contents will reveal to some degree the invaluable nature of this book:

- CHAPTER
- I. The Feminine Hygiene Field
 - II. Menstruation—A Simple Explanation
 - III. Dysmenorrhea—"The Cramps"
 - IV. Drug Vendors and "Periodic Pain"
 - V. Other Menstrual Irregularities
 - VI. Adolescence
 - VII. "The Change of Life"
 - VIII. Leucorrhea, or "the Whites"
 - IX. The Unnecessary Douche
 - X. Lysol and Zonite
 - XI. The Abortion Business
 - XII. Sterility and Sterility "Cures"
 - XIII. Beauty—Can It Be Bought?
 - XIV. Contraception—Four Methods
 - XV. Contraception—The Advertisers' Way
 - XVI. Contraception—The Clinic Way distinctive usages into universal laws, and imposes upon richness of texture a geometrical design.

If competition is entrenched in small enterprise, it has not lost its peculiar domain. The internal combustion engine is as much a symbol of the times as giant power; and, if there is a wicked trend toward the big and bad, there is also a virtuous urge toward the little and the good. The Census Reports have done a fair job at keeping the small fellows alive. The NRA, when it had to choose, usually gave small enterprise preferment over efficiency. The penny razor blade is now decentralizing production into nifty little factories. Almost within a month the major oil companies, tiring of white elephants, have rid themselves of their retail outlets. The chain stores may presently feel the pulverizing blow of the Patman Act. But smallness is no insurance of goodness. Ice is a declining industry; yet its prices have little respect for the costs which make them up, and in widely scattered markets the tolls which consumers must pay are strikingly uniform.

Nor does bigness always take the primrose path toward monopoly. A set of arrangements which no one could have foreseen has allowed different prices to be charged for identical quarts of milk, yet distributors heroically battle for customers. The automobile is produced by colossal concerns; yet the result of a calculation from an elaborate formula is scrapped overnight to better a competitor's price. The oil "octopus" of kerosene was a pigmy compared with the gasoline giants who currently struggle for gallonage. Among them price-change is too dangerous a mechanism to use in an adjustment of demand and supply—as the independents can well testify. A public authority, in a drastic reduction of passenger fares, has just imposed upon the railroads a belated recognition of their competition with motor carriers. Any monogamous student, who is true to his industry, will loudly assert that his lady love is distinctive above all others—and confidentially admit that she is a little queer.

Although his eye is for his own selection, Arthur Burns's book is filled with stuff as real as this. The bother is that it is all seen through a slightly darkened glass of scholarship. Concept and problem are too neatly chiseled for the turbulent world to which they belong. A trade practice—open price filing, patent monopoly, quality competition—is too easily detached from the scheme of arrangements which give individuality to an industry, and is sent across a dozen frontiers to reappear as an abstraction. Our state of ignorance commands that we take time to distinguish industries before we indulge the luxury of integration; yet his urge to generalization, more manifest in line of argument than in conclusion, is not always held in leash. The childish pedantry of monopoly, duopoly, oliopoly does not obtrude; but the author is disposed to set down prevailing practices as way-stations on the broad highway that stretches from "perfect" competition to monopoly. Another person might have suited his manner to the very life of his subject; it is Arthur Burns's method, not his material, which has imposed upon the best book we have yet had on the changing ways of business an unproved thesis.

The ruthless course of events hurries the industrial system toward an unknown future. It is not spinning down the grooves of change; the detail which makes it up is forever being transformed. To assess prevailing arrangements as cases of perfect competition tainted with collusion or streaked with monopoly is to miss their character. Competition is not "perfect"—and prone like theological man to go astray. As receptacles for facts competition and monopoly invite a miscellany of meaning. The organization of an industry is a cluster of usages; its changing elements may be put together in innumerable patterns. Its arrangements may invite concentration or diffusion of power—or even put larger questions of control out of human reach; it may distribute discretion over different matters in quite different ways. But an antithesis of competition and monopoly is too simple a formula with which to capture the colorful and dramatic realities of industrial change.

Erring industry has strayed far—as appraised by a perfect competition which reflects the usages of petty trade. But is competition in decline? Who knows? Or is there any such question?

Star Vehicle

THE OLD MAN'S COMING. By Gösta Gustaf-Janson. Translated from the Swedish by Claude Napier. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THE impresarios of the late nineteenth century were fond of building their plays as star-vehicles for a personality, planting the opening scenes with rumors of his virtues and vices and, after an appropriate lapse of time, ushering him on the boards with a declamation. Something of the same formula occurs in "The Old Man's Coming," but Gösta Gustaf-Janson has made the fatal error of employing a theatrical device without accepting the restraints upon which it depends for its effectiveness. The novel concerns the mysterious return of the master of a great house after twenty years of absence, and as such is ideally contrived for treatment in the flamboyant genre. The author has been more than a little successful in piecing together the character of his absent protagonist from scraps of information dropped at intervals over the family dinner table, in the servants' quarters, and from the mouths of children. When suspense has been kindled to boiling point, however—which is not particularly far up the thermometric scale—the reader is left to pocket his curiosity while skeins of intrigue are tangled and untangled and suspense gives way to a garden variety of irritation. Not until the concluding eighty pages of this 494-page volume does Charles-Henri de Grévy, "the master of Holinge, the grisly, legendary figure of Kvidanso parish," make his grand entry; and though he appears at the height of a squall, in a volley of snapping tree-trunks and flying tiles, his "coming" does not exact a tithe of its due in goose-flesh.

From certain allusions to communism, fascism, and the All Swedish Nationalist-Socialist Fighting Party (Nazi offshoot in Sweden) it is possible to read between the lines of this novel an abortive allegory of human idealism pitted against individual covetousness and falsity. Certainly it is symbolic that young Bengt paints out a rain spot on his ceiling because it suggests the contours of a Jewish profile, only to discover that at each fresh downpour the spot assumes the same shape and is plainly visible through the paint. That the Old Man himself is, in part at least, saddled to a symbol of selfless world-brotherhood becomes painfully apparent during the closing chapters, at which time he rises to deliver a series of sermons on this general theme and, in spite of earlier generosity to his assembled friends and relatives, is betrayed by them all.

If the intention has been to project such a parable, rather than, as the present reviewer is inclined to believe, to provide the story with a frame of synthetic contemporary reference, Mr. Gustaf-Janson has twice missed his mark. Not only is he guilty of poor showmanship in the handling of a theatrical device, but somewhere among the gothic incrustations of omens, ogres, squalls, and ghouls, the trysts in barns and the confrontations in drawing-rooms, he has lost touch completely with reality.

Portrait Without an Attitude

THEODORE PARKER: YANKEE CRUSADER. By Henry Steele Commager. Little, Brown, and Company. $3.

HENRY STEELE COMMAGER'S fascinating "Theodore Parker: Yankee Crusader" has the virtues and defects of the Gamaliel Bradford school of historical portraiture: it leaves one with a strong impression of the kinetic energy of a remarkable man (which is to say that it succeeds as art), yet it never comes to grips with the uses to which the energy is put (and so it fails as criticism.) Since it avoids all questions of value, it might be called an example of the roarmachine theory of biography: so many degrees registered of intellectual intensity, of moral passion, of querulousness, of Yankee colloquialism, of sarcasm and occasional amiability, but no place on the scale for a judgment on Parker's worth and effectiveness, on the non-conformist New England conscience, on the duties of a Boston Golden Day scholar faced with the relative claims of original research and contemporary demands for popularization, on the method of the Abolitionists, on the institution of slavery itself. The result is a picture in which lineament and limb stand vivid, but connect with no very meaningful historical background, no foreground sloping to the present.

If it is Parker himself that you want, he is here, as Lexington farmer boy, as divinity student, as transcendentalist echo of German idealistic philosophy, as leader of a schism within the schism of Unitarianism, as friend of Fourierists, Brook Farmers, Swedenborgians and Temperance lecturers, as a Universal Reformer in his own right, and, finally, as the great Abolitionist preacher who took the gospel of William Lloyd Garrison into the pulpits and on to the lyceum stages of a hundred towns throughout New England, the Middle Atlantic states, and the Middle West. Mr. Commager has done all that he has set out to do, and done it superlatively well. Parker advising Herndon (and so reaching Lincoln); Parker pronouncing the awful judgment on Daniel Webster for succumbing to State Street and working for the compromise of the Fugitive Slave law; Parker making his own bookshelves; Parker collecting toy bears for his wife; Parker dying in Italy, exhausted at forty-nine, calling piteously for a last year's apple; Parker, the scholar and linguist who never had time to do the learned work which he should have done; Parker, whom women mothered and men abused—all of the attributes and facets of the great preacher and popularizer of the Forties and the Fifties are in Mr. Commager's rippling pages. And Mr. Commager's summary in a final chapter of Parker's personal qualities and quirks is a little masterpiece of distillation.

Yet the net effect is one of disappointment. It is supposedly a good rule never to criticize an author for not doing something which he has deliberately excluded from his plan, yet Mr. Commager's profession of temporary agnosticism in the face of the social forces that moved Parker is unconvincing. Most people go to biography for two things: subject and attitude. And when an author deliberately tries to exclude his attitude one has a right to feel let down and to suspect ulterior motives. If Mr. Commager had passed judgment one way or another on the Abolitionists; if he had speculated on the validity of the doctrine of the Higher Law or the Inner Light, if he had explained precisely wherein Parker traduced Daniel Webster—if, in brief, he had taken a position, he would have been compelled willy nilly to give his book the perspective it now lacks. There is more perspective in the sixteen pages devoted to the anti-Slavery writers in Van Wyck Brooks's forthcoming "The Flowering of New England" than in Mr. Commager's whole book. The reason is that Mr. Brooks is not afraid to think through to a point of view.

The question facing Mr. Commager is this: If the Abolitionists and the Fire-eaters of the North in the 1850's had not pressed the issue and so increased the blood-pressure of the Southern Fire-eaters, would slavery have been eradicated eventually without war, without the hatred of the Reconstruction and the Bloody Shirt? Many liberal Southerners are fond of saying that Slavery was doomed because it was uneconomic, and that it would have eventually withered away. They therefore regard the Fire-eaters as meddlers who caused a useless conflict. Yet since the Civil War was not fought over the peculiar institution itself, but came as a by-product of two colliding imperialisms, neither of which could be headed, I think the Fire-eaters, Parker included, were the ones who knew in their bones what the future was to bring forth. The South had to grasp for new slave territory, the North had to reach for new free markets at the western railheads. Civilizations don't draw back from their objectives of their own accord. And Parker and Garrison, Herndon and Lincoln, were the agents of the advance of the Northern free-labor civilization.

If Mr. Commager had tried to answer the major question posed by the life of Parker, his book would have had more meaning for the present. For between the situation that faced the generation of Garrison and Wendell Phillips and the situation that faces the generation of John L. Lewis, there is a rough analogy. Now, as before, two imperialisms, running on irresistible momentum, face collision. There is much to be learned from the life of Parker that has contemporary application. One wishes that Mr. Commager had drawn the parallels; one wishes that he had more curiosity about the approximate laws of history. His book is first-rate Gamaliel Bradford stuff; but Gamaliel Bradford was a lesser New Englander, not of the breed of the Parkers and the Emersons, who always sought the generality underlying the particular.

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

Time and Mind

THE PURITAN PRONOS. STUDIES IN THE INTELLECTUAL LIFE OF NEW ENGLAND IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By Samuel Eliot Morison. New York: University Press. $3.75.

THE ENCHANTED GLASS. THE ELIZABETHAN MIND IN LITERATURE. By Hardin Craig. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

MR. MORISON and Mr. Craig have undertaken an all but impossible task. The definition of another age in terms of its thought—in terms, say, of the Elizabethan or the Puritan "mind"—is especially difficult if one assumes that the human mind was a different thing then from what it is now. Neither Mr. Morison nor Mr. Craig makes this assumption crudely, yet it must have stood behind the necessity each one of them felt to explain his favorite generation. And it still stands behind a certain strangeness which those generations take on in two books designed instead to make them look and sound familiar.

It is almost true that the more a given time is explained the remoter it grows; whereas the contrary assumption that there is nothing to explain keeps it comfortably close to the point where our imaginations can work at it naturally. This is no less true of our own time, which I have seen made absolutely unrecognizable in books whose charitable purpose was to give us a sense of being at home in the universe of Marx, Einstein, and Freud. The great question, of course, is whether there is such a thing as the mind of a time. There are always a few good minds which express themselves well, but that can't be it. Then there are thousands of minds which pick up what the others drop; and there are the millions of valuable persons who in the formal sense have no minds at all. It can't be either of those things, either. If it is anything at all it probably is the sum total of beliefs which are so axiomatic to everybody that they are never spoken. But if they are never spoken we have little to go by.

Each of the present authors has had a great deal to go by. Mr. Morison's Puritans, for instance, were devout believers in the word, and made sacrifices soon after their arrival in New England so that they might possess a college, a school system, and a press. They wrote and read a remarkable number of books—many of them sermons, but not as many as we have been in the habit of supposing. They knew the Greek and Roman classics; they kept up with contemporary literature in England, even to the point of allowing the importation of poems by the Earl of Rochester which cannot get through the United States customs today; and Mr. Morison has had the happy thought to peep into the commonplace books of old Harvard students—and find, of all things, pagan love poetry. A larger proportion of New England's population went to college in 1650 than goes now, and for one-fifteenth the cost; and it was not the sole purpose of this Cambridge across the seas to prepare its sons for the ministry. Its purpose was first of all to train young men for a life the intellectual part of which was assumed by every person of authority to be of paramount importance. New England, unlike any other American colony of the century, was an intellectual enterprise, for reasons which Mr. Morison is not the first to state but which he sets forth with more than ordinary lucidity. Partly because his endeavor is to show that seventeenth-century New England is more knowable than we thought, and partly because his method is wherever possible objective—the counting of noses, the naming of documents, and the listing of books in libraries—he comes as near success in his task as any man perhaps may come. Nor is he without caution in his use of the statistical method. In his section on the school system he admits that he does not know how many children were taught to read, and that the number indeed cannot be known. James Truslow Adams once argued for a high illiteracy rate on the basis of a town, Natick, everyone of whose seventy inhabitants was an Indian.

Mr. Craig assures us that it is possible for one to "become an Elizabethan scholar, know one's way about in the age, and in one's feelings and opinions become a reasonably good subject of Queen Elizabeth." In order to help us do this he quotes liberally from Elizabethan treatises on psychology and morality—treatises which Shakespeare for one may have read but which he was too good an artist, Mr. Craig admits, to use in such a way as to let us know whether he had read them. The presence of Shakespeare, indeed, is constantly embarrassing to Mr. Craig, whose explanations of the age would be more useful if they were not rendered virtually unnecessary by the accident of its having produced the most articulate and delightful author of all time. Their usefulness is more obvious in connection with such pedants as Chapman and Jonson; which brings us back to the question whether one man or another is the more representative of his age, and indeed whether any age ever succeeds in representing itself. The circumstance of Shakespeare's supreme intelligibility leads me at least to wonder whether his age was not for all practical and literary purposes the equivalent of ours. Mr. Craig somewhere belabors such talk as "mystical." But he scarcely escapes the charge of having made the generation of his choice a mystery which he alone, together with a handful of other scholars, may ever penetrate.

Linguistic Patriotism

THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE. Fourth edition corrected, enlarged, and rewritten. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

"THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE" would be too well known to require description at this date if the fourth edition were not, as its author declares, in the main a new work. Here and there a short passage, surviving even from the first edition in 1919, stands like a familiar landmark amid the new text, but the book as a whole has been reconsidered and rewritten studiously. The process in general has necessarily been one of correction and still more of addition and amplification, but where he could Mr. Mencken has also excised and abbreviated. Even so the volume extends to almost 700 pages, with not a flabby or inane one among them—God's plenty about the language of the United States.

Abundance and variety of material, clearly organized and displayed with unflagging zest, is the chief characteristic of the book. It is not, of course, a complete or original treatise on any aspect of the subject, but as a general handbook it occupies the field and will probably continue to do so. The verbal index lists upward of 10,000 words and phrases, to which the subject index adds almost 3,000 entries. The footnotes, a model of conscientious documentation, follow the text step by step.

step and are not the least useful part of the work. In getting together all this material Mr. Mencken enlisted a motley army, including a fair-sized foreign legion of helpers, some of them pressed into service, but many of them volunteers, and all enthusiastic about the cause. No such band of collaborators could have been found when he began his inquiry. Their existence now testifies to the wide influence that his book has exercised.

Among its virtues is that, besides purveying instruction and amusement, it occasionally excites dissent. Mr. Mencken has always been inclined to see the differences between British and American idiom as more sharply delimited and fundamental in character than professional linguists allow. At times he slips into a kind of Yankee purism, and one wishes that Richard Grant White were alive and in his prime to talk back at him. In the earlier editions of his book he scandalized many good men by maintaining that American English was deviating so rapidly from British English that it would in time become almost another language. Now he holds that "the pull of American has become so powerful that it has begun to drag English with it" and that English, "on some not too remote tomorrow," will be "a kind of dialect of American." For the purpose of warming up certain writing Englishmen that ought to do very well, but it will not go down as sober science. Mr. Mencken underestimates the power of British English to assimilate alien materials without affecting its basic Anglicity. In the past it has borrowed wholesale from several languages; it is now importing a good many Americanisms, to its enrichment but not to its transformation. The prosaic likelihood is that the two great dialects will continue to develop along parallel lines, never getting beyond hailing distance and never coinciding. But such ebullient linguistic patriotism is part of the fun. It is a grand book—learned, witty, endlessly entertaining and provocative.

GEORGE GENZMER

FILMS

Marc Connelly, Moving-man

WARNER BROTHERS will be hurt to learn that in "The Green Pastures" (Music Hall) they have not produced a spectacle. The press releases attest to the "120 gigantic settings," "1,000 players," and "lavish scenes" which the studio placed at the disposal of Marc Connelly, but in making his first movie, a literal transcription of his play, Mr. Connelly has achieved the paradox of a non-"colossal" production under the aegis of the Brothers. When one remembers what Max Reinhardt did in and around the Athenian woods and imagines what a DeMille might have done in heaven, one realizes that "The Green Pastures" is (definitely, Mr. Warner) not a spectacle.

Mr. Connelly's preservation of his play is right, not because it avoids the abuses which the movie spectacle has received at the hands of vulgarians, but because no translation other than a literal one was possible. When he originally dramatized the naive or (his own term) "primitive" Negro conception of divine revelation, Mr. Connelly assumed—which was a good assumption for a playwright to make—that the quality of the naivete was (my own term) "staginess." This quality is created in the film by such furniture as wooden clouds and miniature-model landscapes—props which are inescapable in the theatre but unnatural in the cinema, for they deny the camera its property of moving in plein air. But to have indulged in a Miltonian style, to have moved through heaven and earth with the camera-eye, would have been to abandon the stagey quality and the original conception, and Mr. Connelly would have destroyed "The Green Pastures." By transferring his play intact to the screen he has done what he had to do. He has not even been able to serve the function of translator; he has merely acted as moving-man while "The Green Pastures" changed its address from stage to screen, making sure that all the furniture was moved from the first location to the second.

The resultant world created on the screen differs in no respect from that on the stage. It is a world proper to the highly localized subject-matter, with all the paraphernalia suggested by the environment of Mr. Connelly's "primitive Negro"; the fact that this environment is tinged, presumably, more by the theater than the movies, enables Mr. Connelly to avoid the offenses of the superspecial production. Yet the fact that it is not a "spectacle" is not, as it may have seemed when I stated it, a virtue. Whatever the shortcomings of the spectacle school, its representatives at least made motion pictures. Mr. Connelly offends by creating a world improper to the screen. Heaven is a picnic-grounds, but a picnic-grounds built in a studio interior; Cap'n Noah's ark is much too small for the animals we see filing into it; the journey to the Promised Land is like a walk across the studio in comparison to the vast horizons and Red Sea of Mr. DeMille's "Ten Commandments."

There is no moment in the film which was not in the play. I was positive at first that the incident of the daisies was a cinematic inspiration. It occurs when The Lord is walking the earth as a "natchel" man, sorely disappointed in the sinful Cain VI and Zeba, and inquires of a bed of daisies how they are getting on. "We O. K., Lord," they pipe back. The perfection of the moment was so cinematic that I was amazed on consulting the text of the play to find the incident therein.

Although he has done what he had to do, Mr. Connelly cannot expect the person who demands the authentic pleasure of a movie to like "The Green Pastures" on the screen. The "fable" has qualities of humor, action, emotion, speech which such a person and the vast public are certain to enjoy in any narrative medium—book, play, movie, or otherwise. From a viewpoint irrelevant to criticism it is even important that these qualities reach the wide audience which the most successful play has never reached. But in the end nothing is more important than that a film, not something else, appear on the screen.

CANDIDATE FOR THE HONOR ROLL

Dears Sirs: The June 24 session of the Democratic National Convention was opened with an invocation by a Negro minister, the Reverend L. Marshall Shepard of Philadelphia, whereupon Senator Ellison D. Smith, delegate-at-large from South Carolina, walked out, saying, "I'm through. I'm sick and tired of the whole thing. I'll go home and do some talking." On which the Richmond (Virginia) Times Dispatch commented as follows:

Senator Smith has the antebellum attitude which holds that the Negro must always remain a helot, exercising few civil rights, taking no part in the affairs of his government, content to leave all such matters to the white race. The Senator is not aware, apparently, that times have changed in the last three-quarters of a century, that the Negro is a citizen, entitled to the rights of a citizen. If the Negro is able, in the face of the manifold handicaps which beset him, to improve his business, educational, economic, and political status, we say more power to him. We are not quaking at the thought of Negro delegates at Philadelphia, and neither should we feel that Southern civilization has been endangered if a colored pastor asked the Almighty to forgive us our sins, which probably are far too numerous anyway.

I believe you should find out the name of the writer responsible for these civilized lines and consider him for The Nation Honor Roll of 1936.

"HOMEKEEPING HEARTS"

Dear Sirs: I have been reading The Nation for a number of years and swearing by it, but your sarcastic remarks in the June 24 issue about Homekeeping Hearts made me tear my hair:

You say the conference of the Associated Countrywomen of the World was "made up pretty exclusively of middle-class and upper-class countrywomen." Thank you! I was able to attend because I live just outside Washington, and I drove my 1928 Ford, full of real farm women, in order that we might hear of the problems and achievements of rural women all over the world.

The American women who attended were largely from home-demonstration clubs. Do you not know that home-demonstration clubs are made up of women who have had no opportunity to escape from the drudgery of farm work in kitchen and field? Farm women from three states in the South chartered a train (day coaches, no Pullmans), and when other women heard of it, there were a hundred more who wanted to get on that train. No other coach could be secured so these hundred rode and slept in the aisles and vestibules. Probably these belonged to the landed gentry of the U. S. A. As to the Canadian and overseas delegates, there were ladies and baronesses, but the ones I came in contact with were the same kind of women as ourselves. One Australian woman was able to come because she had won a prize of several hundred dollars.

Why dwell on the reports of Herr Hitler's delegates when those of other countries were so encouraging? The English women's institutes, which are similar to our home-demonstration clubs, teach the women crafts. The miners' wives and countrywomen are helped to market their products. The demonstrators who help the women are volunteers from the "gentry," and they receive no compensation and are not helped by the government as we are. In a sparsely settled district one woman teaches twenty-seven crafts. In our own Southern Highlands women were making quilts for two cents an hour which were sold by exploiters for $100 a quilt. These women are being helped to market their own products.

If The Nation fails to see that any international group of women of whatever class is a movement toward world peace, I feel inclined to transfer my allegiance to Mr. Hearst.

Dear Sirs: The enrolment of the Book Union's three-thousandth member marks the permanent establishment in the field of revolutionary literature of a left-wing book club. Ever since the Hemingway school of realism for its own sake was succeeded by such writers as Dos Passos, Caldwell, and Farrell, who held up the mirror with a purpose, a new reading public has been addressed. But whether because of the prohibitive price of books, the narrow choices of small-town libraries, the yellow journalists, or the high-brow cultural organizations, the fact remains that this new public has not been reached. Long after books in America have ceased to be dedicated exclusively to the upper middle class, they are still owned almost exclusively by them.

To combat this situation and act as intermediary between the public at large and the rapidly increasing number of authors writing on the social, economic, and political problems which concern it, the Book Union was founded. Membership in the Book Union was made possible at $1 a year, unions and other labor organizations being permitted to join as members. In addition to a regular list, one outstanding book such as "John Reed" is offered each month at a very low price.

Since it was founded in October the Book Union has acted as sponsor to a short but important list of novels, biographies, and books on the U. S. S. R. It was perhaps more than a coincidence that the first selection of the Book Union was "Proletarian Literature in the United States."

"FROM GENESIS TO FREUD"

Dear Sirs: As an old reader of The Nation, I have on various occasions defended your journal against the accusation that its opinions are not sufficiently based on facts. After reading your recent editorial, From Genesis to Freud, it will be harder for me to do so.

In this article you accuse me of wandering "into the boggy fields of opinion, conjecture, and sheer fantasy," but you seem to have taken little trouble to find out what I actually said in my paper before the American Medical Association. I did not attack painless childbirth or the use of analgesics as such; nor did I credit sensational journalists with the invention of labor pains. Furthermore, as you might have suspected from your consultation with a psychoanalyst, I did in no way make the statement upon which your reference to Freud is based. Psychoanalysis was referred to in my paper only in connection with birth trauma of the child.

I agree perfectly with the statement made by your psychoanalyst that, since civilized life "has interfered with the automatic nature of the childbearing process, the least civilization can do for the women in childbirth is to find means to alleviate the agony for which it is largely responsible." I am not unmindful of the progress made in this direction by the use of analgesics, but insist that efforts should also be made to counteract the detrimental influences of civilization by proper prenatal education and suitable obstetrical management. Much can actually be accomplished in this way; and it seems reasonable to hope that, as the process by which childbirth has been distorted becomes better understood, an increasing number of women may be enabled to experience easy, natural childbirth without excessive use of drugs.

GERTRUDE NIELSON, M.D.

Oklahoma City, June 13

[Our source of information for the editorial to which Dr. Nielson takes exception was a special report to the New York Times of May 15 by William L. Lawrence. We are informed by the Times that to date no one has questioned the accuracy of this report.—Editors The Nation.]

PAROLE AND CRIME

Dear Sirs: A recent editorial in The Nation deplored the "mass hysteria" shown by the New York daily press in its comments on the Titterton murder. Interpretation of the sad affair as indicating a "failure of the parole system" was branded as dangerous thinking. Unfortunately, the logic of the editorial itself does not seem sufficiently inviolate to justify such an attitude.

Parole and suspended sentencing were instituted to provide the convict with a special incentive to good behavior, which he would not have if he were to be freed only after paying his debt to the community in full. Consequently the system is an instrumentality of justice which must be judged not on theoretical merits but on results. If The Nation can prove that there are substantially fewer recidivists among paroled prisoners than among convicts released after serving their terms—without any allowance for difficult social conditions, which hit both groups equally—it will supply the only possible proof of the system's value. And even then a community will never entirely lose sight of the undeniable fact that each specific crime perpetrated by a convict on parole would have been prevented if he had been safely locked up at the time—while no one can prove as clearly that a regularly released second offender would have been a better person if paroled before his time was up. There is no need to prove that Fiorenza would have been a better person after serving his stretch; he would simply have paid the regular penalty for his offense, without being particularly expected to behave himself afterward, and in any event he would not have been able to commit the murder of Mrs. Titterton. This murder, on the other hand, is incontrovertible proof that parole, in Fiorenza's case, failed to induce the convict to be good. This reasoning cannot be refuted as "inhuman" because parole was never meant to be a feat of humanity—such as prison reform—but a means to a social end.

There is no doubt that, as The Nation suggests, there are ways to improve that means. Under ideal parole conditions, even more than now, every crime committed by a paroled prisoner would constitute a clear case of failure of the system to do what it was supposed to. And since it was devised not to alleviate punishment but better to protect society from crime, every such failure is of greater interest to the imperiled public than a good many successes. What aroused the ire of the press in the Titterton instance has become an almost typical pattern—the sequence of minor offense, conviction, parole, major offense, conviction, parole, capital offense. Every case of that pattern will be taken as evidence of a failure of the entire system as practiced. The thinking such a conclusion is based upon may, in the wrong hands, be dangerous—but it certainly isn't loose.

CORRECTION

In an article entitled Who's Behind the Black Legion by Paul W. Ward in the June 10, 1936, issue of The Nation, it was erroneously stated that Duncan C. McCrea, prosecuting attorney of the County of Wayne, Michigan, was "confessedly" a member of the Black Legion. This statement was based upon press dispatches. In justice to Mr. McCrea The Nation wishes to state that it is informed that Mr. McCrea was not a member of the Black Legion at any time and that he had never been active, directly or indirectly, in the said organization. The Nation regrets that the statements in Mr. Ward's article with reference to Mr. McCrea were open to misconstruction.—Editors The Nation.

THE LESSONS OF THE SPANISH REVOLT ARE discussed in an editorial elsewhere in this issue. There is one sidelight that is worth special attention. That is the way in which the fascist rebellion against the democratic government of a friendly nation has been treated by the press. Ever since the February elections the Havas News Agency has been feeding the French papers with exaggerated tales about Spanish atrocities in order to frighten the middle-class vote away from the French popular front. The Hearst press took up the campaign in America and streamer headlines gave daily reports about the horrible acts of sacrilege perpetrated by the "Marxists." It takes no brilliant guessing to trace the connection between such reports and the Hearst attacks on the "socialist" and "godless" Mr. Roosevelt. Even the New York Times printed a front-page story on June 17 about thirty-six churches which were burned within forty-eight hours when actually not a single such incident took place in the whole of Spain during these two days. The reporting of the rebellion itself by the American press was so extreme that if it were not dealing with such tragic material it would be funny. Every morning the Madrid government fell afresh in the pages of the New York American. Most of H. R. Knickerbocker's reports which were featured by our yellow press came from the rebel headquarters while the official government dispatches from Madrid were buried on the inside pages and treated as dubious rumors. As soon as a garrison of soldiers declared itself in a state of rebellion, even our respectable newspapers and press associations announced whole provinces as having gone over to the rebels. We have rarely seen a more revealing example of wishful thinking.

AT ONE TIME THE STEP-CHILD OF ALL BUT THE most earnest political reformers, the civil service is now finding favor even in the eyes of the patronage boys. So sharp has been recent criticism of the spoils system, that it is doubtful if even the Postmaster General objected to President Roosevelt's recent executive order placing first-, second-, and third-class postmasters under competitive examination. This adds more than 13,000 to the civil-service rolls and removes that many jobs from the paternal partisan hand of Mr. Farley. The Republican National Committee has triumphantly announced, as a result of the President's action, that it was really Governor Landon's promise to remove the Post Office Department from politics which did the trick. Mr. Roosevelt may have been influenced by a Republican promise; he is even more likely to have been influenced by wide-spread and out-spoken criticism of patronage under the New Deal—some of it evidently deserved. But it is interesting to note that when postmasters were last placed under the civil service, it was by an executive order of Woodrow Wilson (Dem.) and when that order was rescinded it was by order of Warren Harding (Rep.). Moreover Mr. Roosevelt put strong Administration support behind a bill in the last session of Congress which would have provided by statute for competitive examination for these positions, thereby rendering executive orders unnecessary. The bill failed of passage by seven votes. The Democratic members of Congress voted for it three to one; a majority of the Republicans were opposed to it. Anyway, everybody loves the civil service now.

THE DEMOCRATS WHO TOOK A WALK WILL reach Detroit by August 7. There they will confer long enough to hearten each other and sing "Gott Strafe Roosevelt." Thus far the group boasts only the names of Ely, Colby, and Reed, but there are hopes of getting the ghost of Al Smith to walk once more. These Democrats will do their walking on a single plank, that of "constitutional government." Unfortunately there is one provision in the Constitution which will frustrate them. It deals with the electoral college.

NOT EVEN BAEDEKER IS SAFE FROM NAZI culture. A new edition of the famous guide book has been issued for Olympic visitors, with the tomb of Horst Wessel indicated as one of the important things to see and with the usual glorification of Adolf Hitler and the Nazi ideals. Our correspondent, Mr. Gittler, describes elsewhere in this issue the preparations for the games which are revivifying the buildings of Berlin, not to mention the manners of its inhabitants. Mr. Gittler left before National Laughter Week was proclaimed, during which Berliners were recommended to get their faces and their spirits in good smiling condition to greet the foreign visitors. In Hamburg the same sort of preparations accompanied the World Congress for Leisure and Recreation. Der Führer was proclaimed the savior of mankind; Strength Through Joy has been established as the national watchword; and the ideal of "better understanding and mutual respect among peoples" has been fully realized in Germany. (Jewish papers please copy.) It is interesting to note that although the American National Recreation Congress refused to send delegates to the meeting, a group of Americans went as individuals and took part in the festivities as heartily as Propaganda Minister Goebbels himself. Among them was Gustavus Kirby, treasurer of the American Olympics Committee. And when the American Olympic team landed, Avery Brundage, president of the committee, responded to the German greetings by saying: "Berlin has grasped the Olympic ideal as no other city since the days of ancient Greece." With the American officials, the campaign for Gemütlichkeit has evidently been a success.

IF DEAN RUSSELL OF TEACHERS COLLEGE spoke for Columbia University when he criticized the unionization of teachers before 600 of them at a summer-session conference the other day, we should very much like to know it. In effect he intimated that it would be quite too bad if teachers abandoned their position as a privileged "professional" class and stepped down into the ranks of organized labor. It might even destroy "democratic" control of education and place it in the hands of the "minority of people that belong to organized labor." This, he said, "would have interesting financial implications," for "a college or a private foundation has slender funds." The implications are clear enough—one of them being that the rich folk who subsidize so many of our educational institutions might withdraw their support if their "democratic" control by way of the purse-strings were challenged by organized teachers demanding better pay. The New York Teachers' Union has answered Dean Russell in a statement signed by its president, Charles J. Hendley, which boldly aligns the teachers where they belong and are—with the workers. The school teachers, says Mr. Hendley, "are on the average in a lower economic status than the industrial workers. . . . In the big school systems and in the big colleges they are regimented very much as factory workers are," punching time-clocks, arbitrarily hired and fired, subjected to summary cuts in salary and to the stretch-out system. What is needed for genuine democracy may be further unionization of the sort that Dean Russell fears so much.

THE PRESENTATION OF TRIPLETS TO A Russian gypsy tinsmith by a wife who had already borne him four children seems to fall in the category labelled by our esteemed contemporary, the New Yorker, "neatest trick of the week." For the triple birth enabled the grateful father to claim and receive the first of the cash awards for large families allowed by the White Russian Republic under the Soviet government's new law designed to promote an increase in the Russian population. Another section of the same law, as Louis Fischer pointed out in his recent articles in The Nation, was designed to prevent divorce by the simple means of making it prohibitive. It is working as effectively as Mr. Fischer predicted. According to a recent dispatch, divorces have fallen off 90 per cent in the twenty days since the law was imposed. This means, of course, as Mr. Fischer also explained, that divorce in Russia has become a privilege reserved for the higher-paid categories of Soviet workers. Which is only another way of saying that it is class-legislation. At any rate that is what such discrimination against those in the lower-income brackets is called when it is practiced by bourgeois governments.

IN NEW JERSEY WHERE THEY REALLY KNOW how to cope with the relief problem, a three-year-old child died of malnutrition the other day. The family had been subsisting on $5 every two weeks for five persons, and the little boy had taken to eating the paint off his crib. Accordingly, although the case was recorded on the police blotter as malnutrition, St. Mary's Hospital in Hoboken listed the cause of death as lead poisoning. Meanwhile in Pennsylvania the political battle between a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature continues to block the issuance of relief allowances. After a long struggle over the size of the relief appropriation for the next six months, during which the legislature whittled $10,000,000 off Governor Earle's requested $55,000,000, the appropriation bill was finally passed. Relief stopped while the debate was going on; relief marchers laid siege to the capitol and threatened to remain until action was taken. But even the compromise produced only a temporary respite. On July 23 the Senate adjourned for a week, unable to reach an agreement with the House over the means of obtaining the necessary revenue. Bills to raise from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 have been passed. The remainder was to have been obtained from increased liquor taxes, but the state liquor administration insists that all such taxes are already earmarked to meet tax-anticipation notes issued in 1935. While the deadlock holds, the unemployed continue to go hungry. Doubtless some irresponsible children will take to eating paint in Pennsylvania also. But as the chambers of commerce of every New Jersey city so aptly put it in reply to a question from the New York Board of Trade: "New Jersey had the courage to meet the relief problem in a sensible manner. . . . It broke the relief trust. . . . There is no starvation in New Jersey."

CHINA'S THREATENED CIVIL WAR, BROUGHT so near the bursting point, has fizzled out. Ostensibly anti-Japanese, the Cantonese uprising was really aimed not against Tokyo but against Nanking, for Canton has nursed a smoldering resentment against the central government ever since its establishment after the civil war of 1926-27. There seems little doubt now that the Japanese played upon this feeling and fostered the rebellion with loans, sales of munitions, and military advice. They did it because they wanted to hurry the disunity of China, to draw the focus of attention away from their own activities in the north, and finally to provide a pretext for stepping in and taking Fukien, the Manchuria of the south, which is already the field of Japanese political and economic penetration. It made little difference to Tokyo that the movement was proclaimed (and doubtless believed by many of its participants) to be against Japan. The risk that Chiang might join Canton against them they knew was negligible, but the chance that he might be forced into civil war against Canton was good, and one by which they stood to gain. As it happened they gambled and lost because Chiang did neither. The most slippery ruler of any country in the world today, he managed to avoid fighting either for or against, but brought about the collapse of the whole movement by judicious negotiation. Chiang's victory is for the moment a setback for Japan, but China may find it a boomerang. For Japan is in a hurry. She must strike while Europe is preoccupied. Thus the strengthening of China, brought about by the apparent unification of Canton with Nanking, may precipitate aggressive action from Japan.

IN NORTHERN EUROPE LABOR PARTIES ARE making gains. In the general elections in Finland on July 1 and 2, the Socialist Party won 5 more seats, giving it a total of 83 out of 200. In Sweden the Riksdag will be re-elected in the middle of September. The Socialist Party, which has a paying membership of more than 340,000 out of a population of 6,200,000, lately resigned in favor of an agrarian Cabinet, but the coming elections are expected to restore it to office. At the elections of 1932, the party polled 1,040,689 out of 2,500,769 votes cast. The partial elections to the First Chamber, held in September, 1935, gave labor 102 seats out of 230 in the Lower House, and 65 out of 150 seats in the Upper House. Not less impressive is the progress of the Norwegian Labor Party, which puts the total of its paying membership at 122,000 in a population of 2,850,000. While the party now holds 69 seats out of 150, it hopes—as does the Swedish Socialist Party—to obtain a majority at the next general election, to be held in October. Denmark will hold a partial election to the Landsting in mid-September. Last October the party polled 759,000 out of 1,646,126 votes. This strong Socialist and labor front has borne fruit in the power of the Swedish cooperatives, now being studied, along with those of other Scandinavian countries, by an American commission headed by Jacob Baker, Assistant Works Progress Administrator at Washington. Preliminary reports of the commission's investigations indicate that the powerful co-operatives are actually busting the Swedish trusts. A third of the families of Sweden are members of cooperatives; manufacturing activities now yield to the Swedish societies an income of $45,000,000. The American cooperative movement, which is growing so fast, may well learn from Scandinavia the lesson of where its economic and political strength lies.

ONE OF THE FUNNY THINGS IS THAT WHEN there is a great deal of unemployment everybody begins to talk about how you can never get anyone to do any work. Miss Gertrude Stein is talking about unemployment in the Saturday Evening Post. She is talking about unemployment and how when you are having unemployment everybody who is out of work is becoming part of the unemployed. And when you are part of the unemployed you are part of that, and even the Indo-Chinese in Miss Stein's home town which is Paris won't work because they can get ten francs a day as unemployed. Miss Stein is saying that "once unemployment is recognized as unemployment and organized as unemployment nobody starts to work." So we are in unemployment living. We are in unemployment living we are now being having and gosh are we hungry! Maybe if we didn't recognize unemployment and organize unemployment people would just starve as they are or work for five francs a day. Everybody, like Miss Stein, "has to think about the unemployed getting to be that and is there any way to stop them. Everybody has to think about that." And maybe somebody ought to think about what Ben Stolberg calls lunatechnics being organized as lunatechnics and not recognized as lunatechnics and is there any way to stop that.

The Spanish Workers See It Through

THROUGH the fog of conflicting reports from Spain it becomes increasingly clear that the fascist insurrection will not succeed. As we go to press, the left Republican government of Premier Giral is in control of Madrid, the administrative center, Barcelona, the largest industrial city, the cities of the metallurgical area around Bilbao, the whole of southern and central Spain. Navarre, with its Carlist peasantry, is the only district in which the rebels have received any enthusiastic popular support. Of the insurgent leaders General Goded has been captured in Catalonia, General San Jurjo has met death in an airplane crash, General Franco is outside the country, Calvo Sotelo could contribute to the fascist cause only by the dramatic incident of his assassination, and Gil Robles, who was never renowned for his courage, is following the news safely from the other side of the border. But the struggle is not over. The well-organized Moroccan army may yet leave destruction in its path, and the civil strife will probably be long drawn out, but barring military intervention on the part of foreign powers, Spanish democracy seems, for a time at least, safe.

"We are plentifully supplied with money," Colonel de Villaneuva, leader of the Pamplona insurgent column, assured a representative of the Associated Press on July 22. This serves to confirm what observers have suspected from the very start—that the rebel movement was not merely a military coup and that, as usual, money continues to furnish the sinews of fascist terrorism.

Where does the money for the Spanish fascists come from? Foremost among the contributors one must place the Jesuits whose banks line the main business street of Madrid. The Vatican has announced in its official organ, the Osservatore Romano, that it is neutral in the struggle. But reports about the activities of priests in Navarre, the most important fascist stronghold, are beginning to trickle through. When the left Republican government struck at the wealth of the clergy, deprived the teaching orders of their functions as educators of the young, and transformed convents and monasteries into public institutions, the church prepared for a counter attack. In October, 1934, during the uprising of the Asturian miners, the bishops blessed the terrifying Moors whom they sent into the northern hills to kill Spanish revolutionaries. Now the clergy are again using the army as a divine scourge to punish the masses whose pent-up rage has expressed itself in the burning of a few churches.

By the side of the bishops stand their natural allies, the great landowners, whom the agrarian reform had ousted from their hunting estates. Many of these grandees had long before the rebellion transferred all their fluid assets to foreign banks and were in a position to pay for arms. No government restrictions on the export of the peseta could impede the secret movement of their capital.

The third group are the Spanish industrialists. Spain is by no means a highly industrialized country and most of its progress in that respect has taken place since the World War. Nevertheless finance and manufacture play their role in the recent social convulsions. The industrialists have felt themselves threatened by the new tax plans of the government and by the adverse decisions of the labor board of arbitration. They had for weeks been prolonging strikes in order to produce the sense of disorder and anarchy which would cause the nation to cry out for a man on horseback. Against the rising movement of the peasants and the workers the Spanish industrialist is prepared to join hands with his former enemies in the church and nobility—and the hand he offers has money in it.

All three of these groups turned to the soldiers as their crusading representatives. In most European countries there exists an independent military force with a strong tradition of its own such as America has not yet quite developed. Men like Generals Franco and Goded have never made peace with the republic which placed them in an inferior social position, and they have never ceased to dream of the day when General Primo de Rivera was dictator by the grace of Alphonso XIII. There are many precedents in ancient history for discontented generals who, after sulking in the colonies, rebel and march on the capital to seize power. It is one of the weaknesses of the Spanish Republican government that it did not move resolutely to replace the anti-Republican officers.

These are the forces behind the threat of a fascist military dictatorship. The heroism with which that threat has been met will form a record that cannot be paralleled in the annals of the working classes of modern times. The popular front, which had shown signs of serious cleavage, held fast in a way that reveals an underlying unity among the rank and file despite the rifts in the leadership. Socialist and communist youth organizations had achieved a real unity before the revolt and were training themselves to repel just such a fascist attack as took place. At the moment of crisis the government passed out arms to the workers, and it was they who were decisive in crushing the uprisings in Madrid and Barcelona. The Spanish workers know that they are fighting for the cause of democracy everywhere, and they are determined to see it through.

It may be too early to talk of what will follow a government victory. The parallel of the Kerensky regime which was succeeded by a communist capture of power quite naturally comes to mind. But the Spanish experience has not followed the contemporary European examples in other respects and it may not in this respect either. A government which has been able to rally enough strength to check the revolt and which has been broad enough to include diverse progressive and republican elements may prove strong enough to continue in power. But the people must learn that the democratization of the army will be essential in preventing another military coup, and that safety for democracy in Spain lies increasingly in the direction of a worker's state. Meanwhile the picture of all the democratic forces of the country in arms and successfully defending themselves against the military fascism which crushed democracy in Italy, Germany, and Austria will be a dramatic example for popular fronts in days to come.

Cyclone Fence by U. S. Steel

UNITED States Steel was sponsor for an advertisement in the July 27 issue of the magazine Time which may be regarded as a follow-up of the half-million-dollar broadside of the American Iron and Steel Institute of July 1. That broadside, since it was a political statement addressed not only to the workers but to the American people, was a verbal study in indirection. It began by indicating that steel's labor force was happily dismembered and its bones scattered in company unions; it ended by saying that "the steel industry will oppose any attempt to compel its employees to join a union or pay tribute for the right to work." The advertisement in Time employs instead of words an actual photograph whose import is both chilling and clear. It depicts two company policemen, with faces as hard as the steel they have sold themselves to defend, beating up a group of workingmen armed with sticks and stones. The immediate background is the classic fence that guards a steel mill from the world outside—a close mesh of steel several feet high and topped by strands of barbed wire. Beyond may be seen the outlines of those buildings where workers are not forced to "pay tribute for the right to work" in fiery furnaces but on the contrary are allowed freely to dedicate their skill and strength to creating the profits of the richest industry on earth. Ostensibly the photograph in Time advertises United States Steel's famous cyclone fence. In reality it is a brazen threat and a forecast of what will shortly happen in Homestead, Aliquippa, Duquesne, and Weirton if "outsiders" persist in the attempt to organize the steel workers.

On another page of this issue, Benjamin Stolberg in his study of John L. Lewis and the American labor movement, points out that a "social crisis begins when it becomes increasingly obvious to decent men that all the wrong is gathering on one side and all the right on the other." There can be no doubt that a social cyclone impends. There is no doubt either that United States Steel on its side of the fence is gathering all its strength. It is armed with money and guns; Alfred (Open-Shop) Landon is its white-haired boy. By high-paid publicity it is trying to discredit unionism in the eyes of the American public. In the mill towns, with true imperial instinct, it is trying to divide the ranks of its employees by means of "concessions"; in the political field such spokesmen for big industry as the New York Herald Tribune are doing their bit to set craft-union die-hards and industrial-union progressives at one another's throats. On the other side of the fence, labor, in its struggle for that mass unity which is its sole weapon, is fighting desperately against time, against the dividing tactics of employers, and especially now against the guerrilla warfare of craft-union leaders whose activities could scarcely please the steel trust more if they were bought and paid for. It is clear to the steel magnates, if not to the craft unionists, that Lewis's industrial unionism is a living force capable of undermining their great power. Hence their "concessions"—vacations with pay and payment for overtime—which, hollow as they are, have been the direct result of the overwhelming response in the steel mills to John L. Lewis's call to arms.

The battle lines are set. The public already knows in advance in whose fortifications the weapons of violence are stored. If it can also be taught its own best interests it will mass itself solidly on the labor side of the fence.

Eyewash in Kansas

THE Landon acceptance speech will not go down in American history as one of the great utterances of statesmanship. Despite the dutiful round of applause that greeted it in the editorial pages of the anti-Roosevelt newspapers (and that means some four-fifths of the press) it was a dull and inept affair. Radio listeners will attest that it made dreary listening, and in the cold print of the newspapers it makes even drearier reading. Strictly from a campaigning standpoint, the speech must be set down as a failure. It was common knowledge that Governor Landon had a bad radio voice, and whatever coaching he received from the broadcasting-company experts fell on barren soil. After a brave start in the first few paragraphs he fell back on mumbling and swallowing his words. But it was not merely that he lacked the magic of warm utterance or of memorable phrase. He lacked even more fatally something important to say. One got the picture of an insignificant, although sincere, state politician who had been taught how to speak his part, striving valiantly to cope with the demands of a national campaign and bewildered by the confusions of a vast economic system in a time of stress.

Most of the speech must be set down as eyewash for the citizenry. It has nothing to say about the issues on which the future of the nation depends—the nature of a workable social-security program, the techniques of adequate banking and currency control, the types of taxes on which the burden of governmental costs will be laid, public works and housing construction, the control of holding companies, the regulation of security issues, the relation of the government to giant power projects such as the T V A.

We are not calling for detailed statements on these subjects. But the American people have reason to demand at least an expression of general policy and emphasis. That it can be done is indicated by Governor Landon's position on the question of labor organization. He made it abundantly clear that his conception of collective bargaining for labor was that of the National Association of Manufacturers. He defined freedom to bargain as meaning freedom "of interference from any source"—that is, from the efforts of union organizers. Such "freedom" would mean inevitably a clear field for the spread of company unionism.

But if a similar clarity were extended and applied to the other phases of economic policy that we have mentioned it might frighten away the voters for whom the Republican leaders are panting. Hence the eyewash in the form of an appeal to Americanism, national unity, "common sense," "human freedom," and "constitutional government." Hence also the attempt to straddle both lower taxes and adequate relief, business freedom and the enforcement of the anti-trust laws. We think of demagogues as violent and dynamic personalities, rousing their hearers to a fever pitch. There was nothing either violent or dynamic about Governor Landon. Nevertheless his speech was essentially that of the demagogue, for its appeal was entirely to the catchwords that have become traditional in American life and around which American emotions and prejudices have clustered. Whether it will be successful is quite another matter. Most of the realistic newspaper men in their off-the-record comment agreed that Landon had forfeited his chance of advancing his candidacy by making a clear and forceful statement of policy. Comparing the acceptance speeches of the two major candidates there can be no doubt that in the exchange of punts on the football field of the campaign Governor Landon has lost and President Roosevelt has gained considerable ground.

But Mr. Landon's failure is more than a personal failure. It represents the bankruptcy of Republican stand-patism at a time when vast social and economic changes are going on and when governmental wisdom can lie only in control of those changes and adjustment to them. Governor Landon made it clear that he deplored what he calls "hysteria" and "class hatred" and that he loves all groups and all people. But love is not enough. It will not meet the needs of the relief rolls, nor will it protect the investor from security manipulators, nor will it keep the small business man from being crowded out by the concentrated power of the big corporations, nor will it grant any security to the aged and unemployed, nor will it wipe out slums, nor will it help the workers in the steel industry to organize for collective bargaining, nor will it keep a reactionary majority on the Supreme Court from blocking every effort toward social legislation and control of business. In the absence of any specific methods for implementing their love, Governor Landon and the Republican leaders can leave us only with the conclusion that they are not anxious to have any of these things accomplished.

But the absence of an affirmative policy of control does not mean the absence of forces and influences hammering away at our economic life. In fact, when the government withdraws, as Mr. Landon would have it withdraw, from a vigorous policy of control, it merely surrenders the power to those who have already seized it and it leaves the field open to the naked operation of all the forces at work in a closed capitalist economy. Let us make no mistake in thinking that the Republican leaders really put their faith in "nature's simple plan" and in the economic harmonies which will flow from the removal of governmental control. They, too, are aiming at control of our economic life. But the control they envisage is that of steel masters, oil kings, holding-company wizards, and corporation lawyers. It has become abundantly clear that Governor Landon, whatever may be the degree of his personal benevolence, has not the strength nor the stature to resist the pulls and pressures that these men will exert. An America under the Landon regime would be an America fashioned to their heart's desire. One needs no belief in "class prejudice" to understand that this cannot be the America of the majority.

Hearst and Lydia Pinkham

THE latest exposé of the patent-medicine racket has been given a rousing send-off by Mr. Hearst's Drug World. So hysterical have the editors of this trade paper become over the disclosures in "Facts and Frauds in Women's Hygiene" that they have rushed into print with the best unintentional publicity campaign the publishing industry has witnessed for some time. Two days before the book's publication date, Drug World sent special delivery letters to all manufacturers whose products it debunks, warning them of the impending blow. Naturally the medicine men hastened to buy the book, and the first printing was exhausted before publication. Drug World, however, was not satisfied with direct-mail advertising. Its editors proceeded to give the book wide publicity in their columns, even going so far as to build an editorial campaign upon it. They have urged manufacturers to organize a counter-attack, warning them that they are "in the same desperate position as the Allies occupied in that fated spring of 1918." The Proprietary Association, which favored the amended food-and-drug bill, and the Institute of Medicine Manufacturers, which opposed even this emasculated consumer legislation, have been advised to forget their differences and fight shoulder to shoulder against the common enemy. Exclusive statements by presidents of the medicine-men's associations which have been printed in Drug World are presumably the first blasts of the counter-attack. Frank Blair, president of the Proprietary Association, is of the opinion that "the claims made for the articles (proprietarys) in the long run must be truthful . . ." while D. E. Austin of the rival association feels "that the time is approaching when all advertising of drug products will be based on sound therapeutics."

Meanwhile, as might have been expected, sales of the book are soaring. This is all to the good, for its authors, Rachel Lynn Palmer and Dr. Sarah K. Greenberg, have done a competent and thorough job of exposing the frauds perpetrated on women who are too modest to discuss "intimate" problems with a doctor. This important subject has barely been touched upon in other consumers' books. Long before the days of Lydia Pinkham, the field of women's hygiene was highly lucrative for the quacks, but in recent years the profits gathered from the exploitation of women's weaknesses have touched new highs. An exposé of the dangerous products and dangerous methods sponsored by "reputable" manufacturers, as well as by others not so respectable, has long been needed and is most welcome now. "Facts and Frauds" is restrained, carefully documented, and convincing. These qualities, added to the debunking of such well advertised products as Zonite, Lysol, Midol, Hexin, to name a few, have probably caused the panic in the editorial offices of Drug World. Mr. Hearst has just cause for worry. A large part of the advertising revenue earned by his popular magazines is contributed by the Lydia Pinkham boys.

BY PAUL W. WARD

Wooing the Negro Vote

Washington, July 26

WITH unwonted fairness the front pages of the Ku Klux press on November 4 may scream: "Negroes Reelect Roosevelt President."

There will be several grounds on which to base that assertion if Roosevelt wins by only a narrow margin. Chief among them is the fact that, technically, Negroes hold the balance of power in one or more states that Roosevelt must carry to renew his White House lease. The others involve the Democrats' elaborate and unprecedented efforts to woo the colored gentry away from the G.O.P. and the signs—already visible—that the Negroes are succumbing in large numbers to this political seduction.

It is easy to show why, of all the minority groups in the nation, the one of outstanding political importance at the moment is that one-and-a-half per cent splinter made up of native-born Negroes living in the North. One begins by pointing out that Roosevelt is certain to get at least 230 electoral votes. There is no space here to explain why that is so, but a glance at the list of states and their electoral ratings, coupled with even a modicum of political knowledge, will suffice to show its verity. Roosevelt will need, then, only 36 of the remaining 301 votes and, given the elements necessary to make the finish a tight one, he will have to get those votes from one or more of five northern states. Those states—New York, Michigan, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and Ohio—form a block of 157 electoral votes. All five are normally Republican and, together, they have nearly 1,500,000 potential Negro voters—enough, if they desert the party of Lincoln for the party of the Solid South, to place all of these states in the Democratic column. Pennsylvania's thirty-six votes would be just enough to put Roosevelt across the finish line a winner. And Pennsylvania, where the margin of victory for either Roosevelt or Landon probably will not exceed 100,000 votes, has approximately 285,000 Negroes of voting age, or enough, if they shift, to wipe out the margin of 157,592 votes by which Hoover carried the state in 1932.

The picture is substantially the same in the four other key states with the exception that, unlike Pennsylvania, they plunked for Roosevelt in 1932. In Michigan, where Roosevelt's margin was 131,806, there are 118,000 potential Negro voters, most of whom were still voting for the Great Emancipator and the G.O.P. four years ago, and Michigan has 19 electoral votes. Ohio, where Roosevelt's margin was 74,016, has 206,000 potential Negro voters and 26 electoral votes. Illinois has 230,000 Negroes of voting age and 29 electoral votes. New York, whose capture by Roosevelt would give him 47 electoral votes and certain victory, has 293,000 potential Negro voters. There are at least four other states in which the vote of the colored brethren is important, and two of them are in the South, but all four seem already to be securely fixed in the Roosevelt column. One of these is Indiana, which has 14 electoral votes and 75,000 Negroes of voting age. Another is Missouri with 15 electoral votes and 152,000 potential Negro voters. The other two are Kentucky and Tennessee, so-called "border" states where for many years in certain sections Negroes have been permitted to vote not only in general elections but also in the far more important primaries.

With the strategical importance of the Negro vote in the campaign demonstrated, the next question is: How will that vote go? There is plenty of evidence of a heavy drift toward Roosevelt. Down in Louisville, which due to the Negro vote had had an almost unbroken string of Republican mayors and Congressmen since the Civil War, the colored people shifted their party affiliations in 1934 and presented the city with a Democratic mayor and a Democratic Congressman. The boss of Memphis also has discovered that they can be made to vote Democratic. In Chicago in 1934 they ousted the Negro Congressman, De Priest, a Republican, and put in his place another Negro, Mitchell, who is a Democrat. The North Carolina Democratic convention a few weeks ago seated a Negro delegate from Raleigh. At Durham in that same solidly Democratic state two Negro magistrates recently were elected, swept into office on their promise to be hard with landlords seeking eviction notices. If further examples of the trend be needed, there are the unprecedentedly heavy votes cast by Negro districts in the recent Democratic primaries in Ohio and Illinois.

Despite all this, the possibilities of error in gauging the drift of the Negro vote are enormous. It is easy to underestimate the grip which Republican machine bosses have upon the 1,500,000 potential Negro voters in the five key states. Only the members of the upper crust of the Negro community are to any appreciable degree political free agents. The rest do not vote; they are voted. Like his white brothers living in similar squalor in the industrial bowels and backwash of cities, the Negro has been notoriously venal, placing his vote at the disposal of whichever machine at the moment can pay the highest price. The G.O.P. will have buying power again this year—bigger buying power, probably, than ever before—and all the factors which should make the Negro want to vote for Roosevelt must be discounted in the light of that fact.

There are, of course, a great many reasons why the Negro, if left to his personal predilections, should want to vote for Roosevelt. They begin with the fact that the Negro masses have never got anything in return for their allegiance to the G.O.P. Such favors as that party has distributed to Negroes when in power have gone to a few hacks with a coefficient of respect and actual leadership among Negroes about equal to that of Tom Heflin among the Boston Irish. The party has a better record than that of the Democrats on racial issues, but only on paper, and it has done nothing to improve its station in the past year. The agitation for anti-lynching legislation in the last Congress came chiefly from Democrats, and the one Presidential aspirant who ran into a barrage of organized Negro opposition was a Republican, Borah, who was condemned for his stand on anti-lynching legislation. At the party's recent national convention in Cleveland, it compounded all its recent errors with respect to the Negro vote by seating no colored delegates save those in the bought-and-paid-for black-and-tan delegations, which the veteran Perry Howard and the ineffable Tieless Joe Talbert brought up from South Carolina and Mississippi.

There will be time enough between now and November 3, however, for the Republicans to cover up most of those errors with new blandishments and dough. Their current lethargy springs only from a desire to keep their money bags as fat as possible as long as possible. They will spring into action in the black wards on September 1. When they do, it will be to talk not about their errors but about those of the Democrats. Professor Carpenter, the former Buffalo director of the League for Industrial Democracy, who is now a member of the G.O.P. "brain trust," began some weeks ago the preparation of a pamphlet on Senator Joe T. (for "Terror") Robinson, of Arkansas, and the relationship between this Administration leader and the frustration of all attempts to alleviate the plight of white and Negro sharecroppers in the cotton South. In this or similar handbooks for speakers, the G.O.P. will attempt to capitalize on the fact that the AAA's cotton program has pushed the southern Negro deeper into a slavery worse than that from which the Republican Party claims to have freed him in 1862. The Republicans also will seek to make Negro votes out of Roosevelt's silence on racial and civil-liberties issues as well as out of his Administration's failure to use its overwhelming majorities in House and Senate to force through an anti-lynching bill. They may also call attention to the refusal of the Department of Justice to send its G-men after lynchers who have kidnapped Negroes and carried them across state lines, as in the Claude Neal case, even after the Lindbergh law had been amended to make such federal action possible. And if the Republicans do seek to make that point against the Administration, which argued that there was no ransom involved in the Neal case, they can bulwark it by pointing out that there was no hesitancy in sending G-men into the Wendel case, though it also was uncomplicated by ransom demands.

Telling though such thrusts and arguments may be, how can they possibly prevail against the counter-evidence supplied by the Democrats in convention at Philadelphia? How can they possibly outweigh the spectacle put on there by Senator "Cotton Ed" Smith, of South Carolina, thunderously bolting the convention because of its courtesies to Negroes? Smith's blustering advertised to millions of Negro voters that one of their race, the Reverend Marshall Shepard, trusted political lieutenant of Pennsylvania's Governor Earle, had been invited to pray over the convention, that another Negro, Congressman Mitchell, had been allowed to second Roosevelt's nomination.

Coupled with the Smith incident as a vote-maker for Roosevelt is the performance of the Roosevelt-hater, Governor Talmadge, of Georgia, and his allies who with obvious defamatory intent circulated photographs of Mrs. Roosevelt in the company of Negroes. Then there is the case of Mrs. Roosevelt herself who, appalled by conditions at the National Industrial Training School for Girls, recently gave the inmates an outing on the White House lawn and by so doing provided the South Carolina Democratic convention a few weeks later with its chief topic of conversation. Speakers down from Washington were warned by friends on the scene to make no laudatory references to the President's wife; she had just entertained a bunch of "nigger whores" at the White House.

Not the least among the Democrats' assets is the Committee for Industrial Organization, parent to Labor's Non-Partisan League, which is out to line up the labor vote for Roosevelt. The unions which are the backbone of the C.I.O.—the United Mine Workers and the needle-trades groups—are preeminently the unions which draw no color line. There are about 100,000 Negroes in the C.I.O. unions. The U.M.W. alone has about 22,000 of them and by its example in Alabama has broken down the color line that for many years has been impeding unionization in the South. The C.I.O. in its steel, rubber, and automobile drives, has the active support of the National Negro Congress, headed by A. Philip Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters. John P. Davis, national secretary of the congress, who was the pay-off man in the Negro division of the Hoover campaign in 1932, is taking an active part in the steel drive and has recruited for the C.I.O. eight Negro organizers.

And that brings us to the Democrats' chief asset in the campaign—the WPA. If there is anything at the Administration's command that will outweigh the cash the Landon forces are prepared to lay out for the Negro vote, it is the WPA. Unemployment has hit the Negro harder than any other group, and the WPA has given him work. Moreover, it has given him work on terms of equality with the white man. The opportunities for racial discrimination which the FERA offered and local relief machinery still offers have been virtually erased by the WPA's rules and regulations. Despite its flaws and its low standards of relief, the FERA provided thousands of Negroes with more security and a better standard of living than they had ever known before. The fact that this was due chiefly to the abominably low level of their previous existence does not alter the psychological effect. Nor does it detract materially from the fact that the WPA, while throwing back thousands of Negro families to their previous levels, has raised other thousands above the FERA level to a plane heretofore inaccessible to the colored masses. The FERA, it is generally conceded, was responsible for the Democratic gains among Negroes in the 1934 elections. Roosevelt and his aides count upon the WPA to double and treble those gains in 1936.

John L. Lewis: Portrait of a Realist

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

BIG business insists that capital and labor are really partners; which indeed they are. They are partners in revolutionary destiny. As yet, of the two, big business is by far the more active partner. Not that we have reached a revolutionary stage; not by a long shot. Not that big business has assumed the heroic role of the madness which destroys. But it seems to be rehearsing under good Marxian auspices, a lot better than our labor movement. It is mad enough today to precipitate a social crisis as we crawl out of the depression. It is forcing social war just because business is improving. Its madness lies in its failure to perceive that at this stage of American history such bourbonism is progressive education in class consciousness for the American worker. It fails to realize that between the Homestead lockout of July 1, 1892, and the Homestead memorial meeting of July 4, 1936, lie two generations of decreasing opportunity and increasing insecurity for the American people; that the frontier has closed and that within this enclosure the contradictions in our economy have been furiously at work.

Social crisis is a strong term. Are we in it? I believe we are. A crisis in capitalism differs from a depression in the business cycle in that the economic facts which cause depressions become a moral and finally unarbitrable issue. A social crisis begins when it becomes increasingly obvious to decent men that all the wrong is gathering on one side and all the right on the other, when the interests of big ownership and the interests of the nation become mutually exclusive. Then big ownership can no longer make concessions, its behavior increases in brutality, and above all, its lies become ever more transparent. Thus, the American Iron and Steel Institute felt itself impelled, through a sort of compulsive class neurosis, to advertise just such an egregious lie. On July 1, 1936, it spread this lie in a full-page advertisement in 375 of our leading newspapers at the cost of half a million dollars.

The lie was in the form of a syllogism. It had two premises and a conclusion. The major premise stated that "the overwhelming majority of the employees in the steel industry recently participated in annual elections under their own representation plan and elected their own representatives for collective bargaining." The minor premise stated that "no employee in the steel industry has to join any organization to get or hold a job." Their conclusion, therefore, was that "the steel industry will oppose any attempt to compel its employees to join a union or pay tribute for the right to work . . . [and] will use its resources to the best of its ability to protect its employees and their families from intimidation, coercion, and violence and to aid them in maintaining collective bargaining free from interference from any source."

In other words, a five-billion-dollar monopoly spent half a million dollars on a single lie which claims that labor is the enemy of labor; and that the friend of labor, its guardian, indeed its union, is the American Iron and Steel Institute. Marie Antoinette had more sense and decency than Eugene Grace! The Bourbons, unlike the House of Morgan, did not claim that they were the protectors of the sansculottes.

But this time, the bluff of the steel masters was called. It was called by John L. Lewis, whose drive and language they understand so well that it was indeed his leadership which frightened them into advertising their lie. David Sarnoff, president of the Radio Corporation of America, whose workers have been on strike under Lewis's leadership, made a virtue of sound strategy and permitted him to address the nation on July 6 over N. B. C. on the issue of industrial unionism in general and the steel drive in particular. Mr. Sarnoff permitted Mr. Lewis to speak because it is obviously Lewis and not the American Iron and Steel Institute who speaks for labor and the steel industry. Lewis is chairman of the drive to unionize steel; he is chairman of the Committee for Industrial Organization which is back of the drive; and he is president of the United Mine Workers, whose resources are a guaranty that the C. I. O. means business. To call John Lewis an "outside agitator" in American labor makes exactly as much sense as calling President Roosevelt an outside administrator in American government.

Lewis showed in detail how the steel industry has "aided" labor for the past thirty-five years by failing to pay "a bare subsistence wage, not to mention a living wage, to the great mass of its workers." He showed the whole miserable history of the steel trust. He showed that when the steel industry speaks of "protecting" labor "it means that meetings of steel employees will be disrupted by thugs and hoodlums employed by the steel corporations; that the organizers themselves will be brutally beaten . . ."; and that the industry means to engage in "the unlawful, ruthless tactics of former years." Like Hitler, the Institute will protect its workers through terror. As though to prove how well Lewis knows these tactics, the Bethlehem Steel Company, whose president, Eugene Grace, is also chairman of the American Iron and Steel Institute, has hired, according to press dispatches, during the first ten days of this month 130 deputized gunmen. The entire steel industry is seeing to it that its controlled municipalities are laying in new supplies of tear and vomit gas, of ammunition and other riot material. Spies are being placed in the plants by the hundreds. Fences around these plants are being prepared for electrification. Terror is already reigning in the steel towns. And if in September or later we have civil war in steel, we know now who is preparing for it.

But John Lewis did more than give the lie to the steel outfit. He showed why the only way to organize the workers in a monolithic five-billion-dollar industry is through an equally monolithic unionism and not through craft-separatism. It is because he means to organize the basic industries into industrial unions that he has frightened President William Green and the other "pure-and-simple" labor bureaucrats on the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. into open sabotage. For obviously the amalgamation of the various crafts in one industry into a single union would lose a lot of trade-union leaders their jobs by the sheer elimination of these jobs. And equally obviously, the influx of large numbers of new workers into organized labor would endanger the tenure even of those reactionary job holders who would be left and who have come to look upon their jobs as their private property.

It is for this reason that the bureaucrats on the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. are doing their best to lop off the 1,250,000 workers in the C. I. O., almost 40 per cent of the entire membership of the A. F. of L. At this moment the council has decided to postpone the suspension of these unions on the plea of the Roosevelt Administration, which is desperately trying to prevent a split in labor during the campaign. But they want to suspend these twelve "dual" unions just the same. They mean to misinterpret the constitution of the A. F. of L. in such a way that these suspended unions will have no chance to vote on their own expulsion at the next convention of the federation in October, which requires a two-thirds vote to expel. The Executive Council is trying to kill the drive to organize steel as openly as is the American Iron and Steel Institute. It is the terror of the job holder which made William Green reply to Lewis in the public press in a scab speech. On July 7 Mr. Green issued a statement in which he "sincerely regretted that the C. I. O. thwarted [sic] the purposes of the A. F. of L. to inaugurate an organizing campaign in the steel industry behind which the A. F. of L. would have mobilized the united support of the pooled resources of organized labor." Thwarted when? What purposes?

In 1919 some fifteen crafts fought one another far harder than they fought the steel trust for their "jurisdictional" rights over workers they failed to organize, thereby losing the campaign before they started. In the great textile strike in 1929 in the South, Green promised the workers in the textile industry the "united support of organized labor"—a phrase he loves to mouth—and then managed to produce a mere $5,000 for the organization drive, the rest being furnished by individual unions without benefit of Mr. Green. When throughout the second half of 1933 Lewis begged Green to organize labor in the basic industries under Section 7-a, Green continuously sabotaged every effort—in rubber, in automobiles, in oil, in steel. When Gerard Swope, then in the government with Green, ironically suggested to him that the only way to organize the workers of the highly mechanized General Electric, of which Mr. Swope is the president, was to organize them on a vertical basis, Mr. Green explained to Mr. Swope why that was impossible. Indeed the complete collapse of Mr. Green in the NRA in face of the danger that labor might be effectively organized under Section 7-a made him the laughing stock of industrialists, government officials, and labor leaders.

And now this man has the gall to accuse John Lewis and the C. I. O. of "thwarting" his efforts to organize the steel workers. Does Green remember the conversation he had with Lewis on a cold winter midnight in front of the Cadillac Hotel in New York City, when Lewis plead with him to start an organization campaign in steel? "But, John," our hero of "the pooled resources of organized labor" wailed, "Where will we get the money?" And when Lewis showed him how to get the money to start, enumerated a half dozen international unions which would be glad to help, pledged him an initial hundred thousand dollars from the miners, Green sadly shook his head and walked through the revolving door of the Cadillac Hotel. Green believes in industrial unionism. But he dares not stand up against the Tobins and the Hutchesons and the Whartons and the Wolls on his Executive Council. No wonder Lewis once remarked of him: "I fear his threats as much as I believe his promises."

The difference between William Green and John L. Lewis is an exact measure of the growth and consciousness of organized labor during the depression. Green represents the archaic forces in American labor. Lewis represents its progressive drive. Fifteen years ago Lewis stood exactly where Green stands now, though never as a weakling. Nine years ago Lewis signed the Jacksonville Agreement in the bituminous field. Though it was a victory, it was a Pyrrhic victory. And when he realized that all victories are Pyrrhic unless they are backed by power, he moved to the left—rapidly since 1933—until today he stands at the head of an awakening labor movement.

II

The director of the C. I. O. is John Brophy, one of the truly noble characters in American labor. For years, as president of District 2 of the United Mine Workers and later, Brophy fought Lewis in the union. He lost. For Lewis had the power and he used it. The fight had been extremely bitter. Brophy represented the progressive forces in the union. His program was essentially the program for which Lewis is fighting now. Today the two men work together.

It was during the NRA that Lewis realized that the mass of American labor can never be organized along craft lines. And in the A. F. of L. convention in San Francisco in 1934, he came out for industrial unionism. It was due to his leadership that the convention authorized the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. to organize industrial unions in the automobile, aluminum, and cement industries, and also ordered the council to multiply the so-called federal trade and labor unions, which are industrial unions in individual plants, whose workers do not fall within the claims staked out by the various crafts. But throughout 1935, the Executive Council knifed this mandate and Green even secretly ordered his organizers to lay low on the industrial-union campaign. At the next convention, in Atlantic City in 1935, Lewis pressed the fight, and actually got over one-third of the convention to indorse industrial unionism on principle.

It was during this fight, from 1933 on, that John Lewis changed his whole philosophy of labor. For a struggle for industrial unionism necessarily involves a general progressive program. And so Lewis almost unwittingly found himself at the head of the progressive forces in the last convention, marching in the vanguard of all his former enemies. He forced Matthew Woll to resign from the acting presidency of the reactionary National Civic Federation. He stopped all the "red"-baiting, for now he needed the progressives in the various unions. And he even knocked down in cold blood William Hutcheson, president of the Carpenters, to keep Brother Hutcheson from playing a dirty parliamentary trick in order to keep the discussion of industrial unionism off the floor. In short, he accepted not only industrial unionism, but all the implications of a militant labor program. And with infinitely more power he found himself precisely where Brophy had been all these years. Out of the 1935 convention grew the Committee for Industrial Organization.

After the convention, Brophy went to Lewis and put himself at his disposal. John Brophy could do that without swallowing his pride, for his worst enemy knows that he would not work for anything in which he does not wholeheartedly believe.

"All right," said Lewis, "you be the director of the C. I. O." And there were no conditions.

I have known Brophy for some fifteen years. I have agreed with his position all that time. I have written a good deal against Lewis, incidentally never doubting his strength, ability, and integrity, but objecting to his dictatorial methods, his ruthless fight against his own progressive wing, his line-up with the rest of the bureaucrats on the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. before the NRA. And so, I, of course, wanted to gossip with John Brophy, not so much on how he felt about Lewis's program which had been his own all these years, but how he felt about Lewis now that he was in such close association with him.

"Naturally," Brophy said, "I would be with Lewis in this fight even if I did not like him; in fact, even if I did not trust him. His mere program is enough for me. But, you know, I am sold on Lewis today. He is simply marvelous to work with. After he put me in this job, he asked me, 'Well, John, who timed this thing right, you or I?' And I had to say, 'I guess you did, John.' And that's just it. Lewis has a genius for timing.

"Now the reason Lewis times so well," Brophy continued, "is that he is not moved by theory but by events. His personality is felt in action. He is entirely a pragmatist. But he doesn't compromise; he steps in. When he sees a chance he moves, quickly, decisively. He adopts and adapts and discards as the situation dictates, and he is so damned intelligent and fearless it is a pleasure to work with him. When he accepts a position, he accepts it in its entirety, not in bits. He accepts all its furthest implications. And to that degree, he is a good theorist. He understands these implications as a whole. For instance, there came up the problem of choosing my assistants in the C. I. O. I couldn't think of anyone to do the job except Lewis's former worst enemies. Such fellows as Adolph Germer and Powers Hapgood. So I went to him with my list.

"Is it necessary to have these fellows?" asked Lewis.

"Yes," I said, "first because I want people who know all about industrial unionism and secondly, I want people who believe in me personally.

"All right," said Lewis, and approved."

Lewis holds no malice. He has messed up a lot of folks in his day, but that was only opposition.

III

John Lewis did not begin his leadership with any particular set of ideas or with an integrated set of ideals. The speech he made over a national hook-up in answer to the wilful misrepresentations of the American Iron and Steel Institute rang with a moral passion of which he would have been incapable ten years ago. And his testimony before a Senate Committee in 1935 in favor of the thirty-hour week expressed a rounded social attitude of which he had no conception fifteen years ago. Lewis moves purely realistically. His ideas derive entirely from the objective situation. He is quite right when he insists that he is not a revolutionary. He lacks the imagination of the true revolutionary. He is today a militant opportunist in the best sense. When he compromises he does so with reality and not with his own dread of it. He is primarily interested in the next step, but that step he takes clearly, definitely, ruthlessly, and always in the direction in which he wants to go.

John Lewis's people have been miners as far back as any record shows, and the record goes back for some three centuries. His father, Thomas Lewis, came from Wales and settled in Lucas, Iowa, where John was born on February 12, 1880. The father joined the Knights of Labor and worked in the mines. In 1890 he was active as a rank-and-filer in the foundation of the United Mine Workers and almost immediately got himself blacklisted in the entire coal industry for good, so that the Lewis boys had to go into the mines and support the family. In his youth John Lewis drifted into all sorts of mines all over the country—gold, copper, bituminous, anthracite. A start in life under such hard conditions may drive some highly gifted temperaments into an ineffectual idealism. But Lewis never had a touch of Eugene Debs in his makeup. He got toughened in the union local, often to be sure through means which a Debs would have eschewed. Lewis never moved without building and tightening his machine. He never hesitated to win first and be fair afterwards; or rather in a fight, he is fair to what he wants to achieve rather than to the person of his opponent. The fight with his enemies was often so extremely bitter that for years one heard about John Lewis having "sold out." There never was a word of truth in it. For one thing, he was brought up in the home of a blacklisted miner, and that left a deep mark on his whole psychology; and for another, John Lewis is interested in gathering power, not in selling it.

This does not mean that in the early days he rose to power by being drafted for his political high-mindedness. But he got there just the same. The fact is that in 1917 he became the first vice-president of the United Mine Workers of America. Fortunately for him, Frank Hayes, then president, was seldom sober. And Mr. Lewis was so busy filling his shoes that he could not be bothered sobering him up. Accordingly, in 1919 he became acting president. From the acting presidency to the actual presidency was but a step, for the miners do not elect their officers at the convention but by mail. And Lewis's organization out in the field saw to it that he got the right mail.

In the next article I will show how and what John Lewis learned from his experience as the head of our largest union, from his intimate knowledge of a basic industry, which is deeply affected by national politics and legislation; what he learned during the depression and from the NRA; and why he is today the most significant figure not only in American labor but in American life.

(Mr. Stolberg's second article on John L. Lewis will appear next week.)

Death Takes a Holiday

BY LOUIS F. GITTLER

Berlin, July 9

THREE weeks remain before the opening of the Olympic Games. Berlin is extraordinarily quiet and impatiently expectant. The streets are devoid of Brown Shirts and their leaders. There are no parades. Olympic banners and flags of all nations are flying about in the breeze, and the visitor is inclined to dismiss all anti-German thought and action abroad as insipid and unjust. He sees no Jewish heads being chopped off, or even roundly cudged. His popular conception of the aspect of post-revolution is shattered. The people smile, are polite, and sing with gusto in beer gardens. Board and lodging are good, cheap, and abundant, and no one is swindled by grasping hotel and shop proprietors. Everything is terrifyingly clean, and the visitor likes it all.

But few visitors will realize what the Olympics mean to Germany and to the Nazis. For three-and-one-half years the world has read innumerable books, articles, and other propaganda either for or against the Nazi regime. They have heard reliable speakers denounce the Nazis with all the venom and logical persuasion they could muster. And when the world comes to Germany to see the Olympic Games in August, it will be coming not merely to witness an international sports event but to pass judgment—no matter how little contemplated—on the practice of a political ideology. This the Nazis are keenly aware of, and the tremendous task of spreading good-will and justification of their own policy has been provided for with that remarkable insight and skill they possess in the arts of propaganda. The technique of influencing foreigners has been carefully perfected by a special committee within the framework of the Propaganda Ministry. This committee has maintained contact with German organizations and party cells in all parts of the world. It has received from these sources invaluable information and advice on the peculiarities of national reaction and the psychological attitudes toward the Third Reich. On the basis of its research and findings the committee has constructed a propaganda plan for the immediate purpose of impressing foreigners in Germany this summer.

The preparations for the Olympiad extend as far back as last summer. At that time public-works projects were drawn up for the beautifying of the city. This specially concocted "beauty" campaign included the widening of streets, the rebuilding of public squares, the cleaning of all facades in the city by house-owners (failure meant a raising of taxes), construction of new government buildings, renovation of museums, and, most important, the construction of the huge Olympic Village which will later be turned over to the army. Even a subway is being built and is being rushed through double-time in order to be open for "Olympic guests" in August. The whole process is strikingly similar to that of the American provincial family's preparations for the town parson's visit. By order of no other than State Commissar Lippert himself, all bed wash has been ordered off proletarian balconies, no garbage is to be dumped in visible parts, spitting cherry pits or saliva on the sidewalks may be considered a major offense, and apartment house doors may be kept open until ten o'clock. All stray storm troopers have been told to ask questions first before pouring forth their hate in the presence of foreigners. Policemen are uncomfortably polite and prejudiced in favor of foreigners, although all the holy Prussian rules, regulations, and sacraments may have been trampled upon. Waiters, taxi-drivers, porters, bar-girls, and street-walkers are all learning English in groups in various cafés in the Westend. Smiles of greeting are being practiced; political sin is being erased from the conscience; laughter, gaiety, and good cheer are prescribed. The good impression must be maintained.

The Stürmer is now to be seen only in sections where no foreigner will wander. Gradually this vicious anti-Semitic paper has disappeared and the street boxes on every corner wherein it was exhibited have received a new coat of paint, hiding slogans calling upon the world to hate the Jews. Songs of wrath and thunder are sung no more and storm troopers, Hitler's bodyguards, Reichswehr conscripts, and labor camp youths are disciplined and respectable. The newspapers are filled with promises of the world's love for the "New Germany." There are interviews with representatives of all nationalities, sweet in sentiment and bubbling with enthusiasm. The German populace are instructed in daily editorials how to behave during the next month, and are warned not to bring their Fatherland to shame. Everywhere are to be seen the five rings of the Olympic flag. The Nazi party organ, the Angriff, is even running a serial novel advertised as the "pre-Olympia" novel, and entitled "The Sixth Ring," with Berlin and New York as the scenes of action and an international sporting love affair between an American youth and a German girl as its theme. Women wear brooches, bathing suits, hats, pocketbooks, all adorned with the Olympic emblem, and most males have discarded the inevitable Nazi insignia for the more attractive five rings. Ubiquitous is the Nazi slogan, "I summon the youth of the World," and the largest movie house in town released a film of the same name yesterday. The most important political events of the day have been ignored in the newspapers which devote most of their space to the Olympiad, the Arab discontent in Palestine, and the "riots" and strikes occurring so frequently in France, America, and Belgium.

Coincident with the "last appeal" to the world yesterday by Herr Lewald, President of the German Olympic Committee, was the meeting of the Reich Committee for Foreign Travel, a subsidiary of the Propaganda Ministry in Berlin. The gathering was addressed by State Secretary Funk, the right-hand man of Minister Goebbels, who described the Olympic and its subsequent flow of foreign visitors as calling forth the "fulfillment of a high political mission . . . and as presenting a propaganda opportunity which has never before in the history of the world been equalled." This "propaganda opportunity" will be penetratingly exploited, Herr Funk assures us. Ideas and directions have been thought out by the Special Committee of the Propaganda Ministry. While the Weimar regime would have been ashamed to show foreigners a wretched, badly-governed, degenerate Germany, it is the aspiration of the National Socialist regime to bring visitors here in the largest possible number. . . . In this we see effective defense measures against the lying reports about Germany rampant abroad. The foreigner who comes to us should see that under our leader, Adolf Hitler, a society has been formed into a united German people. . . . Every German hotelier, every German hotel employee, every servant, taxi-driver, represents the National Socialist state to the foreigner. Therefore, they all have the duty to behave themselves accordingly and not to shame their Fatherland. The foreigners who come to Germany must leave our country consciously aware that Germany is the most hospitable land in the world. . . . In the Olympic year 1936, each German compatriot is a host to the world. Each German compatriot must be conscious of this fact and act accordingly. Foreign travel is an instrument for the regaining of prestige in the eyes of the world. Foreign travel serves the Peace Idea, which Adolf Hitler, our leader, has proclaimed to the world . . . a lofty political mission, it is dependent upon each person what the world thinks about Germany and what the world says about Germany.

As a result of this important speech on Nazi Olympic policy, the Angriff published an editorial admonishing its comrade-readers to take notice that the "foreign travel bureau has done all in its power to entice the world to Berlin. Now it is up to you to supplement the German landscape with the amiability of the German people—so that we can effect the best impression possible."

Complete as may be this perversion of Olympic ideals to a huge propaganda network intended for the gullibility of foreigners, the Olympiad serves also a purpose at home. It is the great "economic hope," the great illusion that has been born again and is engulfing the merchants of Berlin and the Reich. Ask any business man how business is and he shrugs, then beams and says: "But when the Olympics come . . . !" A foreign newspaper dealer complains that hardly a foreigner was in Berlin this winter and spring, but, he adds, with a strange light in his eye, "when the Olympics finally come . . . !" For the past two months the Reich Food Ministry has been hoarding eggs and other foods which are not abundant in the Third Reich. Boarding houses, hotels, and most private families have already rationed out their floor space and are hopefully awaiting

"the day." Even real-estate owners and agents assure one another that their ground is more valuable because it lies directly on the route toward the Olympic village. Many new restaurants and night clubs have been opened. If any evils exist in the economic structure, the Olympics will eradicate them. It seems that all the boredom of the Third Reich (even the parades are becoming boring) will find its terminus in the Olympiad. All life palpitates here because a two weeks' sports congress will convene in the buxom wenches, red-cheeked girls, and genial petty burghers singing in rathskellers and beer gardens. They will have seen order, contentment, clean-shaven storm troopers, labor camp youths, and disciplined Hitler boys. They will have taken part in the Great Farce and will retain vivid impressions of a creative, home-loving, foreigner-loving people, and will spread the gospel of "German peace" to the four corners of the globe. What will be the next step?

HVGO

summer. The Nazis have successfully cultivated the people's imagination and whipped it into a state of feverish hope. They have erected complicated information and guide bureaus, printed thousands of pamphlets, brochures, and books, manufactured artistic films glorifying sport, and have spent millions of marks in preparations, so that no inconveniences may be existent which might irritate Olympic guests. The rush toward the capital from the provinces commenced long ago, and the city government has been hard put to it to stem the tide.

In several weeks, the Olympics will be over. One hears stark, disconcerting rumors about what will happen after the bubble bursts. Thousands of foreigners will have returned to their homelands full of Munich beer, Gemütlichkeit, visions of pretty Kurfürstendamm women,

The rumors and stories told are disturbing. The Jews fear the consequences most. When the Olympics have failed to restore a shattered German economy, as fail they must, the Nazis are expected to hang all the blame on the Jewish head, and to claim that the "German Olympics" were ruined by Jewish propaganda abroad. There are whispers of confiscation of passports and papers so as to keep the Jews "prisoners" for the dirty work of the next war; of complete economic disfranchisement; of "sporadic" riots and pillaging. In Jewish circles the atmosphere is tense, and many of those who can leave will do so after the closing of the games. There is bitter resentment at the thought that the world may be taken in by the corruption of the Olympic idea to the personal propaganda instrument of the Messrs. Hitler and Goebbels.

Toward a Socialized Medicine

BY JAMES RORTY

VOLUNTARY health insurance, the increase of group practice, the expansion of public medicine as administered by federal, state, and local health departments—these are the chief aspects of the current revolutionary transition toward socialized medicine which is steadily developing. The nature of the lags and obstructions is also clear. Most important of these is the assertion, by the American Medical Association, acting essentially as a trade association of the one-man businesses which the majority of American doctors operate, of an obsolete title to the ownership and control of what should be an essential public service. The inevitable "community of interest" achieved through the indirect financing of A.M.A. activities by medical advertisers is also an important factor: the vested interests of the "little men" of medicine, of the A.M.A. as a commercially financed institution, and of the drug business, tend to coincide and reinforce each other. Together they pound the cork of scarcity economics into the American medicine bottle, which has been filled for us largely by the expenditure of social capital, public and philanthropic, in medical education and research.

Dr. Fishbein calls his cork "ethics," just as the vested interests of the power industry call their cork "liberty." Like the power fight, the struggle to socialize medicine is now in the open, with the arenas increasingly the press and the halls of legislation. And the "lay public," represented chiefly by the progressive physicians, many of whom have been excommunicated by the A.M.A. and by the social workers, public-health workers, sociologists, and economists who have occupied themselves with the problem, becomes now the protagonist of change. It is important, therefore, that laymen learn to see through the "ethical" and other shibboleths; also that they acquaint themselves with what is currently happening in the organization of medical care. The facts are readily available; among the best of the recent compendiums are I. S. Falk's "Security Against Sickness" and the pamphlet, "New Plans of Medical Service," issued by the Julius Rosenwald Fund of Chicago. The following greatly condensed description is based chiefly on these texts, plus a good deal of personal interviewing and correspondence. Today, in addition to the traditional, fee-for-service, sliding-scale practice of the individual doctor, we see developing the following types of medical service:

1. The privately-owned group-practice unit. The Mayo clinic in Rochester, Minnesota, is the outstanding example. It operates on a fee-for-service, sliding-scale basis, and on a very high scientific and ethical level which not even the A.M.A. has dared to challenge—in recent years at least. That the Mayo clinic has become a major institution of medical research and discovery, and is conducted primarily in the public interest, is due largely to the genius of the Mayo brothers. Every similar clinic has similar opportunities, afforded primarily by the large-scale, collective nature of the enterprise. But since control is ordinarily vested in a commercial partnership or corporation, the privately-owned clinic may also veer in the other direction: it may exploit both its employed doctors and its customer-patients, degrade the quality of medical care provided, and make little or no contribution to medical science.

2. The group-practice unit which applies the periodic or group payment plan. The Ross-Loos clinic in Los Angeles became perhaps the largest and most successful example of this type when, in 1929, the employees of the Department of Water and Power of Los Angeles sought and arranged for service on a group-payment basis. The medical services provided include house calls, office calls, diagnosis, and medical treatment; also surgical treatment of all kinds either at the clinic or in the hospital. There is no extra charge for eye refractions for subscribers, or for hospitalization. Employed members receive all services and supplies free except certain types of expensive medicines, such as insulin, salvarsan, or eye glasses. Dependents of members may receive all professional services, but are required to pay for their own hospitalization and for any supplies or apparatus used in their treatment, such as x-ray films, medicines, and orthopedic splints. There is also an extra charge to dependents of fifty cents for each office call and $1 for each home call, and other small charges for special procedures. The costs of services are $2 per employed person per month for the above benefits. The average extra charges for home calls, hospitalization, medicines, and so on, were sixty-eight cents per family per month during the year 1934, making a total cost of $2.68 for complete medical, surgical, and hospital care, not including dental service. In the autumn of 1935 there were approximately 20,000 employed subscribers representing more than sixty different groups of persons, constituting, with their families, more than 60,000 persons.

Three points deserve underlining: a. Group practice and group payment as operated by the Ross-Loos Medical group has resulted in giving the subscribing members more than the amount of medical care received by families of similar income in the general population. During the year 1933, there was an average of approximately fifteen office calls per average family of 3.02 persons, representing a subscriber and his dependents. b. The subscribers, whose hospital charges are included in the flat monthly rate use proportionately twice as much hospital care as do their dependents, whose bills must be paid directly. This may be interpreted to mean either that the subscribers tend to over-hospitalize themselves or that they tend for economic reasons to purchase less hospital care for their dependents than they should properly have; the latter interpretation probably comes closer to describing the actual condition. c. Collective representation as practiced by the enrolled groups serves both to reduce the costs of collection for the clinic, and to introduce some degree of control by the consumer of the standards and procedures adopted by the medical owners and managers of the clinic; it is not however, a true cooperative setup, since all residual profits go to the private owners.

3. The cooperatively owned and managed group practice-group payment unit which provides its members and their dependents with complete medical and dental service on a flat monthly or annual fee basis. The Farmers Union Cooperative Hospital Association of Elk City, Oklahoma, is an interesting example of this type. It was organized in 1929 by Dr. M. Shadid, who serves as medical director. The persons who join become stockholders in a non-profit cooperative association. A stockholder without dependents pays $12 per year; with one dependent the rate is $18; for a whole family, of whatever size, the rate is $25 per year. Payments must be made quarterly in advance. Participants in the health service benefits are limited to the families of stockholders, each of whom owns one share in the Community Hospital, erected in 1931 with bed capacity for thirty patients. The shares cost $50 each, payable $20 down and $15 a year for the next two years. The resources from shares are used only to pay for hospital land, buildings, and equipment. The stock is not assessable, but stockholders must pay for their shares in full when hospitalization is received. The hospital is managed by a board of five directors elected by the stockholders. The board employs a business manager for the hospital as well as the director of the medical staff. Extra charges to stockholders are made as follows: home calls, $1.50 plus twenty-five cents per mile one way; x-ray films (other than dental), $3 for one, $2 for each additional film. Membership has grown steadily, reaching 800 families in 1934 and 1,200 by the autumn of 1935. The medical and dental staff receives $12 of each $25 subscription with $13 being applied to hospital expenses. Fees from non-member patients go directly to the attending practitioners or to the hospital, respectively. All fees are assessed and collected by the business office of the hospital. Members of the medical staff receive one month's vacation annually, with full pay.

The distinguishing features of the Elk City enterprise are first, its cooperative organization—any financial surpluses are shared by the members; second, its inclusion of dental as well as medical service; third, its application of the insurance principle to average out both the sick and the well and large and small families; fourth, the development and support of a cooperative medical service as a department of the Farmers Union cooperative movement. This movement is well developed in Oklahoma, and derives much of its strength from the highly pertinent historical fact that Oklahoma was homesteaded in the nineties largely by trade-union and socialist workmen who found themselves boycotted following the collapse of the great strikes of that period. Before the war, the Socialists polled as high as thirty per cent of the Oklahoma electorate.

4. Group hospitalization, for the purpose of enabling employed persons and their dependents to budget systematically against the cost of hospital care alone—a limited group-payment plan. In February, 1933, the American Hospital Association officially indorsed group hospitalization as a method of budgeting hospital bills. This is a system of equal and regular payments (by an individual or family, usually in an employed group) into a common fund which will be used in providing hospital service when required. By February, 1936, more than 600 American communities had enrolled more than 300,000 subscribers in such plans, which involved the participation of several hundred hospitals. In New York, the three-cents-a-day plan of Associated Hospital Service had enrolled more than 80,000 subscribers after a year of operation. The annual cost of membership in the group hospitalization plan ranges from $5 to $12 per subscriber, depending upon the cost levels of the area, the kind of room accommodation received, the types of sickness covered, and the scope of the services offered. The subscriber may be admitted to any of the "participating" hospitals when necessary, but only under the care of a private physician selected by himself. The subscriber must pay his own physician's fee, but he may receive without charge as much as twenty-one days free care in the hospital, including the use of a semi-private room, nursing service, meals, the operating room, x-ray service, and laboratories. The hospital bill is paid from the central fund, which is administered by a non-profit corporation, the trustees of which may include hospital executives or trustees, representatives of industrial or civic bodies, members of the local medical society, the Community Chest, the health council, or the hospital council.

In 1934 the American College of Surgeons endorsed group hospitalization, but the American Medical Association has tried hard to put the brakes on this development. In October, 1933, the A.M.A.'s Bureau of Medical Economics issued a pamphlet entitled "Group Hospitalization Contracts Are Insurance Contracts," citing the opinions to this effect of the majority of the state insurance commissioners who replied to the A.M.A.'s questionnaire. Compliance with our various and complicated state insurance laws, most of which were written to protect the vested interests of private insurance companies, would tend to slow up and handicap this development, which has obvious advantages for the upper strata of employed workers and salaried people. It also has obvious advantages for the hospital, and Dr. Leland of the A.M.A.'s Bureau of Medical Economics points out quite correctly that the financial distress of the private hospitals since the depression largely accounts for their willingness to embrace group-hospitalization plans. There is also an economic advantage for the doctor, who has ordinarily a somewhat better chance of collecting his own bill if his patients' hospitalization expenses are covered by the payment of a monthly or annual fee. Fees paid to the hospitals are sometimes surprisingly high. For example, the Associated Hospital Service in New York pays $15 for the first day, $20 for the first two days, $23 for the first three days. Thereafter the charge is $6.50 per day—which would ordinarily be considered a high rate.

5. Industrial medical services. In "Security Against Sickness," I. S. Falk, summarizes this development as follows:

In 1930, about 540,000 gainfully employed persons in the mining and lumber industries of twenty-one states were eligible to more or less complete medical care on a fixed, periodic-payment basis. About one-third of the Class 1 steam railroads have organized insurance plans for the medical care of their employees. And several million more employed persons are members of insurance groups which provide complete or partial medical service for these persons or for them and their dependents. In some places, these industrial medical services are financed entirely by industry; in others, costs are met entirely by the insured persons; but in most, both industry and the employed persons share the costs. . . . The arrangements through which the services are furnished to the insured persons are extremely diverse. In some insurance organizations, a hospital and its outpatient clinics may be owned by the non-profit insurance agency and physicians and other personnel furnish services on a salary basis. In others, the insurance group makes contracts for services to be rendered by local institutions and practitioners. In some, the operating contract may be a guaranty of payment for services rendered to insured persons according to an agreed fees schedule; in others, the contract may guarantee only such costs as exceed specified sums. . . .

It may be estimated that all types of voluntary group payments for medical care through insurance, excepting that which operates under the workmen's-compensation laws, involve at least $40,000,000 a year. If this is added to the expenditures for medical care under the compensation laws ($80,000,000) we have in the aggregate about $120,000,000 (or more) a year spent through insurance plans.

As might be expected in such a diversity of plans, the quality of medical care offered by these industrial medical services runs all the way from excellent to wholly inadequate and even degraded systems set up to exploit workers under the guise of "welfare." Space is lacking to discuss the abuses which have arisen under the workmen's-compensation laws. Similar abuses have developed wherever unscrupulous medical or lay entrepreneurs have undertaken to sell policies to guarantee hospital service or both hospital and medical services. As Falk points out, "Some of these agencies have tended to bring the entire practice into disrepute because they have been patently dishonest schemes and have lately been prosecuted by the public authorities."

6. Plans sponsored and operated by medical societies. In June, 1935, the American Medical Society declared "its encouragement to local medical organizations to establish plans for the provision of adequate medical service for all of the people, adjusted to present economic conditions, by voluntary budgeting to meet the costs of illness." For some years previous to that decision several county medical societies in Washington and Oregon had been offering the services of their members to employed persons for an agreed annual payment. Free choice of doctors from among participating groups of from 30 to 300 physicians is provided. An extensive service is offered, covering medical, hospital, and nursing care both for injuries covered by workmen's-compensation acts and for ordinary sickness not connected with employment. The usual charge to subscribers runs from $1 to $2 per month. Special bureaus are set up by the county medical societies. While undoubtedly these systems offer certain benefits to both employed workers and the participating physicians, the demonstrated economies of group practice are largely ignored and unused, and the control is wholly in the hands of the doctors. Many of the medical-society plans, some in their formative state and others now in operation like that of the Medical Society of Wayne County, Michigan, of which Detroit is the chief city, are designed merely to "rationalize," through the setting up of a bureau to collect reduced fees on the installment plan, the administration of medical care to the poor. As Falk points out, "They do not secure the family against a future risk of sickness; they mortgage future earnings to pay for a calamity which has already occurred." The Wayne County plan was started in April, 1935. In the following November the two largest voluntary hospitals in Detroit withdrew from participation in the plan on the ground that patients were permitted to assume obligations beyond their capacity to pay. During the first year, the hospitals reported a default of nearly 50 per cent on the instalment payments of bureau patients. The hospitals alleged that in this way they were still required to provide charity service for "bureau patients," but were not permitted to use the facilities of their own admitting offices or social-service departments.

When reproached for obstructing progress in the organization of medical care, the A.M.A. makes a considerable pother about these medical-society plans, the inadequacy of which is apparent. Meanwhile, it tries earnestly but with less and less success to stamp out the grass fire of group clinics which its own members (they don't remain members very long) are steadily spreading. However, it must be admitted that our medical politicians are among our most effective political lobbyists. Their success in cutting health insurance out of the Security Act may be discounted; it was a temporary victory, and rather likely to backfire. But in Ohio, Illinois, and New York, the A.M.A. has procured the enactment of legislation which, when coupled with its power to excommunicate and otherwise penalize progressive doctors, is likely to delay and handicap the development of voluntary group practice and group-payment schemes considerably. In essence, these laws provide that the majority of the directors of all non-profit hospital service corporations must be at all times directors or trustees of hospitals, and that the schedule of fees must be subject to the approval of the insurance commissioner. It may safely be predicted that this is not the only legislative joker that will explode in the faces of naive laymen and doctors who have been led to suppose that the A.M.A. has had a change of heart.

No, our medical Canute may be described today as wet but resolute. But the tide is certainly rising and neither boycotts nor legislative lobbying will stop it. The prognosis, if a layman may be permitted to use the word, is that the A.M.A. will be subjected to progressive immersion first in voluntary health insurance, then in compulsory health insurance, and ultimately in a fully socialized system of medical care.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THERE are two phases of the Spanish struggle that I wish specially to call attention to. One is the fact that the present round of fighting is only a round, no matter who wins it. The battle will go on until the Spanish workers and peasants have come into their own. If the present régime collapses, which may prove to be the case before these lines go into type, we shall undoubtedly see a terrific reaction with the usual concomitants of bloodshed, wholesale executions, concentration camps, and the like, and the establishment of a military dictatorship. The other is this fresh proof of the danger which comes to any republic from the existence of a large standing army.

Apparently the Spanish government has not had the strength either to put an end to sporadic lawlessness, notably against the Catholic church, or to take drastic measures with the army. When the king was driven out in 1931 thousands of officers were put upon the retired list or dismissed outright, but they have remained in Spain as foci of discontent and of hostility to those in power, and they are doubtless in entire sympathy with the uprising that began in the colonies and crossed over into Spain. It is beyond doubt a terrible situation, with all sorts of dire possibilities, such as the breaking up of the country into several parts. But the fact remains that this revolutionary outburst comes not from communists or other left-wing radicals, or from the land-hungry peasants, or the organized workers, but from the military men sworn to uphold the existing government.

The unrest which has marked these post-war years in Spain is the more striking because Spain was the only western European country to keep out of the World War, during which it prospered greatly. Much of that prosperity, if not all, has now been dissipated, in great measure because of the internal upheavals, but also because of those African colonies which, like Cuba and the Philippines in their day as Spanish possessions, have been such a drain upon the country's finances and manhood. The second article I wrote for The Nation, back in 1894, was a description of my visit to Melilla into which the Spanish army had then been driven by Moroccans. I was only ashore a short time, but what I saw of the conditions in the camps prepared me for the incapacity of the Spanish army to put down the insurrection in Cuba in the years 1896 to 1898. I have never forgotten the horrible insanitary conditions, the quality of the food served out to the troops, and the under-sized and pitiful Spanish boys who composed the rank and file and were being sacrificed in a war about the purposes of which they knew nothing. After the World War I met the German aunt of the King of Spain, a former Bavarian princess, who was then visiting with her daughter, the Princess Pilar, in Munich. I asked her about conditions in Spain and expected a rosy response. Her face fell. "I was so happy," said she, "that we kept out of the World War and even gained in prosperity by doing so, but now we are slaughtering our youth again in Africa. I wish I could understand these things, but I cannot. My nephew, the King, tells me that we must fight again in Africa because of our national honor, that we must hold those colonies come what may. I cannot understand it. I cannot understand," she repeated, "why this 'national honor' should make us butcher our youth in Africa and throw away all the money and the advantages that we gained from not going into the World War." Unfortunately it was the nephew who controlled and not this humane and kindly woman, and thousands of Spanish boys perished thereafter as well as thousands of Moroccans.

Certainly the colonies have revenged themselves once more upon the Spanish government. Perhaps the present rulers if they had had time would have decreased the army on African soil and sought to rule in accordance with the socialist spirit of good will and friendliness rather than by force of arms. If this administration in Spain goes down it will be simply due to the enmity among army officers for a new deal which was to have brought some hope and some economic satisfaction to the millions of underpaid and undernourished Spanish peasants and workers who have toiled for many generations for absentee landlords living in the greatest possible luxury in Madrid, or Seville, or abroad.

We have no definite statistics as to how far the redistribution of land has gone during the last twelve months. The very fact that it was under way undoubtedly goaded the reactionaries and the privileged classes to make a final stand against the expropriation of the great estates. If it is correct that the peasants are rising to help the rebellion it must be due to their ignorance of where their hope lies; they are surely forging new chains for themselves. I am afraid it is true that when popular revolutions take place it is absolutely essential to make them thorough. I do not mean by this that republicans and socialists and liberals should resort to violence, to mass murder and the concentration camps, but I do not see why they cannot use their power to grapple effectively with the reactionary elements to the extent of removing every last one from positions of importance, and if necessary using the right to exile. The trouble with the 1931 revolution, like that of 1918 in Germany, was that it stopped half way and did not carry out radical social and economic reforms. The present leftist-Republican Cabinet has only had five months in which to move, but one can do a great deal in five months if one will take a leaf out of the book of dictators and houseclean just as vigorously as they, only humanely.

IT WAS a cowboy who called one of his associates a so-and-so. Under pressure by his fellows he agreed to apologize and said, "You're no so-and-so. Oh, no!" Father Coughlin seems to have followed a similar technique in regard to his burnt-toast letter to the White House. It was a somewhat grudging retraction of an epithet at best and now the prelate has taken to the stump again. According to a United Press dispatch from Buffalo: "The Reverend Charles E. Coughlin told 10,000 followers today, 'I have no apologies to offer the gentleman in the White House who lives on the rotten meat of broken promises.'"

But just how good are Coughlin's promises? It took him scarcely more than a week to break the pledge he took to abstain from intemperate speeches. And the President is only one man out of a multitude to whom the reverend ranter owes an explanation. It seems to me, for instance, that he owes a distinct apology to Old Doc Townsend and all the physician's followers. Booming "Priest" Charlie (since the lid seems to be off on the free coinage of epithets) went to Cleveland as one of the feature spellbinders. He certainly not only permitted but persuaded the revolving pensioners that he was heart and soul with them in their cause. His handpicked candidate, William Lemke, flatly announced himself as a convert to the Townsend plan, making only the slight and probably unnoticed reservation that the precise details would have to be ironed out by a congress composed of Union Party members and the Townsendite leaders themselves. When Gomer Smith told the delegates that the good father had previously referred to the Townsend scheme as "economic lunacy" he was shouted down as a prevaricator and a bearer of false tidings.

But in Buffalo, according to the same dispatch, Charlie under some pressure was forced to admit that he still believed the revolving pension plan to be "economic lunacy." His justification for his misrepresentations in Cleveland was simply that he and Dr. Townsend must fight together "to oust the New Deal from office." It may be that Charles E. Coughlin also deceived Gerald L. K. Smith. But even if that is so I would urge no apology upon the gentleman who is temporarily absent from his parish. If the priest can live by taking in the preacher, or vice-versa, I am quite satisfied provided the existence is a meager one.

Father Coughlin has mentioned Landon once or twice and even directed a mild and wholly polite rebuke toward Hearst, but it grows increasingly evident that during such passages Charlie winks the other eye. The radio ranter is most palpably playing politics. He is not sufficiently naïve to believe that Lemke can make a showing for himself. His whole intention in 1936 is to prove his nuisance value. It is entirely probable that Father Coughlin has no liking for Landon, even though he is trying his best to bring about his election. It would not surprise me to be told that Coughlin regards Townsend as a fool and Smith as a knave. Indeed I am quite ready to believe that he has a certain contempt for his own fuzzy followers and sees them as so much fascist fodder.

Coughlin has one faith and one alone. He has one favorite candidate and no other. He is pushing as rapidly as he can the political fortunes of a single individual. I may be wrong and so I should be reticent in bandying about the name of any good man. The most I am prepared to do is to hint in a sneaking way. My idea is that the proprietor of the Union Party is first and last and all the time for C-r-l-s E. C---hl-n. If any considerable pressure comes from the Vatican I will wager $10 against an autographed photograph of William Lemke that Coughlin will shed his collar and coat as readily as he did at the Cleveland conclave. Although he pays occasional lip service to the creed and the customs of his church it is merely a coincidence that Coughlin is a priest. He most certainly is not functioning in this campaign as a Catholic. If he were there could hardly be so complete a tie-up between him and the Reverend Mr. Smith, the bullfrog kleagle from Louisiana's mud flats.

Gentle Gerald told a Herald Tribune reporter: "There have been rumors lately of a break between Dr. Townsend, Father Coughlin, and me. I want to tell you that after Father Coughlin spoke at the Cleveland convention, I took his hand and said, 'Reverend Coughlin, though we die, we are going on until our people have been freed,' and he replied, 'Though we die.'"

"Now I telephoned this afternoon," he continued, "and told him about these rumors of division of councils and he replied to me, 'Gerald, though we die.' That was enough for me."

And I think it's enough, too. In fact, I think it's too much. To Gerald L. K. Smith he may be "Reverend Coughlin." To Lemke he stand as, "Yes, boss, anything you say." But there is no reason why the average voter should make any allowance for the cloth of either Charlie or Gerald. Their function as clerics is merely an afterthought. In verbal encounters they should be prepared to be treated with the same consideration shown to the President of the United States—and no more. And so I say without any intention of any apology at any time that Booming Charlie is not garbed in holy orders, that he is not in any true sense a cleric of the Catholic church, and that he is solely a fascist faker using whatever means come to his hand to lend dignity and cover to his effort to achieve literal dictatorship in the United States.

What Charles E. Coughlin is really looking for is a large white horse and somebody to give him a boost into the saddle. When he clasped hands and said, "Gerald, though we die," he was moving quite close to one of his objectives. However, it is generally considered the wrong way to approach a horse.

CHALLENGE TO ECONOMICS

BY LEWIS COREY

CAPITALIST economics has contributed little, if anything, to an understanding of the greatest depression in history. An economist here and there has made illuminating analyses of particular aspects of the problem, but these piecemeal analyses lack an inclusive theoretical and practical synthesis. The challenge of the economic crisis to capitalist economic theory has never been met. Nor is it met in what is perhaps the most pretentious effort to that end, the Brookings Institution's study on "The Distribution of Wealth and Income in Relation to Economic Progress," of which the fourth and final volume is now published.* Brookings brought to the task vast resources and the services of one of the most competent professional economists, Dr. Moulton; and that makes its failure all the more significant.

The problem is the inability of capitalism to use all its available forces of production and consumption. Brookings, therefore, devotes the first two volumes of its study to an investigation of unused productive capacity, and to consumption. According to "America's Capacity to Produce," there was, in the years 1922-29, an average unused capacity to produce goods and services of 22 per cent, and of 20 per cent in the most prosperous year 1929. (It was twice as great in the depression years 1933-34, and still greater in 1932.) According to "America's Capacity to Consume," the majority of our people during all the years of prosperity were living in poverty in the midst of unused capacity and consuming too little because of the lack of effective demand. This in turn involved an increasingly unequal distribution of the national income and the devotion of a constantly larger percentage of that income to investments. None of the Brookings conclusions is new, but the study provides a thorough statistical demonstration, especially of unused capacity. The two volumes are a definite contribution to quantitative economics.

The theoretical shortcomings of the study, however, appear clearly in the third volume, "The Formation of Capital," which attempts to give the "why" of unused capacity and deficient consumption and to provide support for the conclusions and proposals of the final volume. There is much acute criticism of orthodox economics in "The Formation of Capital," and its analysis of the role of commercial banking in the supply of investment capital is important. But it fails completely in its explanation of capitalist inability to use all the available forces of production and consumption.

For Dr. Moulton comes to the simple conclusion that since there exists an unused capacity to produce and unfulfilled desires to consume, all that is necessary is to let people consume more and put the unused capacity to use. As simple as all that! But is it possible under the relations of capitalist profit and accumulation? Dr. Moulton answers yes, and argues that periods of active consumption are precisely the periods of active capital formation, or accumulation. But the reverse is equally true: periods of active accumulation are (with rare but significant exceptions) periods of active consumption. The crucial problem is the relation of one to the other. Dr. Moulton insists on the priority of consumption, and concludes that capital-goods industries are not "the pivot around which the economic system moves." The exact opposite is the case, and the reasons may be thus briefly put:

1. Accumulation—the making of profits and their conversion into capital—is the economic law of motion of capitalist production.

2. Profits are converted into productive capital (upon which depend other forms of capital) by means of an increasing output and absorption of capital goods.

3. An increasing output of capital goods makes possible an increase in consumption by creating a strategic consumer purchasing power. Not one penny of the wages and salaries disbursed by capital-goods industries is spent on the output of those industries. They are all (except minor savings) spent on the output of consumers'-goods industries, whose enlarged activity in turn creates new purchasing power and consumption while the profits of that activity are transformed into new capital.

Purchasing power and consumption can increase only through economic expansion, and that expansion, as the history of capitalism makes clear, is determined by accumulation. But, and this is the basic contradiction of capitalist production, accumulation simultaneously limits consumption. Absolute expansion of markets is accompanied by relative limitation of markets, for it is the nature of capitalism to develop the productive forces of society beyond its profitable consuming power. This becomes involved with the existence of an unused capacity to produce—unused because its use is unprofitable—and with the tendency of the rate of profit to fall. The answer is still more accumulation: a still greater output of capital goods either in the form of labor-saving devices to cut costs (and raise profits) in old industries or of equipment for wholly new industries. Hence the increase in capital goods always outstrips the increase in consumers' goods. But this means that more capital and fewer workers are used in production; relative wages fall while capital claims and profits mount and absorb a larger share of the national income, diverting constantly more income to investment than to consumption. Relative overproduction of capital becomes absolute, further productive investment is unprofitable, and limited accumulation limits the consumer purchasing power created by an increasing output of capital goods. A crisis of accumulation sets in as the demand for new capital goods begins to decline, economic activity moves downward, and society is thrown into the abyss of depression.

Recovery begins in the revival of demand for capital goods: unpostponable replacements and more efficient equipment to produce at lower costs for restricted markets, or, most important, equipment for new industries. That calls into being a strategic and profitable consumer purchasing power. Revival of consumption-goods industries, independent of capital-goods activity, can call into being only a purchasing power that is unprofitable and destructive of accumulation because its end-product is merely more consumption. This is the brutal mandate of capitalist accumulation: the existing equipment to produce goods and services cannot be more fully used until it is profitable to add to that equipment. If capital cannot accumulate, people cannot consume. Consumption is a by-product of accumulation.

Dr. Moulton's emphasis on consumption involves an abstraction of the existing economic system from its capitalist relations. This appears in his comparison of capitalist accumulation with the primitive production which is (as under socialism on a higher level) directly for use. But the capitalist relations of profit and accumulation develop an antagonism between value and use value: consumption is permissible only if production is profitable. The abstraction, moreover, makes Dr. Moulton consider accumulation as essentially the formation of productive capital; hence "surplus capital," that is, capital that cannot find investment in productive enterprise, becomes the devil of the piece. But that "surplus" is also an accumulation of capital; whether exported or "dissipated," as Dr. Moulton laments, in speculation, it means accumulation in the form of foreign capital claims or speculative profits. To distribute the "surplus" as income to consumers means a deduction from profits (or from earnings of higher salaried employees). Unused capacity may be called into use, but unprofitably, and accumulation and the rate of profit may move disastrously downward. "Surplus capital" is an aggravation of capitalist economic crisis, not its cause—which is accumulation itself.

The defects of Dr. Moulton's theory of accumulation are pitifully revealed in the conclusions and proposals of "Income and Economic Progress." For he offers merely another form of the theory underlying the "policy of high wages" (exploded during the 1920-30's); more consumption is the key to prosperity everlasting, for more consumption means more production, profits, and formation of capital. But Dr. Moulton rejects higher wages as contrary to the needs of profit. He urges "the method of expanding markets through a persistent reduction of prices as efficiency increases," and curiously forgets that this, too, may be contrary to the needs of profit. He laments that the policy of price reduction "has in considerable measure ceased to operate," and writes nos-

At a time when so much pseudo-science upon the subject of birth control is being foisted upon the public, this book, by a recognized British authority, and highly endorsed by the medical profession here and abroad, is trebly valuable.

The leading medical publication of this country (The JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION) comments as follows on this volume:

CONTENTS

The Meaning of Birth Control
The Sociological Factor
The General Principles of Contraception
Methods of Contraception
Methods of the Future
Objections to Birth Control
The Propaganda of Birth Control
Birth-Control Clinics
The Birth-Control International Information Centre
O.K. Theory: A Survey of Fact and Fancy
Names and Addresses of Manufacturers and Retailers of Contraceptives List of Birth-Control Clinics in the United States
Glossary

"One of the best books on this subject that has yet appeared. The author has a thorough command of the subject and obviously has devoted much careful thought to the preparation of this volume. The subject matter is well arranged and it is presented with a degree of lucidity that may well serve as a model for other writers on medical subjects."

"The anatomical descriptions are lucid and the contraceptive methods sound and described so minutely that there can be no possibility of a mistake."
—ST. BART'S HOSPITAL JOURNAL.

"It gives very clearly and completely, with all the decency of a scientific textbook, exactly what is clearly known and what is not clearly established about preventive methods . . . This is knowledge that I think every adult in a civilized community ought to possess . . ."

"When the adult citizen has gone through these pages he or she will know exactly the physical factors of the modern sexual problem. He or she will have all the mastery of his or her sexual self that knowledge can give."

—H. G. WELLS, in the Preface to this volume.

"The author is a medical man who has successfully performed a difficult task; he has written a book which satisfies the requirements both of the lay reader who seeks guidance in the conduct of the intimate affairs of his own life, and of the doctor who desires information on how to advise his patients. Of the many books written on the practical problems of birth control, this is likely to be the most serviceable to medical readers."

taligally of the 1870-90's when prices fell as efficiency rose. But that prevented neither the existence of unused capacity nor the coming of two catastrophic depressions. Moreover, the period's economic progress was determined by active accumulation resulting from mechanization of old industries and creation of new industries, not by the falling prices, which are to be regarded simply as an expression of the former.

In spite of sharp criticisms of many of its assumptions, Dr. Moulton accepts the logic of price economics which considers price the "regulator" of the productive system. But price must justify itself in terms of making profits and converting them into capital. Hence Dr. Moulton's proposal to abolish unused capacity by the simple method of lowering prices and increasing consumption is all too simple, for it may be unprofitable.

But if Dr. Moulton is right, and price reductions mean higher profits, what becomes of his proposal for more equal distribution of income to abolish unused capacity and prevent cyclical breakdowns? If profits rise, so does the concentration of income: we are back at the beginning, only worse. Dr. Moulton's cure is friendly to the disease.

Doubts, however, assail Dr. Moulton, for he says:

Even if profits should not actually increase, a contribution is nevertheless being made through the expansion of wealth production toward raising the level of material well-being—which is the ultimate purpose of an economic system.

Again Dr. Moulton is guilty of abstracting the existing economic system from its capitalist relations. Where are the businessmen who will sacrifice profits to the material well-being of the people? Moreover, the existence of the system is involved: to release the abundance industry is now capable of creating would endanger profits and capitalism itself. The high development of the productive forces limits capital accumulation and strengthens the downward pressure on the rate of profit. This is the crisis of capitalism: the maturity of its economic development means decline and decay because it limits accumulation.

After his swing from liberal consumption economics to orthodox price economics, the eclectic Dr. Moulton swings to the "ideal" laissez-faire economics of the textbooks, and laments the interference of monopoly with the competitive price system—an interference which he considers "an abuse" of capitalism. Yet monopoly is a logical result of the earlier competitive capitalism; it was in the 1870-80's, when Dr. Moulton's prescription of falling prices was working, that monopoly arose to protect profits against the competitive price system.

The Brookings study is essentially unscientific in that it rejects the evolutionary approach by deliberately limiting itself to an "eternal" capitalism. Hence it does not analyze economic forces as they move beyond capitalism. It sees in monopoly, for example, merely a "deviation" instead of an evolutionary transformation, in its economic collectivism, toward the new order of socialism. There is not, moreover, a single reference to Marx, the one economist who offers a scientific answer to the present challenge to economics.

GUNNAR'S DAUGHTER. By Sigrid Undset. Translated from the Norwegian by Arthur G. Chater. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THE first of these novels is so continually bright as to be eventually dull. It labors with such brilliant success to avoid telling a story that by the four-hundredth page its most forgiving reader will be as ready as the author is to let the promised fable swing free of any further human attention. A Dane is supposed to be speaking, one Espen Arnakke of Jante, who murdered a man seventeen years ago and who begins by saying, "Now I shall tell everything." Such a situation has its obvious merits as material for fiction, but it soon appears that Espen is not to be obvious. Starting off with the credible theory that childhood is not a happy time for anyone, he devotes the majority of his pages to a demonstration of his own youthful misery in Jante, and implies that when we have heard all we shall know why he killed John Wakefield. Not that there is any direct connection between Jante and Wakefield, or between his childhood and the event he cannot forget. No, it is merely that life being what it is, at least for him, he had to beat Wakefield over the head—if that was the way he did him to death, for I think Sandemose is not clear on the point further than to remark how much blood the fellow had in him. There was a girl, it seems, named Eve, and Eve—but it was not jealousy, it was not revenge for Wakefield's having taken Eve away from him. Once he had thought so, but it was not anything as comprehensible as that. It was something indeed quite vast and vague, something as limitless as life itself, and a monologue of more than four hundred pages is necessary to bring order out of time's chaos.

The monologue, to repeat, is frequently very clever. It follows no subject longer than a page or two, and when it jumps to another one it is likely to jump far. It rides symbols like hobby-horses; nothing in Jante or elsewhere is ever quite what we should suppose it to have been, and Sandemose is undoubtedly efficient at finding something else for it to be. There is even a sort of fierceness about the way he sweats in every sentence to be intimate, abrupt, and startling, as if he were setting off firecrackers in our heads. Now and then they do go off, or at any rate this initial paragraph of a certain chapter went off for me—by itself, to be sure, since it had little bearing on the story:

The horse is the most curious creature in the world. It is a great strong wildness lacking arms. Looking upon the horse when I was very young, I was moved to pity for such a huge block of flesh propped up on four posts, in such a way that it could do no more than move itself about. I was most bitterly anxious that the horse should have arms sprouting from its shoulders, and to this day I am still sensitive of this lack. Such a little shaver to have caught the idea of the centaur!

But many of Sandemose's bombs explode in his own hand when they explode at all. Nor do I find that he renders a significant or a convincing account of one man's childhood. This is partly because his purpose is so palpably to work up a case again Jante as the real murderer of John Wakefield, and partly because he obscures what he has to say with such a mist of tricks. Good novels are duller than this in those places where dullness has its contribution to make; and they are written by persons who have the humility always to be clear.

Sigrid Undset's foreword to "A Fugitive" praises it chiefly as a tract against the modern village, though she adds a phrase about its "genius and weird power." It has of course nothing like the power of even a slight tale like "Gunnar's Daughter," which takes its place among her minor works but shines there with a firm and natural light. As she tells the story of how the lovers, Vigdis and Viga-Ljot, destroyed each other in their pride she seems to be entirely ignorant that there are such things in writing as tricks. This happened, then that; and such and such things were said quite in the order imposed by impartial time. By the end, however, a definite and distinguished tragedy has taken shape and half a dozen persons have lived lives which were both individual and intelligible. How one tells such a story is probably not to be known except by those who can do it; and they do not talk to their readers. Sigrid Undset probably could not enumerate the measures she took to keep her feud from being squalid or her lovers from being pettish. Everything manages to be large in her story, no single word of which escapes from her hysterically or self-consciously. The reason must be that she is a novelist; that she is content to write in the tradition of novelists; and that what she has to say she knows how to say in terms of events which appear to have nothing whatever to do with herself.

MARK VAN DOREN

Blueprints for an Economy

THE MODERN ECONOMY IN ACTION. By Caroline F. Ware and Gardiner C. Means. Harcourt, Brace, and Company. $1.60.

THE central thesis of this book is that the old, automatic, self-adjusting competitive economy has given place to a new type of economic system, calling for analysis in totally different terms, and posing entirely new problems. Essentially, the impersonal rule of the market has given place to the highly personal rule of the administrator or business executive.

In consequence, instead of the agreeable harmonies of the economic textbooks we have a series of extremely ugly discords. Prices become inflexible, so that declining demand in any industry tends to be met, not by price reductions which expand the consumers' purchasing power, but by a curtailment of production programs. This, of course, means unemployment and further reduction of purchasing power, causing fresh shrinkage in wider and wider markets. Again, the pretty picture of the board of directors of a corporation directing the policy of the business so as to provide good profits for investors by good service to an ever-growing body of consumers looks a bit silly when one considers what are the real relations today between the humble stockholders and the management whose master that stockholder is supposed to be. And as for the smooth flow of saving into constructive capital creation, or the delicate gearing of international trade through a universal self-regulating gold standard—well, such a picture could be convincing today only to one who had never heard of the stock markets and had never attempted to buy, sell, or travel outside his own country.

Gradually, the main lines of this analysis are becoming familiar even to professional economists. It is, therefore, to the authors' proposals for remedies, rather than to their diagnosis, that the reader will look particularly for original thinking. Here the chief measures proposed are the regulation of monetary policy in the interests of price stabilization (alternative objectives, such as stability of consumers' money income are not discussed); the balancing of savings and investment by a program of public works and of payments to the unemployed, financed by loans; and the control of industrial policy by a mixed bag of measures such as extension of government ownership, or of government control without ownership, together with better representation of labor and consumer interests. To these are appended a rather hazily sketched plan for regulation of international trades, and an all-round scheme of social security. Few progressive economists will quarrel much with this. On two points, however, it does appear that the authors have walked quickly around a major difficulty.

The first relates to their optimism about the usefulness of strengthening the power of labor in industrial government, as a means of converting the present restrictive tendencies into expansionist policies. Of course, it is true that labor, as a whole, wants the industrial machine to work at full capacity with maximum employment. But in that respect the interest of labor as a whole and of employers as a whole are identical. Yet sections of employers are continually promoting restrictive schemes in their own industries. The reason is that in our type of economic system the sum of the parts is never equal to the whole. And this, in the last resort, is true of labor also. Ultimately the interest of every man is against that of his neighbor. Restrictive policies mean to the employer good prices and good profits at the expense of the public, and of all his own actual or potential competitors; and to the employed worker they offer an exactly similar chance—a relatively comfortable berth for himself, again at the expense of the public, and of his own out-of-work comrade. This, which I have elsewhere described as the "centrifugal" force of all capitalist society, may just as likely be aggravated as moderated by the explicit representation of labor interests in the making of industrial policy.

The second point at which fundamental issues appear to be evaded is in the chapter on the necessity of a general economic planning. The dangers of sectional planning, as being likely often to make things worse rather than better, are properly emphasized. But the measures by which it is hoped to make a real general plan effective (that is, a plan which would attempt to estimate consumers' needs on the one hand as against the resources available for satisfying those needs on the other) look weak indeed beside the sectional interests that must be arrayed against anything of the kind. Inevitably, it is to the American farmer's interest to make food scarce and dear, although any general plan would immediately show that a large proportion of the American public do not eat enough to keep themselves well. The only really powerful instrument that our authors suggest for bridging this gulf of interest is payment of subsidies—which, when made general, opens up a truly alarming prospect. The implicit fundamental issue, whether general planning can have any meaning apart from general socialization, is not so much as posed anywhere. When all is said, however, the Means-Ware analysis deserves to find a wide public and if at points the authors have not done more than spur themselves and others to fresh thinking, in view of the difficulty of the task in hand, we still have reason enough to be grateful.

BARBARA WOOTTON

The World in Celluloid

TWO WORLDS. By Lester Cohen. Covici-Friede. $3.50.

THERE is in this book, as there has been in half a dozen American motion pictures, an almost frightening forevision of what lies in store for the world when Hollywood forsakes love and goes in for life. Mr. Cohen left a scenarist's office in Hollywood, he explains, to seek "the beauty and the wonder of the world." He knew little "of the millions of people on this earth, living in the many countries, languishing or flourishing in the different cultures, civilizations, economic systems."

His search for the world took him completely around it, and ended in the conviction that he had seen two worlds—communism and capitalism. Everything he saw was geared one way or the other, the old lines were gone, and everyone belonged to one or the other of these two worlds. But the racing account he has given of his search, told entirely in the present tense with pace and gusto, states this theme only in its final paragraph. The rest of it is as impersonal, as undeliberate, as entertaining, as the diary of a man who has been on a long roller-coaster ride.

The book is quick and easy reading; it is itself a motion picture. It has the casting director's unerring eye for type. It has fine, unblurred focus on the faces of things and people except, as in a film, when a transition requires the running dissolve with the images made dim and fuzzy. It has sex—in Paris and Cairo, Jericho and Jerusalem, Mr. Cohen investigated the local night life in the purified spirit of good, clean fun to which Mr. Hays has converted the motion-picture industry.

More important, Mr. Cohen writes with the same strange naivete, the same child-like objectivity of the motion pictures. It is reporting so naked that much of it is without meaning. The author tries to be fair by being guileless, and lack of guile, when the world and war and revolution are concerned, can be simulated most easily by lack of knowledge.

So Mr. Cohen asked a pilgrim from Damascus if Egypt administered the Sudan. No, he was told, England did. Well, if the Egyptians ruled the Sudan, would they be any happier? Yes, said the Egyptian, they would. And so it goes. Through the Soviet Union, through Jerusalem and the Near East, through India, China, and Japan, Mr. Cohen traveled with a camera eye. Not once does he stop in his story of the trip to suggest that this is life he is describing, something important to the people who live it and, most of all, to himself. It is a travelogue through ideas and people instead of statues and scenery, but it remains faithful, even to the occasional wisecracks, to the traditions of the travelogue.

Cameramen who are most precise and painstaking with their foregrounds blur what lies behind to sharpen the etched quality of the camera focus. In "Two Worlds" a sort of synthetic history of the world serves to fill in the dimensions which the foreground lacks.

"Ah, once it was Merrie England," Mr. Cohen writes, "and its wenches were Nell and Becky and Moll, and its men raised hell at Runnymede and whacked out a Bill of Rights and be-headed kings and kicked out parliaments and sailed the unknown seas and conquered new domains and made the greatest drama since Greece and the greatest poetry the world has ever known, and in little London town, on the seat of fire and plague, made an octopus-empire, with tentacles flapping out over the globe, holding the far peoples fast and conquering them with fire and the sword and making them dig up and give over the wealth and spice of their land . . .".

It is at least something for a successful writer from Hollywood to have discovered that it is no longer Merrie England. Mr. Cohen did more. He went back to a little town near Minsk and talked to his father's cousins about life in a new society. Everywhere he went, he noticed faces and smells and ideas and, most of all, sounds. Phrases in pidgin English come alive on his pages like faces in a well-directed Hollywood mob scene. It may be asking for the moon to wish that, unlike the motion pictures, he had named the meaning to himself of the things he saw and heard, or hinted that some of them may have bent or changed the camera lens itself.

JOSEPH BARNES

Despair over the Constitution

WHOSE CONSTITUTION? By Henry A. Wallace. Reynal and Hitchcock. $1.75.

STORM OVER THE CONSTITUTION. By Irving Brant. With an introduction by Henry A. Wallace. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.

SECRETARY WALLACE'S is a very human book. It exudes warmth and good-will toward all men, and a special sympathy for the small man and the underdog. This sympathy is very genuine and has an engaging quality which captures the reader and carries him along. Common sense also abounds which should have a great appeal to the "general reader" for whom the book is intended. If the book contained nothing else, only praise should be its meed, but unfortunately it has larger pretensions, with the result that its merits are largely offset, if not entirely nullified, by its very grave defects. Mr. Wallace discourses at large on economics, constitutional law, and history, with a Sermon on the Mount thrown in, but the only qualification he brings to the task is that of a preacher. He is neither economist, jurist, nor historian.

The question contained in the title is never answered, or at least not in any meaningful way. And the more important question, what to do about the Constitution, is answered in a way that cannot but be injurious to the people whose cause Mr. Wallace undertakes to plead. He shows how the Constitution has been interpreted by the Supreme Court to aid in the domination of the people by large aggregations of capital. But this only leads him to the remarkable conclusion that the people cannot, and ought not, do anything about it except hope for the appointment of liberal Supreme Court justices by good presidents—surely a disheartening conclusion for those who have been undergoing untold suffering during the last few years. Of course, had Mr. Wallace's conclusions been based on sound facts and logical argumentation the bitter truth would be better than the raising of false hopes. But he reaches his conclusions by way of fallacious arguments based on false premises.

It is impossible here to discuss all the bad economics, jurisprudence, and history stated, or tacitly assumed, in the book. A few examples must suffice. The author's history is quite at fault when he says:

It is true that the commercial classes, under the new constitution, got the jump on the agriculturists in obtaining powers from the government. Interpreted liberally, the clauses that allowed Congress to lay duties and to regulate foreign and interstate commerce were to become the grounds for the protective tariff. Freedom of capital enterprise to expand indefinitely was to be facilitated by the protection of property rights under various provisions, even the interstate commerce clause.

This is almost the exact reverse of historical truth. Such gains as accrued to the "commercial classes" were not due to anything contained in the Constitution itself by way of special protection of property rights, but from the mere fact of the formation of the "more perfect union" which of necessity turned over the regulation of commerce to the national government. Nor is it true that the Constitution contains "various provisions" for the protection of property rights. The only such provision was the clause against "the impairment of obligation of contracts," which was only a curb upon state action and instead of "facilitating" the expansion of capital enterprise, actually hampers it, as I have had occasion to prove elsewhere.

Turning from history to economics one is at a loss to discover Mr. Wallace's views on the basic problems of economics. Like all "moderates," though he has much to say on both sides of every subject, he is really for the status quo. There are passages in the book which would lead one to believe that Mr. Wallace thinks there is something about our economic system itself which brings about crises and depressions. But these vague statements are completely offset by his reiterated assertion that our present depression is the result of the World War. It is not Mr. Wallace's bad history, but rather his bad economics that leads him to his counsel of despair. For his hopes are really the result of his despair of doing anything about our political system without upsetting our economic order.

Coming at last to his jurisprudence, the author lays down the law as follows:

Most lawyers and historians believe that the power (of judicial review) is implied in Article III, Section 2 of the Constitution, and that Marshall, in the famous Marbury case, did no more than state the irrefutable logic of the implication.

This is as nearly the exact reverse of the true situation as a statement of opinion can ever be said to be. No legal historian of any standing now defends the Marshall doctrine and the best of them have shot it to pieces with their criticisms. Logically untenable when it was made in 1803, since then rendered ridiculous by the course of history, Marshall's thesis that any federal system as such necessarily implies the power of judicial review, has been abandoned for at least fifty years, and is now resuscitated by Mr. Wallace only in order to justify the conclusion of his book.

Mr. Brant's book contrasts favorably with Mr. Wallace's in all respects except the conclusion which turns out to be the same as the Secretary's and is in even greater contradiction to the material that precedes it. The author is a past-master of his subject and if he had but left out the last few pages I would be ready to throw my cap in the air and shout for joy, for few books have given me such pleasure in recent years. But the lame conclusion, which one comes upon with a gasp of surprise, has a depressing effect. Mr. Brant shows how the Supreme Court, by all kinds of illogical devices and dodges has whittled down the powers granted to the federal government by the framers of the Constitution. In support of this thesis the author has marshalled an array of facts, the ripe fruit of an erudition rare in constitutional scholars and illumined by the play of an intellect even rarer.

This makes the lamentable conclusion of the book little less than tragic. Amendment of the Constitution to enlarge the powers of Congress Mr. Brant rejects as a means of dealing with the situation brought about by the Court's bitter resistance to the changing economic order. His reason is that as long as the Court retains the power to declare laws unconstitutional no amendment as to the powers of other branches of the government would be of any avail. The inevitable conclusion of his rejection of relief by amendment is that there must be sufficient means in the Constitution as it stands to remedy the situation—unless, indeed, we should despair of any remedy. But here Mr. Brant proceeds to accept Mr. Wallace's counsel of despair. His conclusion is based on the alleged fact that in the long run the justices of the Supreme Court correctly represent the views of the Presidents who have appointed

Literary Cartoons

PEOPLE ARE FASCINATING. By Sally Benson. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

THE FIVE-MINUTE GIRL AND OTHER STORIES. By Mary Hastings Bradley. Appleton-Century. $2.50.

MOST of the stories in Mrs. Benson's volume have appeared previously in the New Yorker. They are brief satirical sketches of the sort of ridiculous women whom Helen Hokinson and her colleagues have made familiar. They form, like the opera, a hybrid genre best described as the literary cartoon. The characters are poor sillies who expose their shallowness, vanity, hypocrisy, and self-deception through their untiring indulgence in hopelessly trivial conversation and gauche attitudes. Pencil portraits of this kind are usually described as witty and sophisticated, written, as the blurb would convince us, with "quiet malice and shrewd venom." But this impression, which escapes revision when the sketches are separated by periodical publication, seems unjust when the collection is read at a sitting.

Read as a group (there are over sixty in this book) they are seen as mechanical reiterations of a clever formula. The wit has become trickery, the sophistication synthetic; the tired reader calls for a caricaturist with a new brush. This is also true of Mrs. Bradley's stories, several of which are concerned with the psychic contact between the dancers on the floor and the privileged pickers on the stag line. In the title story, Judy's life revolves around the question of her popularity at a coming-out party. Her ambition is to be a five-minute girl, who will be tapped by twelve partners every hour. This story, which was included in the O. Henry Memorial Award Book of prize short stories, is a moderately successful portrait of distorted values in debutante circles. But when the theme is reasserted in "Show Window" and when it becomes clear that the life of no character will rise to a higher level of complexity, we are driven to the difficult conclusion that Mrs. Bradley's imaginative life is confined to the skin-deep.

SAMUEL SILLEN

ART

"HOW I envy you the pleasure you have in dashing off those little poems in your spare hours!" said one of the Rothschilds to Heinrich Heine. Doubtless it is to the poet that we are indebted for preserving the remark; it needed Heine's self-consciousness, his love and his anger, to seize the gem and press it into his forehead.

Contemporaries—and peers—of Heine are shown us in profusion at the Metropolitan Museum's exhibition of "Romanticism in Prints," the "small" works which Baron de Rothschild would have thought the artists did in their spare time. At the Museum of Modern Art is a no-less remarkable showing of éditions de luxe illustrated by original etchings, lithographs, and wood engravings. If we are occasionally tempted to view our time with discouragement surely there is reason to take heart again at the wealth of talent that is here assembled. It is furthermore significant that publishers and artists are willing to make the venture represented by these costly volumes, and that an American city has created a museum to house the production of these men while they are still living.

It is with new pride that we realize that all the prints here are drawn from the collection of the museum itself—as are the graphic masterpieces of all periods which fill an adjoining gallery. One might have thought it necessary to visit the cabinets of Berlin or Dresden to see those contemporaries of Heine who were also his compatriots (Hitler permitting)—Ludwig Richter, Rethel, Lucas, and Caspar David Friedrich. If they are not of the stature of Heine himself or of the German romanticists of music, it must be a snobbish visitor indeed who would refuse to take delight in their visions of childhood, of rustic scenery, and of lovers. Admitting that the names I have mentioned grow pale beside those of Dürer and Holbein, the same devotion to craftsmanship is here, and with it a specifically German quality, kindly in its very excess of sentiment, which it is well to have recalled to us today.

The English also are represented by an admirable group of men too little known, even in the case of Bonington, whose extraordinary talent needed less than the twenty-seven years of his life to become an influence on the giants of France. And here are members of the landscape school which, if it produced painters of world-fame like Constable and Turner, had a Girtin and a Cozens too, and many another of charming quality, to whom one returns with apologies that the words "minor artist" were ever spoken in a patronizing tone.

But, after all, contact with art demands discrimination between lesser and greater things. When one reaches Delacroix in this exhibition, one understands why Renoir called him the greatest artist of France—and our glorious contemporary was not forgetting Poussin and Watteau. With Géricault, it is nothing less than the thunder of Michelangelo that rumbles again. To have displayed in full the immensity achieved by French romanticism, the museum would have needed to draw on its treasures of Barye and Corot; perhaps it was a conscious reticence which prevented that, perhaps a desire to give the space to such pictures by less-known men as Gigoux, whose "Clair Obscur," you will find captivating.

But find it—which is to say, go to the show: one day when I was there—a hot day, to be sure, but both exhibitions last until September—I was the only visitor in the gallery. That seems to speak ill for New York. Surely we do not want to play the Rothschild, and treat these prints as the pleasant diversions of leisure. Otherwise we shall merit such scorn as that of Degas—so much like Heine in his pitiless search for the right line—who echoed the mocking laugh of the German poet in the remark he made when told that his "Danseuses à la Barre" (now in the Metropolitan) had brought nearly half a million francs at auction. "Yes," he said, "I am the horse that wins the grand prix." He was not bitter that the money went to the owner of the horse (he had sold the picture for a tiny fraction of the price, years before). He was not bitter at all. How could he be, after eighty years as an artist? He merely had his little joke about the people who had missed the sport of kings. The Pierpont Morgans, the Altmans, the Havemeyers, all come to see it as that, sooner or later. But the artists—and a few other art-lovers—enjoy it all their lives.

FIGHTING THE DROUGHT

Dear Sirs: Your editorial in the issue of July 11 on the subject of Drought in the Prairie States is misleading to say the least.

Having lived in Central Nebraska for over fifty years, I realize that the drought of 1934 and the present drought of 1936 are something new. These droughts are greater in extent and are characterized by hot spells of longer duration than those of the late eighties and early nineties.

The proposal of the late Elwood Mead to evacuate a large proportion of arid land farmers and resettle them on land where they could make a living is common sense. As a matter of fact, however, the removal of less than 200,000 families would vacate all of the lands which can strictly be classified as marginal lands, whereas the late droughts cover the states of Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Wyoming, Montana, parts of Minnesota and Iowa, a territory affecting some 6,000,000 people. It is obvious that moving out the affected people is not the solution.

For the past fifty years, under the system of rugged individualism, without plan or leadership, the tendency has been to drain off the rainfall. Large areas of sloughs and swamps have been drained. During the road-building period in the past fifteen years, the road-building engineers have looked well to the drainage phase. As a result our rains have been drained off by the quickest possible routes. Histories will show that in other parts of the world men have made deserts by substantially the same processes we have been following. In 1934 the Administration undertook on a small scale the construction of dams on farms. Engineers in charge of this work were generally in agreement that their activities were fruitful and deplored the fact that such work was not more extensive. A right-about-face involving the storage of water at every possible point together with the terracing of land is the solution. If any criticism is due the Administration it is that activity in this line has been too meager.

It may be of interest to you to know that in 1934, fields that were irrigated and had plenty of moisture failed or partly failed. The devastating agency is not only drought but the heat which destroys plant production if it comes at a critical time of pollenization. If there is any solution to the heat phase it is stored water which serves to cool the air.

M. E. POYER

Grand Island, Neb., July 14

[We have no difference with our correspondent worth quarreling about. We share his view that everything practicable should be done to prevent the catastrophic run-off of rains not only in the arid regions but throughout the country. What we hope for—and fear we will not get in a Presidential year—is just as systematic, continuous, and rational grappling with the problems of the high prairie as we have in the TVA. We do not accept our correspondent's theory that the drought itself is the result of man's action, or that man's action will materially affect the alternation of dry periods and wet. We call his attention to the fact that there is an unprecedented drought also in the Southeastern states, where nothing new is imputable to man's action. What we need is a policy that aims at the best possible adaptation of economic life to a physical situation we cannot materially modify.—Editors The Nation.]

THE SOVIET CONSTITUTION

Dear Sirs: The Nation's comments, in the issue of June 17, on the new Soviet constitution tempt me to charge its editors with the most heinous crime in the intellectual calendar—they argue undialectically. Translated, that means, in this context, that they ignore considerations of time and space.

For instance, they seem to regret that the new constitution abolishes occupational representation and introduces geographical representation. Occupational representation (voting by factories, offices, and so on), was the basis of the Soviet system. It enabled the workers to predominate in government councils. When the workers were the only loyal class this was essential. But time has canceled this necessity. The presumption of the new constitution is that the whole nation is loyal. I think this is the fact.

The proletariat no longer need to have a monopoly of control to insure against the hostile pressure of the peasants or the indifference and occasional sabotage of the intelligentsia. Why then retain what may yet be required in other countries but has lost its usefulness in the U.S.S.R.? You seem to be worried that the bolsheviks are not taking sufficient care of the revolution.

A second example of time-less thinking is the suggestion that I am guilty of "a most un-Marxian statement" when I declare that the Soviet "government cannot disappear . . . perhaps . . . the party will." To be Marxian is to be realistic. Some day the Soviet government may wither away. But not tomorrow. It is good socialist theory but it is not practical to speak of the disappearance of the Soviet state. One of the ultimate implications of the new democracy, however, is the disappearance of the present Communist Party of the Soviet Union. That does not signify that the government stays on forever. It may die too. But if anything goes first it will be the party. This is nothing to be frightened about. The Soviet Union is not America or France or Spain. It has had its revolution. What is applicable to it is not applicable elsewhere.

Then, finally, you discover a terrible inconsistency in my article on the constitution. "In one place," you write, "Mr. Fischer declares that a dictatorship exists whenever there are several classes; in another he speaks of a bloc of democratic, anti-Fascist states—which includes the U.S.S.R., England, France, and Czecho-Slovakia." The contradiction you see is this—there are several classes in England. Therefore England is a dictatorship. Yet I say England is democratic. It is important here, as elsewhere, for political thinkers to distinguish carefully between two things that bear the same name. In England, the capitalist class dictates. Yet the people enjoy many democratic rights. In France, the capitalist class dictates. But a Socialist cabinet is in office. Its effectiveness is limited, but it has already achieved much. Are the dictatorships of England and France different from the German? Of course they are. The German dictatorship precludes all democratic forms and privileges. The French, British, and Czech systems do not. That is occasionally reflected in their foreign policies, and it was with reference to foreign policy that I made the statement which The Nation misunderstood. The Soviet example is a further illustration that dictatorship and democracy are not mutually exclusive. You, in fact, say in your editorial that the "Soviet system has always contained more genuine democracy than outsiders have realized." Correct. Yet it was a dictatorship. The new constitution narrows the dictatorship and broadens the democracy. That will strengthen the entente with democratic France. Democracy in Russia was not unrelated to the United front in France. A socialist government in France facilitates the rapprochement with socialist Russia. If, in addition, there were a clearer realization in England of the intimate connection between domestic and foreign policies there might result a strong democratic, anti-fascist front which could ensure peace to Europe. That is what I said in my article.

TERROR IN CALIFORNIA

Dear Sirs: Terror against the striking citrus pickers of Orange County, California, by police vigilantes and 500 deputies ordered by Sheriff Jackson to shoot to kill has been intensified. The growers are becoming frantic at the heroic resistance of the strikers. They are attempting to starve the strikers into submission. There is desperate need of assistance. Funds for strike relief and for the defense committee should be sent in care of the Non-Partisan Labor Defense, Room 321, 124 Sixth Street.

HARVARD REBELS

Dear Sirs: Your editorial in the issue of June 10 on the failure of Harvard University to nominate a candidate for an honorary degree from the Soviet Union fails in quite characteristic fashion to include the possibility that none was available. I should like very much for you to suggest a Russian scientist, now living within the Soviet Union, of equal scientific achievement and academic standing to those on Harvard's list. If Pavlov were alive—but who else?

SAUL WERNER

New York, July 2

Dear Sirs: Your editorial comment in The Nation of June 10 intimates that Harvard University has not invited any of the universities or scholars of the Soviet Union to its Tercentenary celebrations. Actually I find that six institutions of learning in the U.S.S.R. were invited to send delegates to Harvard, and, if you so desire, I can furnish you with their names. Professor Pavlov was also invited to receive an honorary degree at Harvard, but unfortunately died in the meantime.

WM. O. FIELD, JR.

New York, July 5

[In our issue of June 10, we noted that Harvard had not seen fit to choose a Soviet scholar as a recipient for any one of the sixty honorary degrees which the University will confer at its tercentenary celebrations. We are glad to have Mr. Field's information that Harvard did invite the Soviet Union to be represented by six delegates, although we believe that the attempt to promote cultural relations between the two countries would have been greatly enhanced if Harvard had taken the further step of including one or more Soviet scientists in its list of those receiving honorary degrees. In the case of Mr. Werner, who apparently believes that there is no Russian worthy of a Harvard degree, the editors are given that rare and pleasant opportunity to educate a reader. We are delighted to comply with Mr. Werner's request that we suggest a deserving Soviet scientist; and in fact we will go farther and suggest seven: A. F. Joffe, physicist; O. Y. Schmidt, who led the far-famed expedition to the Arctic; N. I. Bukharin, sociologist; V. V. Ossinsky, economist; Deborin, philosopher; all members of the Academy, and Professors A. D. Speransky, and A. P. Pinkevitch, physiologist and educator respectively.—Editors The Nation.]

CONTRIBUTORS

BENJAMIN STOLBERG, one of the country's leading free-lance journalists, contributes to this issue another of his vivid biographical studies of significant Americans. Previous articles portrayed Huey Long and Governor Talmadge, and more recently Mr. Stolberg wrote "The Jew and the World," which evoked a highly controversial response from our readers. With Warren Vinton, Mr. Stolberg is co-author of "The Economic Consequences of the New Deal."

LOUIS F. GITTLER is an American who has spent the past year in Berlin gathering material for a series of sketches of life in the Third Reich and for a study of the Nazi propaganda technique.

JAMES RORTY concludes in this issue his series on medical politics in the United States. Formerly an advertising man, Mr. Rorty wrote the inside story of advertising in his book, "Our Master's Voice." He is the author also of "Where Life is Better," the record of an unsentimental journey across America.

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism," "The House of Morgan," and "The Crisis of the Middle Class." Chapters from the latter book appeared originally as a series in The Nation.

LOUIS B. BOUDIN, member of the United States Supreme Court bar, is a labor lawyer whose book, "Government by Judiciary," represents one of the most original and important of recent studies in the field of constitutional law.

JOSEPH BARNES, now on the editorial staff of the Herald Tribune, worked for two years in the Soviet Union; he later became Secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, in which capacity he traveled widely in the Far East.

BARBARA WOOTTON is an English economist whose recent book, "Plan or No Plan," has evoked wide interest among advocates of economic planning.

SAMUEL SILLEN is a member of the English faculty of New York University, Washington Square Branch, and has contributed reviews to various journals.

WALTER PACH, painter and art critic, is author of "The Masters of Modern Art," "Ananias, or the False Artist," and a critical study of Vincent Van Gogh.

HUGO GELLERT is a well known illustrator who has contributed to the New Yorker, the New Masses, and other periodicals. Among his best known work is a book of lithographs illustrating excerpts from "Das Kapital."

IN THE MIDST OF CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN AND the ominous rumbles of a general European conflict arising out of it, the amenities of the national campaign go on. Colonel Knox delivered his acceptance speech amidst a fanfare and splendor that no vice-presidential candidate has ever been accorded but while the setting was elaborate the phrases "free enterprise," "regimentation," and "honest government" were slightly frayed. All that the Colonel contributed to the gaiety of the campaign was a soldierly demeanor and military gestures that just escaped being comic. The new experiment of the Democrats in having six governors answer Mr. Landon was no great success: the implication that it took six Democrats to add up to Mr. Landon's stature was unfortunate strategy. But the radio speech of Secretary Ickes more than retrieved the lost ground. It was shrewd, acid, and devastating without once being pitched to the usual campaign tone of a steam calliope. There is no one in the country who is a more authentic "practical progressive" than Mr. Ickes and no one better than he could have been chosen to answer the Landon claim to the same designation. Both men were part of T. R.'s Bull Moose following in 1912; both have been associated with oil, one as an independent operator and the other as a national administrator. Secretary Ickes's revelation of how Governor Landon in 1933 called for a national dictatorship over oil should prove embarrassing to the Republicans in their attempts to dub Mr. Roosevelt a tyrant. It has become increasingly clear that Landon's strategy is to pose as a progressive while allaying all fears that he will do anything to control business. In one respect the Landon speech was completely successful. The Governor made it clear that big business had nothing to fear from him. From now on there should be an unremitting flow of campaign funds into the Republican treasury.

IN LABOR UNIONS, AS IN NATIONS, THE reactionary puts up the narrow and technical bars of constitutionalism to hold back the onrushing forces of progress. In the long run constitutionalism is unavailing; at given moments it is an excellent device for confusing and obscuring the real issues. John P. Frey, arch craft-unionist, has been busy proving to the executive council of the American Federation of Labor that the Committee for Industrial Organization (C. I. O.) is a dual body. It is quite possible that Mr. Frey can make a perfect technical case for the theory that John L. Lewis and the C. I. O. are acting unconstitutionally by attempting to get more workers into the labor movement, just as lawyers have been able to prove that an elected Congress is acting unconstitutionally when it attempts to preserve democracy by restraining big business. It is very likely that the executive council, dominated by craft unionists, will find for Mr. Frey in the "trial" of the C. I. O. and suspend its component unions. This procedure is in fact the only way in which the craft-union crowd can save its skin. But their victory, like their argument, will be technical. They will have saved merely the craft-union shell of a labor movement whose living body has already moved into the industrial phase of its development.

NOTES ON THE OLYMPIC GAMES: THE Stürmer, allegedly suppressed anti-Semitic scandal sheet in Germany, has just come out with a special Olympics edition. It contains a picture of a noble-looking German crowned with the Olympic laurels and a brutal, degenerate fellow labelled "Jew" looking on with envy. . . . The New Yorker for August 1 depicts the converse on its cover: Blond, blue-eyed Nordics strain furiously toward the finish-line tape which a joyful little Jew has just burst through. . . . Reports from ticket and travel agencies indicate that the sale of tickets to the games has been most disappointing, particularly in the United States where the most tickets, it was hoped, would be sold. . . . Helene Mayer, champion woman fencer, was urged to go to Germany as the final proof that Hitler's Olympics were not really anti-Semitic. But when the question of publicity for athletes came up, Propaganda Minister Goebbels ruled that, in effect, no publicity be given to Miss Mayer's presence on the German team beyond the mere mention of her name. A German sports writer adds that her name has been mentioned only once—when the complete list of the German team was printed. . . . Dr. Joseph Goebbels, who made a speech of welcome to the journalists assembled to report the games, announced several times that they were not to be used for propaganda purposes.

AS WE GO TO PRESS TWO BLACK-SKINNED Americans have sent Hitler scurrying under his own Olympic propagandstand. It was obviously not on the official pogrom (stet) of the Eleventh Modern Olympic Games that athletes with dark skins should win any prizes. And when two American Negroes placed first and second in the 100-meter dash Hitler couldn't take it. Rather than shake hands with Jesse Owens and Ralph Metcalfe, who are the world's fastest runners, the great leader of Berlin was forced to congratulate two white German champion hammer-throwers in his private headquarters under the stadium. Thus is the sportsmanship of der schoene adolf set down, so to speak, in black and white so that those who run, leap, and throw may read. We hope we shall not be accused of race preference if we express the wish that every Olympic event could be won by a Negro. It would at least keep Hitler out of the public view.

THREE RECENT COMMUNICATIONS ABOUT the American Legion seem worth a little editorial attention. The first is from a correspondent who is not a member of the Legion, inclosing the report from the Minnesota Legionaire of a speech made before the national convention of the American Education Association by Frank Miles of Iowa, representing National Commander Ray Murphy. Mr. Miles was reported as having come out against compulsory oaths of loyalty for teachers, and also as having declared that the Legion's unalterable opposition to communism did not blind it to the fact that "fascism, nazism, peace-at-any-price pacifism . . . and certain elements of capitalism are operating just as devastatingly as communism." We are glad to see the Legion defending teachers against the super-patriots, and we are also pleased to learn that it is aware, at least officially, of the menace of reactionary movements. Our second letter is from a member of the Legion, complaining that we misrepresented it in commenting on the annual report of the Civil Liberties Union, in our issue of July 18. We said, "The American Legion continued to lead among those agencies engaged in attacking the Bill of Rights." The report said, "Of the forces most active in attacking civil rights the American Legion led the field." And this brings us to the third letter, which comes from the Chicago Civil Liberties Committee and incloses a statement of a case it is fighting in the Indiana courts. The case is that of a solicitor of subscriptions to the Literary Digest who was "framed" and railroaded to a five-year prison sentence under Indiana's criminal syndicalism law by a group of legionnaires. Mr. Miles might also have informed the educators that the misguided zeal of irresponsible legionnaires is one of the chief dangers to "Americanism"—if by that slogan the Legion means democracy.

NINE TIMES NOW THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF Deputies has passed a woman's suffrage bill, and eight times the Senate has killed it. The argument one hears, abroad at least, against suffrage for French women has always been the stock argument wherever women have demanded the vote—that they don't need it because they already have so much "influence." The French Senate, which is expected to block the measure again, evidently reasons, with true French realism, that influence can be conveniently disregarded where ballots cannot. Two points are worthy of note about the latest suffrage bill in the Chamber: first, that it passed by a vote of 488 to 1, and second, that it was introduced by the nationalist leader, Louis Marin. The dispatch to the New York Times reporting the vote added that the parties of the left, which have always been the leading advocates of woman's suffrage, are beginning to be doubtful whether the women's vote might not increase the strength of the right. M. Marin evidently thinks it would. He no doubt remembers that the first Spanish election after women were granted the vote resulted in a rightist victory. But if Spain is to be taken as the criterion, the right can count on one victory after women get the vote. And one victory at the polls does not win a war—or a revolution. In Spain the last election was won by the left; and Spanish women are now fighting beside men in the army of the People's Front. French women have never had the vote, but they have a good, militant revolutionary history. The real danger to the left in France lies in the weakness of its leaders, and not in votes for French women.

THE MILITARISTS HAVE JUST HAD A CIVIL setback in Southern Illinois. A few weeks ago it looked as if Carbondale would be the first community in that state outside Chicago to have military training in its high school. The school board, without sounding out townspeople and motivated by the desire to get something for nothing, voted four to one to authorize the War Department to establish an R.O.T.C. unit in the community high school. Opposition arose immediately among parents, church people, and the faculty (including the new president, Roscoe Pulliam) of the Southern Illinois State Normal University, situated in Carbondale. But the local daily newspaper is published by a reserve officer, the promoter of the military course, and the opposition was shut off from getting its case into print. Meanwhile, indorsing resolutions were railroaded through the American Legion, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Lions' Club. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch found out about the suppression, printed the facts and then followed developments as the opposition grew stronger. Moreover it carried several editorials supporting the protesting ministers, parents, and teachers, and pointing out among other things that the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association was on record against military training and that St. Louis had steadfastly rejected proposals to establish R.O.T.C. units in its high schools. This awakened Carbondale to the seriousness of the issue. Not wishing to shoulder the responsibility, the school board agreed to a referendum. The militarists campaigned for about ten days and made every effort to get out the vote at the election, yet the opposition carried the day by 442 to 347. What happened at Carbondale is ample proof that it is not necessary to let the militarists have their dangerous way.

OUR UNDERCOVER AGENT AMONG THE seven-year-olds informs us that Shirley Temple in her latest picture turns down spinach. By youthful extremists this is being hailed with joy as the heaviest blow so far struck at what they regard as the Green Terror. To more thoughtful and experienced observers in the older classes, however, it will seem to prove that something should be done to prevent one Hollywood blonde under ten from overthrowing in a brief scene the work of a whole generation of spinach progressives. Others profess to see in it the beginning of a revolt which must ultimately wipe out the vegetable plate with or without poached egg. We refuse to regard it as a fascist plot. We do feel that it proves conclusively that, given the mass circulation of Shirley Temple, the doctrine of spinach in every household will be increasingly difficult to maintain.

More Than Thunder

WHEN a primitive savage wants his enemy to die he takes a strip of the enemy's clothing and stuffs it in a dead snake's throat. He hopes thereby that a real snake will bite the real enemy. This is propitiatory magic, and it has been part of man's wishful techniques since the beginning of history. The presidential campaign has now reached the stage of propitiatory magic. The Republicans want Mr. Roosevelt defeated as much as any primitive savage ever wanted his enemy dead. And so they seek to build up a belief that he is already as good as beaten, hoping that the reality will imitate the picture of it in their minds.

There is no fault to be found with this. It is good propaganda technique as well as good magic, and actually clicks with a certain kind of mind. It is necessary in order to keep campaign contributions flowing into Republican coffers and hearten the party workers. The Democrats resort to the same technique, only they have less need to. It has been assumed for some time now that the coming election would prove to be a Roosevelt landslide: two months ago a man like Senator Vandenburg could not be persuaded to take the Republican nomination. Yet today there are fabulous rumors of a swing of sentiment to Landon and even some Democrats are reported to be worrying about the outcome. Straw votes, especially that of the Literary Digest and the American Institute of Public Opinion, have played a considerable part in creating the illusion of coming Republican success. The violent anti-Roosevelt bias of the large majority of newspaper owners has intensified it. But elections are not decided by the statistical genius of the straw-vote entrepreneurs nor by the self-induced eloquence of editorial writers. We have therefore asked our Washington correspondent, Paul Ward, who is admirably equipped for the task by a cynicism about either party, to undertake a matter-of-fact state-by-state analysis of just how the election prospects stand, and to strike a trial balance of the vote in the electoral college.

Mr. Ward's results, published elsewhere in this issue, are impressive in showing that the highly advertised Landon boom is still mainly propitiatory magic. We recommend the article for reading to Republicans and Democrats alike. It is hardheaded and unemotional, and the tabulation by which it prophesies a fairly easy victory for Mr. Roosevelt seems to ring true. We have only one qualification to add to Mr. Ward's analysis. It sums up the present realities, but it does not take account of what may still happen in the three months remaining before the election. It would require a hysteria of first-class proportions to swing into the Landon column all the states that are not clamped down iron-tight for Roosevelt. But the Republican strategists know that their only chance of winning lies in provoking such a hysteria. They know that what it requires are money and newspapers (both of which they have) and a large enough group in the country that may be accessible to a well-fabricated hysteria. Such a group may possibly be found in the lower middle class: it will certainly not be found anywhere else. It was the lower middle class—the small business-man, independent farmer, small investor, technician, professional man and woman—whose swing away from the Republicans brought Mr. Roosevelt into office in 1932. It is the same class that will decide the coming election.

The campaign techniques thus far have been built round an attempt to enlist and hold the allegiance of this group. Big business is in the bag for Mr. Landon. Labor and the relief rolls are equally in the bag for Mr. Roosevelt. The struggle centers around the groups intermediate between these two on the social scale. Lower middle class people, like any other people, vote and act in terms of their interests and their emotions. They move between the two poles of the desire for improvement and the terror of the unknown. Mr. Roosevelt and his cohorts are making their appeal to one pole in terms of individual security with a higher standard of living. Mr. Landon and his cohorts are making their appeal to the other in terms of continuity with the past and the enormities of drastic change. Mr. Roosevelt has the advantage of dealing with tangible interests and of presenting the accomplished fact of a returning prosperity. Nothing but a first-class and nation-wide anti-Roosevelt hysteria can counteract that advantage and produce the results for which the Republican industrialists hunger.

The outstanding question of the present campaign is whether such a hysteria can be engendered successfully. Several elements are involved. One is the bitter personal attack on Mr. Roosevelt and his family, openly in the newspapers and more dangerously in a whispering campaign. Another is anti-radicalism. Mr. Roosevelt is being accused, as no previous presidential candidate has ever been accused, of being a communist and of having Moscow connections. His attempt to deal more fairly than his predecessors with trade-union organization is used to bolster the charge: even the French strikes and the Spanish civil war are being conscripted into service to indicate what may happen here in the event of a second Roosevelt victory. The Lemke-Coughlin-Gerald Smith third-party movement, which was presumably meant to take radical votes from Mr. Roosevelt, is actually operating to attack his radicalism more virulently than the Republicans themselves dare do. One of the most sinister elements in the whole campaign is the cropping up of anti-Semitism, particularly in the middle western towns, and the attempt to link Mr. Roosevelt with Jewish influences.

There is more than mere campaign thunder in all this. A presidential campaign has been considered traditionally as a sort of sporting proposition, in which two crowds vie for political office, after which the scars of battle are healed. The present campaign, while probably not as close as many of its predecessors, is none the less more bitter. It is not only a struggle for political spoils and power. It mirrors the depth and intensity of the social struggle going on under the surface of our political life. It is part of a social crisis which is world wide in its scope. But the stakes of the conflict are higher here than anywhere else and the energies of American life are vast. To stir up these energies wantonly during a campaign is a grave responsibility for any group to assume.

Drunken Dictators

GANGSTERS know one law—the law of the jungle. That is why Italian planes and Italian pilots have been sent to bomb Spanish loyalist warships for the Spanish rebels. It is the reason for the arrogant German ultimatum to both the government and the rebels, forbidding either to fire on Spanish towns without serving ten hours notice on the German government. It is the reason also for the warlike move of the German destroyer Deutschland which steamed back and forth before the harbor of Ceuta in mute warning to Spanish loyalists warships not to bombard the rebels who hold that Moroccan seaport. Hitler and Mussolini know that upon the outcome of the Spanish rebellion hangs the fate of fascism in Western Europe. If unofficial support of the rebels is not sufficient to crush loyalist resistance, their present course may be regarded as an indication that they are prepared to act officially, even if that means a general European war.

The French and British governments know as well as Berlin or Rome what is at stake. But they are—or appear to think they are—unable to act, or even speak out, in the situation with that directness which characterizes fascist tactics. The British government cannot be expected to make any effective protest against fascist aggression per se. There are too many fascist sympathizers among the British ruling classes. The only hope, then, of a British demand that fascist governments stop meddling in the Spanish situation, lies in the British fear that the Spanish rebels, if victorious, will allow the Germans a naval base in the Canary Islands and the Italians one in the Balearic Islands, thus increasing the menace to the British Empire communications which has already been created by the Italian conquest of Abyssinia. And even if this fear is thoroughly aroused, that is no earnest that the Baldwin government—whose foreign policy for the past year and a half has been the most vacillating and contemptible in British history—will do anything but temporize while the issue of European war or no European war is decided by events whose course it will not have attempted to influence.

As for the Blum Government, its position is clearly defined in articles by Trotsky and Ravage, elsewhere in this issue. It is a centrist government at a time in history when the center is a vacuum, and it is afraid to move lest it be sucked into the void. Therefore it hesitates to accede to the demand of its leftist supporters, and permit munitions to be sent to the Spanish popular front government. To give the appearance of acting, it sounds out the British and Italian governments concerning an agreement not to permit the shipments of munitions to either side. Meanwhile the rebels are supplied with arms from Italian and other foreign sources.

While the chanceries of London and Paris indulge in telephonic consultations and convince themselves by their much speaking that they are getting something done, the Spanish proletariat is making a heroic stand against the menace of renewed slavery. The Spanish masses are the best educated politically in the Western world. They know as well as the Hitlers and Mussolinis, the Baldwins and Blums, what is in the balance. If there is one thing more striking than another about this extraordinary war, it is the lack of individual heroes. The hero is the mass—the mass that mobilizes itself, arms itself, feeds itself, and hurls itself against the insurgents in a great, irresistible wave. It has forced the temporizing social-democratic government to give it weapons, having learned two years ago in the Asturias that the only way to fight fascism is to fight it, and that the longer the fight is deferred, the bloodier, the more heart-breaking and destructive it will be. The whole working and farming and professional population of a country does not behave like that, risking even its women and children, unless it has the most urgent reasons—unless it feels that its very existence, collective and individual, is at stake.

This desperate struggle for freedom calls for more than mere passive neutrality on the part of the so-called democratic governments. They should bring to bear upon the fascist governments all the peaceful pressure at their command—and that is tremendous—to make them stop their meddling, official or unofficial, in the Spanish crisis. While London and Paris lose time by seeming to gain it, not only the future of democracy but the peace of Europe lies in jeopardy. The Hitlers and Mussolinis of this world do not wait on consultations. They are drunk with the successes that the democratic governments have permitted them to seize, with no resistance more effective than half-hearted gestures and empty threats. They think they can get away with anything. The democratic powers face a more immediate and threatening danger of war—a danger created by these two irresponsible megalomaniacs—than at any time since August, 1914. And they face it because of their own miserable bungling in the past.

Skeleton in the Closet

THE skeleton in the closet of capitalism is currently on display in Paterson, New Jersey, where some 4,000 owner-operators of so-called "family looms" for weaving silk are on strike not for a living wage but for a living income. The "family loom" appeared in the boom period when ambitious weavers bought machines to get into business independently and thus free themselves from the wage slavery for which the textile industry has been famous from its very inception. The story of the weavers' attempt to maintain themselves as free manufacturers in the face of capitalism in its present advanced stage is both significant and sordid. These workers, according to the excellent account in the New York Times, were frankly willing to exploit their wives and children in order to get ahead. For a while it seemed to work. When some of the large silk mills left Paterson to get away from organized labor and local taxes, the family loom with its low production costs remained and became an important factor. But it had already entered the all-consuming maw of capital whose nature it is to accumulate though men, women, and children decay. Some of the large operators did not move. Instead they began selling their looms to workers on the instalment plan and became brokers, providing the raw material and buying the product of the family looms but taking no responsibility for the mode or conditions of its production. The depression did the rest. Both the loom and the family became mere appendages of the brokers representing capital. The individual family loom took its place with other family looms in the most rickety buildings in Paterson; each loom is inclosed in a chicken wire cage to prevent the mutual stealing induced by competition which is here encountered in its simplest form. In these cages, in order to meet the price of the brokers, whole families duplicated the conditions and hours of work which prevailed in the English textile factories when the extension of the working day was still the most efficient device for increasing production.

The end result of these great labors was inevitable. The weavers not only pauperized themselves but depressed the wages of weavers in other plants. One of the brokers summed it up very succinctly. After invoking the law of supply and demand he said, "The buyers play Paterson against the South and the South against Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania back against Paterson and keep cutting each one down by means of the other." Needless to say, the weavers were unwilling agents in this process which cut down fellow workers' wages, and in the silk strike of last October the family weavers stopped work too in an attempt to get at least the same rate as ordinary hired weavers. But within two weeks the family weavers were forced into the role of strike-breakers because they had bills to pay and because the strike had created a shortage which raised the price the brokers could offer them.

The present strike is another attempt to make the brokers raise prices—an attempt roughly to increase the net income of the family loom from $6 to $12 a week! But it turns out that if the strike is won the weavers will be only relatively benefited. The brokers are so strong that for months it was impossible to get the weavers to take action against their exploiters. It took place only after Abraham Brenman, a lawyer who seems to be the impresario for this early-capitalist spectacle, had enlisted the "support" of the landlords who own the rickety buildings and of the machinery companies to whom instalments on looms are due. The support consists in forcing timid weavers to join the strike by threatening to evict them from their cages or to take away the machines which are dedicated to child labor and the endless working day.

The Times is journalistically sound in reporting fully this reversion of capitalism to its own infancy. The sinister fact is, however, that the mechanism whose operation in Paterson has finally become so shockingly cruel that it makes page one, is the basic mechanism of the economic system under which all of us live. What is even more shocking is the fact that this mechanism is accepted even by a newspaper correspondent as the operation of a natural law. The brokers, reads the Times account, are ready to accept the new prices and then to "let nature in the form of the market reaction take its course." As we write, nature in the form of human rebellion is taking a quite different course in various parts of Europe. The Paterson exhibit indicates why.

Defending the Spanish Republic

BY LUIS ARAQUISTAIN

By cable from Madrid, August 3

IN the present Spanish military rebellion ninety-nine per cent of the officers of the army and navy are involved. The majority of the garrisons in fifty provinces took part in the uprising. But the rebellion became seriously jeopardized and was perhaps definitely checked when two days after it broke out armed people and loyal police forces stormed those Madrid barracks which had revolted, and in Barcelona on the same day took General Goded prisoner, thus freeing the two great cities which control the country's political life. Nevertheless, the rebellion is not yet vanquished. The rebels still control those regions which are politically the most backward in Spain.

The most serious mistake of the rebels was to believe that the proletarians, split into Marxists or Reformists, Socialists, Communists, Syndicalists, and anarchists would not unite in fighting for the Republic. They did unite, taking up arms as one man. The Republican government at first resisted the revolutionary step of arming the workers; it was forced to do so when the great betrayal of army officers made it clear that the working people were the government's main support in its critical hour.

In addition, the proletariat is using the weapon of the general strike in those provinces occupied by the rebels, thus hindering enormously the maneuvering of rebel troops and maintenance of the food supply. On the other hand, in provinces that are loyal or have been reconquered by the government, workers who are not at the battle front work doubly hard in order that the army and the people may eat and fight. All armament factories and the main auxiliary industries, such as iron, steel, and transport, are in government hands. Fascists must rely on war material that was stocked in rebel garrisons. When these supplies run out, the only alternative will be surrender.

The rebel generals also made a mistake about the soldiers and sailors. Soldiers have refused to fire on loyal forces, and desert as soon as they can. Their support was enlisted with lies. They were told that they were fighting against anarchy and defending the Republic. Once the men discovered the truth and knew the legitimate government had disbanded them, rebel chiefs hesitated to use such unsafe troops. The rebels face another hazard: if their forces leave the towns they now hold in order to advance on Madrid or to reinforce rebels whose positions are weak the workers will rise behind their backs. They will thus be caught between two fires. This means that the majority of the rebel garrisons are merely besieged and that the army is unable to make any move. From all those northern provinces they still hold they have managed to send on to Madrid only small columns mainly composed of rebel officers and fascist civilians, and these are held in check by popular militias in the mountain passes north of the capital. The rebels also planned to bring over from Morocco native troops and men of the foreign legion; but the crews of warships imprisoned or shot their officers, seized the ships, and prevented the transport of those mercenary troops.

Thanks to all these factors, the limited offensive and defensive power of the fascists has been easily checked so far. With every day that passes their capacity for attack and defense decreases owing to the demoralization growing out of early failure and to the increasing scarcity of their munition and food supplies. On the other hand, the new popular army is increasing numerically and in fighting strength. It will take the place of the old royalist army. The Republic unwisely left that army intact. The people have annihilated it.

Two Spains, one feudal, the other proletarian, confront each other. One must annihilate the other. The people are determined to crush their enemies, the military, aristocratic, and clerical oligarchies. They will defend only a democratic republic.

Landon Has No Chance

Washington, August 3

DON'T be taken in by all this talk that Landon has a chance. Presidential elections are always close—especially in the public prints—until the votes are counted. Then they are landslides. They have been landslides eight times out of ten, and the Presidential race this year is not going to be an exception. Mr. Roosevelt will carry at least 31 states and poll at least 286 electoral votes, which is 20 more than he needs, and there is a better-than-even chance that he will poll more than 400 out of a possible 531. I base my prediction not on wishes but on the available evidence. Being certain that whichever major nominee is elected the public will be rooked and that the chief thing in Roosevelt's favor is that he might be a week or two longer than Landon in calling out the troops if Lewis and his boys pushed the steel masters up against the wall, I don't give a damn which one of them wins.

Take first the straw votes. Three of them have been widely publicized—the one put out by Dr. Gallup's Institute of Public Opinion on July 12, the Literary Digest poll completed last January, and the initial instalment of the Farm Journal poll, published July 20. All three are commercial enterprises run for profit, and the man who hacks at their roots opens himself to a suit for damages. Though all have been represented otherwise, none of the three offers much support to the Landon cause. In the most reliable of them all, the Digest poll, nearly 2,000,000 votes were cast, and 62.6 per cent of them were cast in disapproval of the New Deal, which carried only 12 states in this test. But the question on the ballot was so badly phrased as to open the way for many different deductions, and the voters were not given a chance to vote for or against Roosevelt, who unquestionably is more popular than the New Deal.

The other two polls may be quickly dismissed, especially the Farm Journal poll. It is taken not by mail but by solicitors, and solicitors are notoriously inclined to lead the voters, especially when they are employed by the type of firm that publishes this magazine. The firm is owned by Joseph N. Pew, Jr., oil man and prominent Liberty Leaguer, who bought the Farm Journal out of receivership last October. A 25-cents-a-year magazine claiming a circulation of about 1,250,000, it reads like a campaign pamphlet from the Republican National Committee. Its editor, Arthur H. Jenkins, writing recently to a subscribing farmer who had wanted to be recorded in the poll as voting for Roosevelt, suggested that the farmer subscribe to some other magazine and added that "we expect to do our best to stop Mr. Roosevelt . . ." In the first instalment of the Farm Journal poll, Landon got 25,307, or 54.7 per cent of the total. The poll, however, covered only thirty-two states. Most of the solidly Democratic states were missing, and the returns for the states covered came most heavily from Republican strongholds. From Texas, for example, where there are 501,017 farms, only 155 votes were recorded as against 3,948 from New York where there are only 177,025 farms. Even so, this poll favored Roosevelt. If the ratios of voting sentiment it showed had been applied to the total farm population in each state, the resulting figures would have given Roosevelt 2,637,382 votes, or 53.27 per cent of the total.

He got only 57.3 per cent of the total vote cast in November, 1932, when he defeated Hoover by 7,060,016 votes. And this brings us to a point which illustrates the inadequacy of all these national polls. None of them is large enough to reflect anything but the grossest sort of shift in public sentiment, and none of them to date has even pretended to show a shift big enough to make itself apparent in their minute cross-sections. This is significant when one considers that rarely does a Presidential candidate poll three out of five votes cast in the elections. The average for the winners of the last eleven Presidential elections is 56.1 per cent. The landslides come in the electoral college. On an average 72 per cent of the electoral college vote goes to the winning Presidential candidate; at least, it has in the last nine elections.

The following tabulation tells the story in detail:

Year	Candidate	Party	Per cent Popular Vote	Per cent Electoral Vote
1932.....	Roosevelt	Dem.	57.3.....	88
1928.....	Hoover	Rep.	58.8.....	83
1924.....	Coolidge	Rep.	71.2.....	72
1920.....	Harding	Rep.	65.8.....	76
1916.....	Wilson	Dem.	49.2.....	52
1912.....	Wilson	Dem.	41.8.....	81
1908.....	Taft	Rep.	57.0.....	66
1904.....	Roosevelt	Rep.	62.5.....	70

I may add for the benefit of those who don't believe in figures yet do believe in Dr. Gallup's polls, that the latest gave Roosevelt an edge of 2,000,000 in the popular vote but found Landon a six-vote lead in the electoral college. It achieved this result by giving Landon the benefit of the doubt wherever possible. It conceded to Roosevelt 24 states with a total of 229 electoral votes and to Landon 15 states with a total of 99 votes. Then it proceeded to parcel out 14 doubtful states, giving 11 with a total of 173 votes to Landon and three with a total of 30 votes to Roosevelt. Among the doubtful states it gave to Landon was Montana. Two weeks after the poll was published Montana held its primary elections. New Deal candidates won the Democratic contest. The total vote for both parties was 67 per cent Democratic in the case of the governorship and 74 per cent in that of the senatorship. If the disparity between the poll and the Montana vote holds throughout the poll—and primary returns in other states warrant a belief that it does—only four states that Gallup concedes to Landon will actually be found in his column in November; Roosevelt will have the remaining 34 and a record-breaking total of 510 electoral votes.

We come now to the evidence supporting a prediction that Roosevelt will win in a walk. Let's begin with the intangibles, including chiefly the fact that no other peacetime administration has had such direct and personal contact with the electorate as this one. More than a million families have successfully turned to the HOLC to avoid foreclosure on their homes. Over 3,000,000 families are dependent on the WPA. Hundreds of millions have been paid out to farmers in AAA benefits. Thousands of farmers, burnt out by drought in 1934 and 1936, have been saved by the RA, the FERA and the FSCC, all New Deal agencies. The great majority of the million or so railroaders in the country publicly swear by Roosevelt, and they have relatives who also vote. There are an additional 3,500,000 workingmen with families whose votes Labor's Non-Partisan League vows it will deliver to Roosevelt. This list of intangibles could be extended indefinitely.

None of these intangibles—save drought-relief, and that only in the case of one state—figured in my calculation that Roosevelt is certain of at least 286 electoral votes. That calculation was based on a tabulation showing how each state has voted since 1900, how it is classified in the various polls, and how the most recent elections in the state came out. Latest available registration-figures also were included, along with the party division of each state's Congressional delegation and such other known facts as were available concerning the counterplay of political forces in each state. An attempt then was made to synthesize all these different factors and weigh each in relation to its influence upon the outcome in November. Thus where polls indicated a pro-Landon shift in sentiment, note was taken of the extent of shift necessary to put that state in the Landon column, and this, in turn, was balanced against the trends shown in registrations or recent elections. Account also had to be taken in many cases of the fact that no appreciable number of voters split their tickets in a national election.

Greatest weight was given to the 1934 Congressional elections, for it is an axiom of American politics that the party winning the Congressional elections between Presidential elections always wins the Presidency two years later. Victory in the Congressional elections means that a party is well on its way to control of state, county, and local machines, and these machines elect our Presidents. It was their control that kept the Republicans in power almost continuously up to 1932. Such victories as the Democrats were able to score in the national field were temporary and failed to blow the G.O.P. out of its actual strongholds. In 1932, out of 1,500 counties west of the Mississippi, 1,454 fell to the Democrats; that means, the majority of the sheriffs, police, tax assessors and collectors, election boards and commissioners in those counties are Democrats. Moreover, far from losing strength in the 1934 Congressional by-election, the Democrats made enormous gains, so that out of the 435 House members in the last Congress 315 were Democrats and only 104

Republicans; in the Senate there were 70 Democrats and only 23 Republicans. To this must be added the fact that at their last elections only nine states elected Republican Governors; that in all recent primaries New Deal candidates have emerged victorious; that the opposition to the anti-Roosevelt proceedings at the recent Townsend convention came wholly from actual candidates for office who openly rated support of the New Deal as more important to their success than support of Townsendism; that the same is true of Coughlin candidates in many sections; that the professional Republicans apparently have no confidence in their 1936 prospects for, except for those seeking reelection, only the most dreadful hacks are entering the jousts against New Dealers; and, finally, that what registration figures are available are not only favorable but markedly so, to Democratic prospects for November.

All these considerations resulted in a tabulation in which 26 states possessing a total of 241 electoral votes had to be conceded to Roosevelt beyond quibble. To this list were added five states which Roosevelt has much better than an even chance of carrying. They brought his total vote up to 286, more than enough to reelect him. The five states so added were Indiana, Iowa, Idaho, Minnesota, and Oregon. All have Democratic Governors. Indiana gave Roosevelt 54 per cent of its popular vote in 1932 and has given thirteen out of its fourteen seats in Congress to Democrats. Its Governor, McNutt, the Hoosier Hitler, is a powerful, magnetic figure who has designs on the Presidency in 1940 and will be working overtime to keep his state in the Democratic column to that end. In Iowa Roosevelt's chances are even better. The state gave him nearly 58 per cent of its popular vote in 1932 and has given seven of its eleven Congressional seats to Democrats. Local polls show a heavy New Deal sentiment, and the Democrats have the best of the local candidates for federal office. The present Governor, Herring, is running for the Senate against "Jeeter Lester" Dickinson, the dogfood boy. Kreschel, another powerful campaigner, is after the Governorship as a Democrat. The Republicans have put up an unknown against a seasoned and popular Democrat campaigner for the Senate seat vacated recently by the death of Senator Murphy. In Idaho another vote-magnet by the name of Ross, now Governor, is out campaigning as a New Dealer for Borah's seat in the Senate. Already three of the state's four Congressional representatives are Democrats, and Borah will be so hard put saving the fourth for himself that he will have no more time than he now has taste for boosting Landon's chances. Minnesota, which has one Democrat and no Republicans in Congress, is counted in the Roosevelt column not only because of the drought but also because of the strong pro-Roosevelt sentiment in the Farmer-Labor forces there and the more or less open alliance between Governor Olson and Roosevelt. That Oregon belongs in the same column is virtually conceded by the Republicans themselves.

Of the other 26 states which the tabulation at issue here puts in the Roosevelt column only a few will excite any question at all. One of these perhaps is California. Registration figures from that state show a 50 per cent increase for the Democrats, a 50 per cent decrease for the Republicans. The polls also give it to the New Deal and so, privately, do the Republican chieftains. West Virginia may cause argument, merely because the polls give it to the Republicans. The Democrats were heavily in the majority in its primaries and all anti-New Deal candidates got a drubbing. Its eight Congressmen are Democrats.

If Roosevelt carries all thirty-one of the States credited to him in this tabulation he will not have to worry about how many of the others fall into the Landon column. The others are Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont. In many of these Roosevelt has better than a fighting chance. Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, and Kansas alone seem safely Republican at the moment, and only local pride can be counted on to keep Kansas safe. Local polls there show a strong pro-Roosevelt sentiment among the farmers, and Democratic headquarters here claim that since last registration day in Landon's home county, Montgomery, 661 Republicans have shifted to Democratic while only 61 Democrats have gone Republican. In the recent Presidential preference primaries in Illinois, Roosevelt, though unopposed, polled more votes than all the Republican aspirants put together. The state has a Democratic Governor, Horner, who in the primaries bested the Kelly-Nash Democratic machine in Chicago with the result that the two factions will be breaking their necks in November to get out a Roosevelt vote definitely establishing one or the other's claim on federal patronage. Twenty-one of the state's 27 occupied seats in the last Congress were filled by Democrats. Michigan, with Frank Murphy running for the Governorship, the Republican Couzens pulling for Roosevelt, and its big labor and Negro votes strongly pro-New Deal, ought not to be put definitely out of the Democratic column; nor should Nebraska, where Norris will be boosting the New Deal. Nebraska already has a Democratic Senator and Governor. Four of its House seats went to Democrats in 1934 and only two to Republicans. New York, with Lehman, a greater vote-getter than Roosevelt, heading the state ticket, may also be found in the Democratic pocket when the final votes are counted, despite the defection of Al Smith and his few remaining pals. What happens in Ohio will depend largely on the size of Roosevelt's lead in Cleveland and the extent to which intra-party strife centering around Governor Davey, a Democrat, disrupts the party organization in the state. Pennsylvania, on the other hand, seems well on her way to casting her Presidential vote for a Democrat for the first time. Registration figures, including some showing 100 per cent gains for the Democrats against losses for the Republicans, support that belief, as does the fact that for the first time in the state's history it has a Democratic machine that it not only working smoothly but also working against the Republicans instead of with them. In 1932, when Pennsylvania cast her vote for Hoover, John L. Lewis was supporting the Republican nominee and the state had not yet acquired a Democratic Governor nor given two out of every three of its seats in Congress to the Democracy.

The Education of John L. Lewis

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

DURING the 1920's John Lewis won more victories than any other labor leader. He smashed his opponents within the union, one by one. The miners won every national strike. He settled most of these strikes with victorious agreements; and when that was impossible, he at least held on to his slogan, No Backward Step! Since Lewis became head of the union, it has never agreed to a reduction in wages, to a worsening of conditions, to a formal weakening of its position. And that at a time when the rest of labor was giving way to the company union everywhere. Tough, shrewd, successful, Lewis was known as the Jack Dempsey of American labor.

Yet every victory left the union more exhausted, internally more disrupted, externally more disorganized, numerically dwindling. What the union refused to do nationally, the separate districts had to do. They had to back down on wages and conditions. The coal operators were chiseling on the contracts. Standards were disintegrating. Mines lay idle. The coal market was shrinking. Wildcat over-expansion and monopolistic compression alternated within the industry, and in one monopolistic squeeze after another some 200,000 miners lost their jobs.

The anthracite workers, in the more stabilized sector of the industry, more or less held their own. But the soft-coal field was gradually crumbling into coal dust. Toward the end of the Great Prosperity the union probably had no more than 250,000 members, if that. To be sure, it continued to pay the A. F. of L. a head tax for 400,000 members. But that was a mere gesture upheld by political necessity. The most powerful of all unions could not publicly admit its slow collapse. Besides, the Lewis machine, in its bitter struggles against its own left wings, had to keep its voting strength in the "red"-baiting A. F. of L. conventions. But for all their splendid paper showing the United Mine Workers were remitted their per capita tax in 1928. There just weren't enough dues-paying miners to meet the tax. For the truth was that Mr. Lewis's victories were all Pyrrhic victories. They were won in the clauses of collective bargains and not in the trenches of the mines.

Now John Lewis is by temperament not satisfied with formal victories which turn into informal routs. To Green, Woll, Tobin, and Company a Pyrrhic victory is the only safe victory. They abhor nothing more than a real advance of their separatist craft battalions, whose strategy is confined to "jurisdictional disputes" among themselves. A general advance of labor would tend to unite labor, while they live on its division, as their present fight against Lewis and the C. I. O. clearly indicates. Hence the Greens fear nothing more than labor power. All they want is bourgeois success. Such success does not interest Lewis. He wants the success of power, not of philistine security and bureaucratic vegetation. And he knows that labor power rests on mass organization. So, naturally, with every new victory John Lewis became more puzzled. Why did the union advance on the map and lose in the coal fields?

This is not to say that throughout the 1920's John Lewis was forever scratching his head and wondering what it was all about. Lewis was always very capable, intelligent, and realistic. Even then he knew the coal industry probably better than anybody else—economically, practically, scientifically—which in sheer scholarship is quite a feat. And being a man of exceptional strength, he is not given to spiritual bewilderment. What I mean is that Lewis, being the sort of man who learns almost altogether from experience, is enlightened by life itself more than by his own imagination. That, indeed, is in a way his limitation, for the greatest leaders learn from both. But be that as it may, the period of the great boom was the period of Lewis's slow enlightenment in the processes of capitalist economy.

One curious reason for the slowness of his progressive growth was that, until the very end of the decade, he was firmly convinced that he himself was the most progressive leader in American labor. Didn't he always invite Rena Mooney to address the miners' conventions for the Mooney-Billings defense fund, and didn't he see to it that she never left empty-handed? Didn't the resolutions committee in every convention, which was always under his thumb, indorse some such radical measure as the thirty-hour week, or the nationalization of the coal industry, or the Plumb Plan? Didn't he always speak his mind about the masters of finance capital? It was because he believed in his own progressivism that he fought the radicals in his own union not only ruthlessly but with real moral passion. He got rid of Frank Farrington, the Illinois "progressive," by proving that Farrington was in the pay of the operators. He got rid of Alex Howat, the Kansas left-winger, an honest but almost illiterate roughneck, by heaving him out of the union for insubordination. And finally he got rid of John Brophy, whom he considered an impractical idealist, by accusing him in 1928 of fomenting "dual unionism."

But in fact Lewis was not a progressive until the very end of the 1920's. He thought he was, partly because he had started his career in local union politics as a rebel and partly because he represented the traditional radicalism of the United Mine Workers. This radicalism was a rough-and-ready labor Jacksonism, nostalgically reminiscent of the Knights of Labor. It was not until the NRA was in full wild swing that Lewis's progressive education was finally completed; that he abandoned this conventional radicalism—which gave scope even to the most reactionary politics—and came out straight for that modern vertical unionism which presents a monolithic front to modern monopoly. Today he no longer believes, as he did in the twenties, that one can fight Wall Street and yet vote the Republican ticket. He no longer thinks that a Republican President might make him Secretary of Labor, so that he could reform industry and strengthen unionism.

From 1911 to 1917 Lewis was an organizer for the A. F. of L., the personal representative of the late Samuel Gompers during the latter's reactionary period. From that job he went straight to the top of the United Mine Workers. When he became president in 1919, the coal industry was crazily over-expanding. But the suicidal contradictions of this over-expansion, the chaos it was creating in the industry, were hidden by the immediate post-war boom. Lewis was prepared neither by training nor experience to see through the economics of this over-expansion. He saw his duty primarily in strengthening the union so that it might keep pace with the seeming growth of the industry. He did not quite realize that such anarchic growth was bound to wreck both the industry and its workers.

His first great victory—on paper—resulted from the national coal strike of 1919. On November 8, eight days after the strike was called, Judge Anderson of the United States District Court in Indiana issued an injunction which forbade the miners even to think about it. President Wilson threatened military intervention. Lewis called off the strike officially, but somehow not a single miner went back to work. And with this strategy he forced President Wilson to appoint a bituminous-coal commission.

The commission recommended a wage increase of 27 per cent and approximately corresponding increases for common labor, for trappers, and for boys. No change was made in basic hours. The operators had to accept. Of course, the coal industry being what it is, the agreement was filled with the usual exceptional provisions, technical differentials, and other loopholes for sabotage on the part of the operators. Under this agreement the average miner, getting as much work as the industry could offer, earned no more than $900 to $1,000 a year, a good deal less than the totally inadequate $1,600 which the Department of Labor then computed as essential to a standard of minimum health and decency for the American family. Still, the men returned feeling that they had gained something. But the almost immediate wholesale repudiation on the part of the operators created an infinite amount of trouble, especially in Illinois and in Kansas, where the progressive opposition to Lewis flourished because of the anarchy in the industry. Lesser strikes were chronic during this period and the unorganized fields in Kentucky and particularly in West Virginia were constant wounds.

Not all strikes are precipitated by the employers, except in the coal industry. There they always are, because the operators invariably refuse to reenter negotiations at the expiration of a contract. The next strike was in 1922 and it ended with the Tri-State agreement, so-called because it involved Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, as the basis for a national settlement. The union officially fought for a thirty-hour week, by which the miners really meant a minimum of thirty hours, for the industry was employing most men from one to three days a week only. Again it won the purely Pyrrhic victory of an eight-hour day, for the over-expansion of the industry had really ruined the work day.

But it also won a 10 per cent wage increase. With slight modifications, this wage scale is in operation today.

After the Tri-State agreement the consequences of the earlier over-expansion of the industry began to tell. Lewis realized that there were "twice too many mines and twice too many miners." It was then that he woke up to the fact that what the industry needed above all was stabilization, a conception which he later extended to include the whole of our economy. And he began to advocate, rather vaguely, government regulation of the industry—a tremendous forward step for an A. F. of L. leader. For the A. F. of L. was forever fighting government "interference," an interference which the government since the Civil War—except in the case of the railroads—had never dreamed of offering unless it were in aiding officials to break strikes.

It was as far back as the eve of the strike of 1922 that Lewis came out for government regulation. "Some national authority over the coal industry is necessary, call it what you may," he testified before the Bland committee of the House of Representatives. He came out for "an industrial bill of rights," and suggested a permanent coal commission representing capital, labor, and the ever mythical "public." But it was not until the breakdown of the Jacksonville agreement in 1927 that Lewis began to fight in earnest for government regulation of the coal industry.

The Tri-State agreement was to last till April 1, 1924. On February 19, 1924, the Jacksonville agreement was signed to last until 1927. It was signed between the operators and the miners of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and western Pennsylvania, again as the basis for a national settlement. The old conditions were renewed. This was considered a tremendous victory, because at that time labor was losing all along the line to the company-union movement.

No sooner was the Jacksonville agreement signed than the operators began to chisel at it by all sorts of subterfuges. They started "group" leasing and other such "cooperative" undertakings. The unionized fields became completely disorganized. Toward the end of 1924, 40 per cent of the coal mines in the country were non-union. One year later fully 60 per cent were non-union, mines mainly in Kentucky and West Virginia. The Coolidge Administration, under pressure from Mr. Hoover who was then Secretary of Commerce, allowed the scab operators preferential freight rates so as to kill union production. It was during the period of the Jacksonville agreement that Lewis had most of the trouble with his left wing, which expressed the restlessness of the rank and file. The progressives wanted him to organize Kentucky and West Virginia. Lewis showed that the non-union fields were owned by the same Wall Street interests which owned the union fields, and which manipulated both. And he also claimed that West Virginia could not be organized short of a civil war. The slightest attempt at organization in those fields was accompanied by murder, evictions, and general terror.

And so once more Lewis returned to agitating for government regulation of the industry. When the Jacksonville agreement broke down in 1927, he submitted a coal-stabilization bill, which became known as the Watson bill because it was finally introduced by Senator Watson of Indiana in 1930. The stress of the depression kept it from consideration. But in January, 1932, it was again introduced, completely revised, by James Davis in the Senate and Clyde Kelley in the House. During these years, from 1927 on, the miners, both nationally and by districts, of course carried on negotiations and signed agreements with the operators. But Lewis's main interest was directed toward the sort of legislative social planning which was eventually enacted in the NIRA.

It Can't Rain Here

BY ALFRED KLAUSLER

Glendive, Montana, July 30

WHEN you live right in the heart of a great news story, you suddenly lose all desire to run with it to the typewriter. For years you wait for the breaks to come, as they do so often to the metropolitan newspapers, and when they are here, all around you, you feel like sitting down and doing nothing.

The latest reports say that a billion dollars worth of economic damage has been done by the drought. In the Northwest the crop loss mounted to $300,000,000, passed the $400,000,000 mark some time ago, and is now nearing $500,000,000. What the amount of damage is in the cattle world is still unknown. Until now farmers have chased their cattle into ditches to eat the spears of quack grass or have managed to rake up straw from last year's threshing. If there is no rain, most of the cattle including the family milch cows will be shipped out.

There has been much cattle shipping already. Go down to the railroad yards at night and watch the long cattle trains slide furtively into the yards. Every car is filled with gaunt looking steers and cows. Some are so weak from lack of food and water they fall to their knees every time the train jolts. Many cars are filled with prostrate cattle. They come from the cattle country of eastern Montana and western North Dakota. Down in the Powder River country the waterholes have long ago dried up; the Mormon crickets ate the last spear of grass; the range is nothing but a brown crinkly mat. Cowhands urge the cattle on for a few more miles to the nearest shipping point. The cattle stagger drunkenly through the dust clouds. Many fall over and die before they reach the yards. In this Powder River country, the heart of the western cattle kingdom, drinking water at filling stations costs five cents a glass.

Take a slow automobile trip from Rugby, North Dakota, to Steele, North Dakota, a straight line of 150 miles which goes right through the heart of the North Dakota drought area. The highway is in excellent shape. It shoots straight from the Canadian border to South Dakota. There are a few turns where the road winds past alkali lakes and sloughs now dried into white patches like old buffalo skulls. Fences torn, buildings unpainted, dust-drifts along the fence lines, fields of stunted Russian thistle, deserted farmyards—as far as the eye can see desolation and waste. Once upon a time this was a proud and prosperous country. There were stately hip-roof barns, gleaming white homes; cottonwood groves sheltered apple orchards on every farm.

There aren't many people left. If there are, you can't find them. Perhaps they are sitting on the shady side of the house staring into the horizon or just sleeping. Perhaps they are in town sitting along the curbs cracking jokes or conducting a serious and scientific discussion as to the possibility of rain. The last rain, the last good rain, was July 10, 1935. Some farmers have moved out of the country but the majority can't even buy gasoline.

Take the road from Bismarck west through North Dakota into Montana. The fields on either side of the highway are a burnt, dirty yellow. It's like that all over North Dakota but the farther west you get the more desolate the scenery appears. When you hit eastern Montana you think you've hit a bit of hell. It's so hot and damned looking. The black-top road shimmers with grasshoppers. They look like a vast bed of gravel quivering under an earthquake. The heat hits the face, jabs the nostrils, and pinches the skin on the face. As far as the eye can see there is absolutely nothing except Badland buttes, dried pastures, a couple of bones, and ramshackle farmyards. You spend most of your time waiting for rain. You start way back in February counting the days until the first rain. Around Easter the tension increases. When Easter passes without rain you count the days until Decoration Day. After that you don't count any more. You just wait for rain.

The New York Times photographers have taken all kinds of fancy pictures of cattle and people in our drought country. The pictures show human beings sitting by doorsteps, faces screwed up at the sun, eyes shaded—just like the sharecropper pictures from Arkansas. We never dreamed it would come to this. We have always had money and the feeling of prosperity. But the photographers missed the look that comes to the face when suddenly the pump no longer pulls water and you've got a herd of twenty steers, eighteen cows, and six calves bunched around the water tank bellowing for water and at last collapsing into the dried manure of the yard.

It can't rain here. There are black-purple clouds rolling forward, lower, lower. The wind is still hot. The thermometer shows 110 degrees. You pray a little in a half-ashamed manner. But then the wind comes from the west and the clouds are swept away, high up into the sky.

Once there was a rain. It rained last Sunday evening. The same heavy black clouds swept up across the Badland buttes. Skeptically you watched the clouds. They dropped lower. The hot blasts from the west stopped. There was a sudden calm. There were the first heavy warm drops. You held out your hand unbelievably. You chant the litany, it can't rain here. And then comes the sudden swift downpour of water. It covers the ground in sheets. Everyone takes off shoes and stockings to wade in the mud. There is laughter. Now there might be enough feed for the winter.

But the next day the sun is hot and drilling. The unnatural greenness droops. Wells go dry. Waterholes disappear. We count the days until the next rain. Perhaps there will be a rain in September. It may rain for thirty days. That's what happened back in 1908.

Revolutionary Interlude in France

BY LEON TROTSKY

Norway, July 9

WE MUST repeat once again that the serious capitalist press like the Paris Temps or the London Times has made a much more correct and penetrating evaluation of the meaning of the June events in France and Belgium than has the press of the People's Front. While the Socialist and Communist official organs, tagging behind Blum, talk about the beginning of the "peaceful transformation of the social regime in France," the conservative press insists that in France a revolution has begun and that it will inevitably assume violent forms during the next stages. It would be a mistake to view this prognosis as solely or chiefly intended to frighten the property owners. The representatives of big capital are capable of following the social struggle very realistically. Contrariwise, petty bourgeois politicians readily incline to accept their own desires for reality. Standing between the principal classes, finance capital and the proletariat, the Messrs. "Reformers" propose that both of the opponents accept the middle course which they have greatly labored to elaborate in the General Staff of the People's Front, and which they themselves interpret differently. However, they will shortly have occasion to convince themselves that it is much easier to reconcile class contradictions in leading articles than in governmental activity, especially in the very heat of a social crisis.

In parliament an ironical charge has been hurled against Blum that he carried on negotiations concerning the demands of the strikers with representatives of the "200 families." "And who else was there for me to negotiate with?" wittily replied the Premier. In point of fact, if any negotiations are to be carried on with the bourgeoisie, then it is necessary to choose the real masters, those capable of deciding for themselves and of issuing orders to others. But in that case, it was pointless to have so noisily declared war against them! Within the framework of the bourgeois regime, its laws and mechanics, each one of the "200 families" is incomparably more powerful than the Blum Government. The financial magnates represent the crown of the bourgeois system of France, while the Blum Government, despite all its electoral successes, "crowns" only a brief interlude between the two contending camps.

At the present moment, in the first half of July, it might superficially seem as if everything had more or less returned to normal. As a matter of fact, within the depths of the proletariat, as well as among the summits of the ruling classes, a well-nigh automatic preparation for a new conflict is now going on. The very essence of the matter lies in the fact that the reforms, very meager as they are in substance, upon which the capitalists and the leaders of the labor organizations agreed in June, are not viable, because they are already beyond the powers of declining capitalism, taken as a whole. The financial oligarchy, which did a swimming business in the very heat of the crisis, could, of course, abide both with the forty-hour week, paid vacations, and so on, but the hundreds of thousands of middle and petty entrepreneurs, upon whom finance capital leans and upon whose shoulders it now is loading the costs of its agreement with Blum, must either submit docilely to ruin or seek, in their turn, to load the costs of social reforms upon the workers and peasants, as consumers.

Blum, to be sure, has more than once expatiated in the Chamber and in the press upon the enticing prospect of a general economic revival and of a rapidly expanding turnover which will make it possible to lower considerably the general productive costs and therefore allow of increased expenditures for labor power without a rise in commodity prices. In point of fact such combined economic processes were frequently to be observed in the past. They mark the entire history of rising capitalism. The only trouble is that Blum is trying to project into the future what has irrevocably receded into the past. Politicians, subject to such an aberration, may call themselves socialists and even communists but they fix their eyes not ahead but behind them, and they are therefore a brake upon progress.

French capitalism with its celebrated "equilibrium" between agriculture and industry entered into the stage of decline later than Italy and Germany but no less irresistibly. This is not a phrase from a revolutionary proclamation, but a statement of incontrovertible fact. The productive forces of France have outgrown the bounds of private property and the boundaries of the state. Governmental intervention on the foundations of a capitalist regime can be of assistance only in shifting the unprofitable expenditures of the decline from one class to another. Which class would that be? When the Socialist Premier has to carry on negotiations about a "more just" distribution of the national income, he is unable, as we have already learned, to find any worthy partners other than the representatives of the "200 families." Holding in their hands all the basic levers of industry, credit, and commerce, the financial magnates shift the costs of the agreement upon the "middle classes," compelling them by reason of this very thing to enter into a struggle with the workers. In this now lies the crux of the situation.

The manufacturers and the merchants present their ledgers to the ministers and say, "We cannot do it." The government, calling to mind old textbooks of political economy, replies, "It is necessary to cut down the costs of production." But this is easier said than done. Moreover, in the given conditions technological improvements would mean increased unemployment, and ultimately a deepening of the crisis. The workers, on their part, are protesting against the fact that the incipient increases in prices threaten to devour their conquests. The government issues orders to the prefects that they launch a campaign against the high cost of living. But the prefects know from long experience that it is much easier to lower the tone of an oppositionist paper than to lower the price of meat. The wave of mounting prices still lies ahead.

The small manufacturers, tradesmen and, in their wake, the peasants will become more and more disillusioned with the People's Front, from which they expected immediate salvation far more directly and innocently than did the workers. The fundamental political contradiction of the People's Front lies in the fact that the politicians of the Golden Mean at its head, in their fear of "scaring" the middle classes, do not transgress the bounds of the old social regime, that is, the historical blind alley. Meanwhile, the so-called middle classes—not their summits, of course, but the lower ranks—sense the impasse at every step and are not at all afraid of bold decisions, but on the contrary demand them as a riddance from the noose. "Do not expect miracles from us!" the pedants in power keep repeating. But the gist of the matter lies precisely in the fact that without "miracles," without heroic decisions, without a complete overturn in property relations—without the concentration of the banking system, of the basic branches of industry, and of foreign trade in the hands of the state—there is no salvation for the petty bourgeoisie of the city and country. If the "middle classes" in whose name the People's Front was expressly created are unable to find revolutionary audacity from the left, they will seek it on the right. The petty bourgeoisie is gripped by fever and must inevitably toss from side to side. Meanwhile, the big capitalists are confidently watching for such a turn as will make a beginning for fascism not only as a semi-military organization of bourgeois papas' sons with automobiles and airplanes but as a real mass movement in France.

The workers in June exerted colossal pressure upon the ruling classes, but they did not carry it to its conclusion. They evinced their revolutionary might but also their weakness: the lack of a program and of a leadership. All the props of capitalist society and all of its incurable ulcers remain intact. Now the period is unfolding of the preparations for a counter-pressure: repressions against the left agitators, the increasingly envenomed agitation on the part of the right agitators, experimentation with rising prices, mobilizations of manufacturers for mass lockouts. The trade unions of France which on the eve of the strike hardly numbered one million members are now approaching the five million mark. This unprecedented mass influx is indicative of the feelings that inspire the labor masses. There cannot even be talk that they will permit the costs of their own conquests to be loaded upon themselves without a struggle. The ministers and the official leaders are indefatigable in urging the workers to remain seated peacefully and not to hinder the government while it is working over the solution of problems. But inasmuch as the government, in the nature of things, is incapable of solving any problem whatever; inasmuch as the June concessions were gained thanks to the strike and not patient waiting; inasmuch as every new day will expose the bankruptcy of the government in the face of the developing counter-offensive of capital, these monotonous exhortations will soon lose their potency. The logic of the situation which flows from the June victory, or, rather, to put it more correctly, from the semi-fictitious character of this victory, will compel the workers to accept the challenge, to embark once again upon a struggle. Taking fright at this prospect, the government shifts to the right. Under the direct pressure of the radical allies, but, in the last analysis, upon the demand of the "200 families," the Socialist Minister of Internal Affairs announced in the Senate that no further occupations of factories, stores, and farms by the strikers would be tolerated. A warning of this sort cannot, of course, put a halt to the struggle, but it is capable of making it infinitely more decisive and acute.

An absolutely objective analysis, which proceeds from facts and not desires, thus leads us to the conclusion that a new social conflict is being prepared from two sides, and that it must break out with an almost mechanical inevitability. It is not difficult even at the present time to define in general the nature of this conflict. During all revolutionary periods in history, two successive stages may be established which are closely linked together: first, the "elemental" movement of the masses which catches the opponent off-guard and which extorts serious concessions, or, at any rate, promises; and then the ruling classes, sensing that the foundations of their rule are being threatened, prepare for their revenge. The semi-victorious masses evince impatience. The traditional left leaders, who, like the opponents, were caught unawares by the movement, hope to save the situation by means of conciliatory eloquence, and end by losing their influence. The masses are drawn into a new struggle almost leaderless, without a clear program and without understanding the difficulties ahead. Such a conflict ineluctably arising from the first semi-victory of the masses has often led to their defeat—or semi-defeat. An exception to this rule will hardly be found in the history of revolutions. However, the difference (and it is no slight one) lies in the fact that sometimes the defeat assumes the character of a rout: such for example were the June days, in 1848 in France, which put an end to the revolution; in other cases, however, the semi-defeat proves only a stage toward victory: such a role, for example, was played by the defeat of the Petrograd workers and soldiers in July, 1917. It was precisely the July defeat that accelerated the rise of the Bolsheviki, who were not only able to estimate correctly the situation without any illusions or embellishments but also did not break away from the masses during the most difficult days of failure, sacrifice, and persecution.

Yes, the conservative press is making a sober analysis of the situation. Finance capital with its auxiliary political and military organs cold-bloodedly prepares for revenge. Among the summits of the People's Front there is nothing except confusion and internal strife. The left newspapers are smothered in moral preachments. The leaders choke with phrases. The ministers vie to show the Bourse that they are mature statesmen. Together, all this implies that the proletariat will be drawn into the impending conflict not only without the leadership of its traditional organizations, as was the case in June, but also against them. But there is no generally recognized new leadership in existence as yet. Under such conditions one could hardly count upon immediate victory. An attempt to probe into the future would rather lead one to the following alternative: either June days, 1848, or July days, 1917. In other words: either a rout for many years to come, with the inevitable triumph of fascist reaction, or only a severe lesson in strategy as a result of which the working class will mature, renew its leadership, and prepare the conditions for future victory.

The French proletariat is no novice. It has behind it a great number of epoch-making struggles. True, the new generations have to learn each time from their own experience—but they do not begin from the beginning, nor do they learn everything all over again, but through an abbreviated course, as it were. The great tradition permeates the very marrow of the workers and facilitates the selection of the road. Already in June the anonymous leaders of the awakened class had found methods and forms of struggle with magnificent revolutionary tact. The molecular process of mass consciousness is not being suspended now for a single hour. All this enables us to conclude that the new layer of the leaders not only will remain true to the masses in the days of the inevitable and, probably, not far distant conflict, but will also be able to lead the inadequately prepared army from the battle without a rout.

It is not true that the revolutionists in France are allegedly interested in precipitating the conflict, or "artificially" provoking it. Only the dumbest police minds are capable of thinking so. Marxist revolutionists see their duty in looking clearly into the face of reality and calling things by their names. To make a timely deduction from the objective situation concerning the perspectives of the second stage is to help the advanced workers not to be caught unawares, and to introduce as much clarity as possible into the consciousness of the struggling masses. In this consists at present the task of a serious political leadership.

The Blum Government—Second Phase

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, July 24.

AFTER barely eight weeks of the Front Populaire the enthusiasm which accompanied it into office has made room for a wave of deep discouragement. On the surface nothing untoward has happened. On the contrary. The component parties and groups are if anything more united than ever. The government has acted with vigor and dispatch, driving through both chambers more essential legislation in forty-odd days than its predecessors put on the statute books in an equal number of years. And yet I believe that I am reporting public sentiment faithfully when I say that the people—and particularly those who contributed to the left victory at the polls—are disenchanted. They feel that the government has carried out nearly every article of the Front Populaire program without carrying out the spirit; that its zeal came more from a desire to pacify the voters than from conviction; in a word, that the Blum Cabinet, instead of being the fighting government of their dreams, has turned out to be a set of brakes.

According to these critics, one saw this restraining temper of the ministry during the great strike. It stood by the workers loyally no doubt, and excused the occupation of the plants, but somewhat after the fashion of a law-abiding parent seeking to exculpate a too adventurous youngster who had got into a scrape. They do not exactly blame Blum and his colleagues. It is perhaps natural, they admit, that a government friendly and in debt to labor, and as it were responsible for it, should be somewhat irked by a strike movement whose ultimate form and consequences no man could foresee, coming at the very instant when it arrived in office. They also understand how it was that the government, moved by a complex of fears—of possible disorder, of stoppage in the public services, of famine and confusion, of a rift with the radicals and the middle classes whom they represent, of losing control, of weakening the defenses of the state in so fluid and dangerous an international atmosphere as the present one—exerted itself not to capitalize the magnificent élan of the workers and the vast popular enthusiasm behind it, not to ride the wave toward fundamental reforms in the state machine and the national economy, but to hold the movement within bounds. But they note with melancholy that it was a Socialist-led cabinet that responded in this way, and what is more serious, that having adopted this course it continued in it thenceforward as if by some flaw in temperament. Everything the new government has had to do since then has moved in the same halting, timid tempo. Vincent Auriol's approach to the financial problem, his compromising manner with the banks, the purely legalistic procedure in the decrees dissolving the leagues, and Blum's own attitude at Geneva; everything had a ready-made, superficially hearty and fictitious air of boldness, while in reality it was all quite pedestrian and usual, with more than half an eye on the classes that had something to lose by an upheaval.

When people speak of executing articles and neglecting the program, they have in mind specifically the government's failure to purge the administration of its entrenched foes. In North Africa Peyrouton, the fascist son-in-law of the "radical" Malvy, is still pro-consul, as if nothing at all had changed in Paris, though the whole left press, including Blum's own Populaire, roused by the riots and provocations and race-feuds down there, have for weeks been clamoring for his removal. Meanwhile in Marseilles and in Paris itself the "dissolved" leagues, paralyzed for a time by the seeming energy of the new team, have raised their heads again, and demonstrations unpleasantly reminiscent of the violent and bloody riots of January and February, 1934, occur almost daily. How is it to be otherwise when royalists, fascists, and reactionaries of every shade and stripe are left undisturbed in their posts—in police prefectures, in strategic bureaus, and in the very chancelleries of some of the ministers? Symbolically, it is true, Tannery has been removed from the governorship of the bank of France, and Guichard, the notorious Chiappe's lieutenant, no longer directs the municipal police. But it is precisely this symbolism that many of the most devoted friends of the Front Populaire find it hard to forgive the Front Populaire government. Indeed, it is forever leaning backward lest it be suspected of having revolutionary designs and thereby risk losing the confidence of the financial bigwigs. It has not only kept scrupulously within the constitution; it has hesitated to do a multitude of perfectly legal and indispensable things dictated by self-preservation, which its enemies fully expected it to do and would have respected it for doing. During the campaign, for instance, it was generally known that a number of prefects had improperly used their positions for partisan ends. The Front Populaire having won the elections despite their efforts, they were beginning to pack their bags. Everyone of the eighty-nine is today exactly where he was before April 26. So is every legation secretary, colonial administrator, and finance inspector appointed by Laval and his predecessors. Again, the Action Française carried on a violent, defamatory, panic-raising, and downright seditious campaign during the first week of the new government. Yet, though Maurras and his publisher had been twice convicted under the preceding administration on charges of incitement to murder, both of them are still at large. Last week Blum's own paper, the Populaire, published secret letters of Duke Pozzo di Borgo, La Rocque's former lieutenant, showing clearly that the Croix de Feu, though legally disbanded, are carrying on at the old stand. Has the duke or the count been put behind the bars for evading the law? Not that anyone knows of. And the young toughs arrested for bludgeoning policemen or political opponents are let off with trifling fines or suspended sentences or no penalty whatsoever, exactly as in the days of Chiappe and Guichard.

Sobered citizens who voted for the Front Populaire observe with profound discouragement that when the Socialist-led government decided to find a scapegoat for the disturbances of last month, they looked for it not among the royalists or fascists, who were openly alarming public opinion by campaigns of false news, but on the extreme left among the little band of Trotsky's fourth international. It reminds them of the German Social Democrats and Comrade Noske. "Why," they ask, "must left governments everlastingly go out of their way to placate the enemy instead of rendering him harmless as they were elected to do? What is there about socialists and radicals that causes them to become tamed and cowed the instant they take office? Why don't they retain in power at least a fraction of the audacity they exhibit in opposition?"

If ever there was a time and an opportunity for audacity

it was last June. Seldom if ever in French history has a government come to power on such a wave of popular hope and enthusiasm as this one. To the millions who voted for the Front Populaire the union of the left forces meant one thing—to liquidate the past, to bury the dream of fascist dictatorship in France once and for all. Then, before the government was formed, came the great strike. It created an atmosphere that called for great and bold deeds. Without being revolutionary in origin, it blazed the trail for revolution. The oligarchy was stunned into a mood for large concessions. People compared the night of June 7 when the capital-labor agreements were signed at the Hotel Matignon to the historic August 4, 1789, when the nobles voluntarily relinquished their feudal privileges. During the following week or ten days there was scarcely any length to which the government could not have gone with the hearty approval of the country. Indeed, Jean Pivert, leader of the left-wing socialists, wrote an article in the Populaire captioned "Everything Is Possible." The next day his friend Leon Blum found him a post in the presidency of the Council and got him out of mischief; and the government, painfully mindful of its pledge to operate within the framework of the existing economic order, announced that the occupation of the plants was illegal, and let its historic opportunity pass. For a good while to come the government is condemned to parliamentary log-rolling and compromising for every inch of ground it wins.

I say the government: but in fact all the parties in the Front Populaire, including the Communists—I almost said, especially the Communists—were frightened by the bursting of the labor dam and threw themselves into the task of repairing the damage. It was not the radical press but the communist Humanité that answered Pivert in an editorial warning that "not everything is possible," and saying why: "We regard as impossible a policy which in the face of the Hitler menace would endanger the security of France for which the Front Populaire is responsible." Again, it was Maurice Thorez, the brilliant young leader of the Communists who, though he never questioned "the new legality" of the workers occupying their jobs, exhorted them to "know when to end a strike."

The Front Populaire has been at it for two months now and, urged on from beneath, it has opened fire on the vested interests—on the heavy industries, on the banks, on the grande presse, on the speculators in wheat, on big business generally. It has declared war, but, alas! it is not conducting hostilities with the utmost valor. Fearful of violating its pledge not to tamper with the capitalist order, it is endeavoring at once to tame the great beast and not to injure him. The enterprise seems at this writing a hopeless one, as Leon Blum was the first to anticipate. French capitalism is showing a hitherto unsuspected flexibility in mobilizing its combative resources. Where fascism has triumphed it has done so only after the militant forces of democracy had first unveiled their batteries in a faint-hearted and futile attempt to preserve both liberty and the existing economic order. Such a triumph is one of the great dangers ahead of the present French regime. But it is not the only one, or in my judgment the principal one.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WELL, well—just look at those railroad earnings for June! It actually begins to appear that a government official knew what was better for our rail-transportation companies than the railroads themselves. What a shame that is when the Eastern railway executives have not only berated the Interstate Commerce Commission for making such a drastic cut in passenger fares, but have actually, with the exception of the recreant Baltimore and Ohio, gone into the courts in the hope of having them overrule the commission's order. How will these railroads look in court if it can be shown that this harsh and mistaken action of the commission has actually resulted in largely increased passenger earnings? Yet passenger earnings must account for much of the 17.5 per cent increase in the gross income of the Class 1 roads for June, 1936, over that of June, 1935. Passenger earnings of the New York Central alone increased no less than $548,000, or 11.2 per cent, in June in spite of the drastic cuts.

Now I am well aware that even if the order of the commission had not been put into effect, there would have been a marked improvement in passenger earnings in June because of the increasing prosperity of the country. But I cannot believe that there would have been such an extraordinary increase—remember the new business offset the cuts in fares and then added 11.2 per cent more to the income—if the old fares had been maintained. Nor is the case of the Central an exception. Other roads, it is true, have not done quite as well. But here is the Baltimore and Ohio with a gain for June in passenger income of 16.7 per cent, 5 per cent more than its gain for the first six months of this year. Moreover, almost all the other railroads, excepting certain lame ducks or bankrupts, showed handsome increases in both freight and passenger earnings. It is interesting to note that the passenger earnings of the Northern Pacific Railroad for June show an increase of less than 5 per cent. This railroad like the other Western roads lowered its rates some time ago.

If anybody doubts that there has been a marked improvement in traffic since the change took effect let him go to the stations and see for himself or let him talk with any of the conductors he may happen to be traveling with. They will tell him that there have been great gains. They are the happier to say this because, according to my observation, the men in touch with the operating public have been entirely opposed to the policy of the railroad executives. I recall, for example, a talk about a year ago with an official on the New Haven railroad who was closely in touch with the traveling public. He told me that he and others had repeatedly recommended lowering of the fares because they were certain if that were done and the service speeded up, the railroad could compete successfully with the private automobile—for example, between New Haven and New York. It is now just as cheap, if not a little cheaper, for a man to take the train to places distant one hundred miles or more from New York as to drive in his car, whereas before the reduction he could make a saving of at least two dollars by using his own conveyance. In addition the passenger saves the strain of driving and gains that much time in which to read if he so desires. It is precisely the private motor car which has chiefly done the damage to the railroads; the bus competition has been far less serious. Yet the railroads have persistently refused to compete with the private automobile.

It is not merely the depression that has hurt the railroads. Far more important has been the dry rot which has permeated so many executive offices. The one idea has been to cut expenses, to lay off trains, and to discharge as many employees as possible. There has been no realization that railroads were in no different situation when hit by the depression than other keenly competitive enterprises with services to sell. The forward-looking executive in other lines cut his prices, sought to give better goods and to minister better to the needs of his customers. The railroads refused to adopt this policy except in a few instances. I know of a case in which the New Haven railroad lost a million pounds of freight a year because it would not undertake to haul and deliver this freight a distance of only ten miles, from one factory to another on the same line, under four or five days. The information comes to me from the head of the manufacturing company, who expressed to me his regret that the railroad's lack of enterprise had compelled him to buy trucks to deliver the goods from one factory to the other, which they easily do in about an hour.

It is hardly surprising that we have had to wait for the government to compel the railroads to act in the matter of passenger rates. The credit, I suppose, chiefly belongs to Joseph B. Eastman, the Coordinator of the roads and head of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Yet we are constantly told that if the government should take over the railroads we should face inevitable disaster. I note that Samuel O. Dunn, editor of Railway Age, in a recent address at Cedar Rapids, declared that there is "a spirit of initiative, cooperation, and determination among railway managers and employees that is unequaled in any other industry." Since when? Government ownership, he says, "will be avoided if the public will give the railroads a fair opportunity to regain their earning capacity and credit under private management." Perhaps. But there will have to be vastly better management than we have had in the past or have any reason to expect in the future.

ROY HOWARD, the statesman of the Scripps-Howard newspaper chain, has labored and brought forth a mountainous communication explaining why his papers must refuse to recognize the American Newspaper Guild although they have long had agreements with other A. F. of L. unions in their plants.

Here is the precise language of his message addressed to his employees on the World-Telegram and sent in advance to other newspaper owners to guide them in handling "the Guild problem."

"For about half a century this organization has fought for the right of labor to organize, choose its own representatives, and bargain collectively. . . . When the Guild movement first attracted attention, we hailed it both because we believed it was consistent with our principles, and because we thought that collective bargaining on a national scale would improve editorial working conditions and attract and keep better men in the profession. Our position on all these matters remains the same. But the Guild has injected new issues."

If I may have the privilege of interrupting Mr. Howard for a moment I would like to refresh his memory. The Guild was first started in Cleveland but I believe that Mr. Howard first heard of it through me. At the time I asked him, "What is your attitude going to be?"

"What do you mean what's my attitude going to be?" he said. "You're doing a very silly and evil thing in trying to get reporters into a union. Newspapermen don't belong in any kind of organization. That would rob them of their initiative and take the romance and glamour out of the newspaper business. Still I don't have to worry; this Guild will never get to first base. A good newspaperman will always want to go along under his own steam."

"Oh, I know all those arguments, Roy," I said. "I asked you what your attitude would be."

"Do you mean am I going to fire anybody or discriminate against anybody because he joins the Guild?"

"That's what I meant," I said.

"You ought to know me better than that, Heywood," he replied. "Newspapermen have a legal and a moral right to organize if they're foolish enough to do so and I'm not going to fire or push anybody around or get mad at anybody. I don't suppose I've got any right to get mad at you. I should have known what sort of a fellow you were when I hired you—a man who's always going to be interested in any goddam thing but his job."

Later Roy Howard met a Guild committee and said flatly that under no circumstances would he sign any sort of agreement except with his own employees. In all fairness to Mr. Howard I do not know of any case of a World-Telegram employee being fired for Guild activity. I think some have been pushed around a little but that may be my imagination. I go into these things at some length because the publishers are creating a fiction that they welcomed the Guild in the beginning and drew away from it later because it became too rambunctious. It was never welcomed by the publishers. But let Mr. Howard talk again:

"By a recorded vote of 83 to 5, taken at its 1936 convention, the Guild stands finally committed to a policy borrowed from the mechanical trades, the effect of which is that nobody who is not committed by membership to the policies of the Guild can be employed in editorial production. The Guild Reporter of June 15, 1936, records further resolutions condemning the two existing political parties, recommending 'independent political action on the part of labor' and 'cooperation (by Guilds and officers) with local and state-wide farmer-labor parties and with other labor groups for the purpose of providing independent political action of labor.'

"The effect of these actions, taken together, is that nobody can write for a newspaper who is not of the Guild, and nobody can be loyal to the Guild who is not committed against both of the political parties of which 90 per cent of our population are members. . . . It is along this line that minority pressure groups have proceeded in Italy, Russia, and Germany with a resultant destruction of free and independent journalism."

Now Roy Howard knows very well that free press under Hitler and under Mussolini was not destroyed by the labor unions. He knows perfectly well that the Guild includes Democrats, Townsendites, Constitutional Democrats, Socialists, Prohibitionists, Communists, and maybe a few Republicans. The resolution to which Mr. Howard refers spoke of a "lower-case" farmer-labor party. It was the expression of a hope that some day a party might be formed which would undertake as one of its chief objects the protection of the rights of reporters and other workers. If such a party came into being a majority of delegates felt it should be endorsed. A member who thought otherwise would remain in 100 per cent good standing.

Again Mr. Howard is inaccurate in saying that the Guild has asked for a closed shop in which only Guild members can be employed. The Guild would like to get a shop in which the management could hire whomsoever it pleased with the proviso that at the end of a stipulated period that person must become a member of the Guild. The Evening Post which has operated under this system for more than a year has made the largest circulation gains of any newspaper in the evening field in New York.

Scripps-Howard editors meet every Presidential year to decide which candidate to support. Editorial employees might very well want to have the same privilege. They might be loath to take political advice from an editor, even though he be a great liberal like Roy Howard, who thinks and talks in terms of "the two existing political parties." We might think of other possibilities and reject Roy Howard's regimentation. Newspaper workers must choose between being gelded or guilded. HEYWOOD BROWN

IT BROADENS THE MIND

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

I SAILED on the Holland America line. Forty-eight hours out, or just about the time one usually gets over feeling that one would just as soon not know anyone on this boat, I met a Dutch bulb merchant who delighted me. He had spent much time in America and admired us greatly—especially our wit. For the first three years, he said, he did not understand it but was now keenly appreciative. Pressed for examples that had especially delighted him, he gave two. One was the notice posted in a small resort hotel:

We'll keep your car
And watch your baby
But don't ask credit
And we don't mean maybe.

The other was a sign in a fish store: "If it swims we have it." Too bad that the foreigners who write books about us usually do not understand our culture.

In Paris the strike begins suddenly and proceeds with the greatest calm. One wonders what has become of "the red fool fury of the Seine" and, if one is an American, when the strikebreakers will be brought in. A French Communist acquaintance who mistakes my comment on the lack of violence for a reproach assures me earnestly that all revolutions begin thus and that the blood will flow in good time. For the moment at least, it doesn't. Here and there a red flag goes up over some factory building alongside of the tricolor but a municipal body decides that the red flag is not the flag of a foreign power; it is only a symbol susceptible of various interpretations. Sometimes it merely means "Danger." One violent controversy does rage, but it is over the question of whether or not the male and female workers shut up in the factories for the night do or do not form amorous attachments. Humanité states indignantly that revolutionary workers are always chaste. La Fouchardière in L'Oeuvre hopes that they are not. Looking down from a bridge over the Seine at a life-saving boat one sees a large inscription chalked on the deck: "The crew of this boat is on strike. It is forbidden to throw one's self into the water."

Epitaph for a bad poet published in a Parisian newspaper: "Les vers se venge." Surely that must have been thought of before now.

In a large cafe-restaurant on the left bank there is a very pretty young girl who floats about from group to group and is obviously at home there. "Who do you suppose she is?" asks one American. "I think I saw her on the bill-of-fare," says the other, pointing to an item: "Tarte Maison."

At the Reform Club in London a member points out to me a historic spot. It is a large marble star in the floor of the huge entrance hall. Smoking is forbidden, but there, on his first visit, Arnold Bennett—who had somehow got elected despite the fact that he was not a gentleman—planted himself in the exact center of the hall with a huge cigar in his mouth and his thumbs in his pockets. He was dressed in a checked suit with canary-colored sweater. Old members gathered in excited groups in each of the four corners but nothing was done about it.

From everyone I have talked to in London, no matter what his political opinions, I get the impression that England has been losing her nerve. Many Americans "fear Germany" but they have no conception of the immediacy of that fear as the Englishman feels it, nor do they, as he does, contemplate the possibility of actual conquest in the near future. England has lost the old sense that she is invincible. She had been losing it bit by bit for several years and the collapse of sanctions was the final blow, not only to pride but to self-confidence as well. And the most significant fact is that her people are united in their humiliation in nothing else. Except for the comparatively small group of pure and thorough-going pacifists, no one can put the blame squarely on anyone else. So far as the conservatives are concerned, it was their own government which imposed and then lifted sanctions. And the Liberals who supported them in the beginning hesitate now to say that they would have been willing to fight the war which they cannot categorically deny stiffer sanctions would have brought. It is not a pleasant thing to have one's bluff called. It is no pleasanter to be compelled to wonder whether or not the bluff would have worked if it had been pushed a little further, and to fear that there was not enough to back it up with.

Entomological note: Going up in the hotel elevator my companion brushes something from her sleeve. Unaware of the horrible implications of the Americanism she remarks, "A lady-bug," to the horror of the elevator man, who obviously does not understand how anyone could imply so damning a charge in so casual a manner. He makes a careful examination and exhales a sigh of relief. "Oh, it's only one of them butterflies."

Item in the "Personals" column of the London Times for June 30, 1936: "In Memoriam: Ernst Roehm."

Bertrand Russell asked me why Roosevelt hesitates to solve his problems by stuffing the Supreme Court with new judges. Until he told me, I did not know that exactly the same expedient was resorted to in England at the time of the peace of Utrecht when the king appointed new peers until he had a majority in the House of Lords. Twice since a threat to use the same methods did the trick.

While I was in London Salvadore Dali gave a lecture on surrealism before a large and very fashionable audience. He was dressed in a deep-sea-diver's costume and flanked on each side by wolfhounds. I did not go, though I am very fond of dogs.

Coming back on the Britannic we had the movie about the Dionne babies and life in the lumber camps. It was good, but I could not help thinking that at the very same moment men in lumber camps were probably looking at movies about people who cross the ocean on big liners. The moral of this may occur to me later.

Also on the boat we got wireless news that some hospital assistant in Russia had been sentenced to ten years imprisonment for a fatal mistake in injecting a serum. The thing is understandable enough, but it illustrates the tendency to be brutal toward one type of offender when one is lenient toward another. Are there any arguments against the tendency of society to revenge itself upon law breakers which would not be equally applicable to the new Russian tendency to take revenge on the inefficient? Will this unfortunate gentleman be any more trustworthy after a stay in jail? Or is it, like the execution of Admiral Byng, pour encourager les autres?

A Latin epigram translates something like this:

"Marcellus does not seem to be much improved by travel."

"Well, he had himself for company."

Axle Song

BY MARK VAN DOREN

That any thing should be—
Place, time, earth, error—
And a round eye in man to see:
That was the terror.

And a true mind to try
Cube, sphere, deep, short, and long—
That was the burden of the sky's
Hoarse axle song.

Improbable the stoat—
The mouse, toad, worm, wolf, tiger;
Unthinkable the stallion's trot,
Behemoth's swagger.

Unspeakable; yet worse—
Name, look, feel, memory, and number:
Man there with his perverse
Power not to slumber.

Let things created sleep—
Rock, beast, rain, sand, and sliding river.
So growled the earth's revolving heap;
And will forever.

BOOKS

The American Child-Soul

SELECTED POEMS OF VACHEL LINDSAY. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

AFTER reading Edgar Lee Masters's biography of Lindsay, it would be easy to say that the present selection of poems is a document of tragic history. It would seem that the verse collected here has its logical conclusion in suicide; but the actual pity of it lies in its lack of tragic fulfillment, its lack of resolution in phrase and content; one must at last read "pathos" for "tragedy," read "pity" for "grief," and set down more often than not the merits of facility rather than felicity.

It may seem strange to think of Lindsay as a fragmentary poet, to think of him (who, as the dust jacket reminds us, "reached a larger audience than any other modern poet") as inarticulate, at times obscure, essentially misunderstood, incomplete, unfinished. It was his misfortune never to know precisely what he was saying; he was never to draw a clear line between fancy and imagination and was never to recognize his natural confusion in an equal admiration for George Washington, Andrew Jackson, Robert E. Lee, Abraham Lincoln, Whitman, Emerson, Bryan, Altgeld, Johnny Appleseed, and Mary Pickford. He saw in each (perceptively enough) significant reference to a pioneer America; and he saw them all related to a past that was already dying as were "the flower-fed buffaloes of the spring." To sustain his lack of discrimination in the use of word as well as symbol, he clung to the cult of child-worship:

For every soul is a circus,
And every mind is a tent
And every heart is a sawdust ring
Where the circling race is spent.

The images of the mind as a tent, the heart as a sawdust ring are, of course, among the curious fancies that drifted through Lindsay's mind. They are not, however, poetry, and because they are not, defeat their purpose as convincing propaganda for bigger and better circuses to keep alive the child-soul of Lindsay's America.

Mr. Masters's biography furnishes adequate psychiatric explanation as to why Lindsay till his death at fifty-two refused to mature and why his only answer to a hostile world was a retreat into the dreams of adolescence. The case history, however, would be quite unimportant if it did not extend to the relationship of the poet to his work. Yet Lindsay as poet was to exhibit the same behavior; he was to justify his esthetic by the immediate responses of those who heard him read. He became a poet whose art depended upon one-night-stand performances; he was to be seen and heard, not read, or, if read at all, read once, preferably aloud, the reader following each stage direction written on the margin of the page. From here onward the importance of Lindsay's audience emerges. He was to tramp the country making his appeal to the people of America's lower middle class, to farmers' wives, to club women; and in the back of his mind remained the images of his father and mother, the Campbellite church, his high-school teacher. It was to these he spoke, making them uneasy because he was neither business man nor preacher, but perhaps an artist, spelled with a capital A, perhaps someone who sought for beauty with a capital B. He had trained himself to

One of the few significant writers in America has here created his greatest story—a powerful many-sided novel of a group of our contemporaries during the last fifteen years. New York, Washington, Detroit, Hollywood, Miami—politics, aviation, advertising, speculation, the movies—these are the places and the channels through which the Big Money has been flowing in the past two decades in America, and they furnish the themes and setting for this novel.

The present economic situation challenges men and women to the same sort of fresh observation which led to a reformulation of economic and political principles at the time of Adam Smith. Economic theory as it has long been taught now rests on a set of assumptions which no longer correspond with the facts. This book takes our economic system apart and examines it squarely and realistically. Written for the layman, it is designed as an aid to fresh thinking in the face of the failure of traditional economic theory.

listen for the immediate response, the quick, loud hand-clap, the laughter, the almost visible thrill of fear to "Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you," and the repetition of the lines would intensify the effect upon a first-night audience. I think I do not exaggerate when I say that it is likely that Lindsay expended more energy in the recitation of his verse than in the writing of it. It was literally a one-man show; Lindsay as dramatist, actor, poet, barker, artist, propagandist for a horse-and-buggy, Campbellite-Swedenborgian, child-like America all in one. It must be remembered that he had written most convincingly of Bryan, the boy orator, the best of all his American heroes, and it was toward Bryan's æsthetic that Lindsay moved. The music of the old-fashioned brass band, the music of the "kallyope" was the kind of music Lindsay attempted to restore (if not preserve) in poetry. He hated jazz as bitterly as Byron resented the popularity of the waltz; he wrote "a curse for the saxophone." The object of his long crusade was to capture the respect, the admiration of Springfield, Illinois, the town where he was born: he made little pen-and-ink sketches of Springfield as the center of the universe; he tried to think of Springfield (and not very successfully) as the ideal city set at the heart of a Swedenborgian democracy. His failure was a pathetic fallacy in verse as well as in philosophy.

To reread Lindsay one must look for fragments of poetry scattered throughout the many poems, the few happy phrases which are likely to remain as catch words of a midwestern pioneer culture: "flower-fed buffalo," "factory windows are always broken," "pitchfork Tillman and sledge-hammer Altgeld," "lean-rat Platt," and with these the Biblical reference in the language of the Bible Belt, "Here comes Jonah and the whale, and the Sea!" For the rest one becomes increasingly aware that Lindsay's efforts to revive an American past were ineffectual: "General William Booth [who by the way was not an American] Enters Heaven" remains a successful tour de force; and something of the same strength is to be rediscovered perennially in "The Congo." There is little doubt, I think, that the best of Lindsay's work will remain as museum pieces in any future history of American pioneer culture. These, like the cigar-store Indians of a half century ago, will be unearthed to be forgotten and then unearthed again. Then there will be neither grief nor pity for Lindsay's self-destruction: and for the man as well as the poet there will be something of the same emotion he once felt for Bryan:

Where is that boy . . .

That Homer Bryan who sang from the West?

HORACE GREGORY

The Freudian Technique

TWENTIETH CENTURY PSYCHIATRY. By William A. White. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

PRACTICAL ASPECTS OF PSYCHOANALYSIS. By Lawrence Kubie. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago when the bright young psychiatrists—not to mention the even brighter and younger novelists, poets, and biographers—of America were mouthing his tentative new doctrine as though it were a holy creed, Sigmund Freud viewed his votaries with a slight skepticism. Such idolatrous and uncritical enthusiasm might, he was afraid, hinder rather than help the gradual maturation of his theories in this country. From these two books, both written by early disciples, one may judge how prophetic his skepticism has proved to be.

placed by more direct and simple methods, but psychoanalysis as a therapeutic technique remains the most important tool of practicing psychiatrists. And here two outstanding members of that profession give us their personal estimates of how efficient the instrument is. Dr. White, who does not confine himself to Freudianism alone but discusses mental hygiene and the social and philosophical aspects of psychiatry as well, is cautious in his evaluation. Psychoanalysis, he points out, has not yet superseded all other possible methods of dealing with mental disorders. Specifically, it is still of little use to the institutional physicians who must treat the truly malignant psychoses. But when applied to the simpler neuroses—the worries and anxieties and fears and phobias which beset and subconsciously bedevil more normal men and women—it usually produces results. And that, he thinks, is justification enough. Psychoanalysis may not be a science, but it is a highly successful pragmatic technique. "The fact happens to be that patients who are subjected to this procedure do get well."

This statement seems modest and fair enough until one ponders it critically; then doubts arise. How many patients do get well? How well do they become? What is the criterion of their wellness? And who are its judges? Dr. White does not answer these more practical questions in detail, but Dr. Kubie does—definitely, emphatically, and with a superbly naive arrogance. There is not space here to give all of his arguments, but briefly they are these:

Everyone who is correctly analyzed by a properly trained Freudian must get well. If he does not seem to improve, that is because no one except the analyst knew how sick he was in the first place. If he actually does get worse instead of better, that is in no sense the analyst's responsibility but the fault of either the stubborn patient, his interfering family, his unsympathetic friends, or that old bogey-man, his family doctor. Therefore, there are only two possible judges of any single analysis: the physician who performs it and, eventually, the patient who is satisfied with its outcome. No one else—not even another psychiatrist—has the right to evaluate it, for no one else could possibly understand what it was all about.

That being the situation as Dr. Kubie sees it, the conscientious analyst must delegate to himself certain rights of his "patients" which few self-respecting persons would willingly give up. He must, in the first place, "convince" them that they need to be analyzed. Then, when he sees fit, he must advise them to leave their homes, throw up their jobs, change their family doctors, and divorce their wives. And, most important of all, he must persuade each one of them that a good analysis is always worth at least $3,000, which must be paid at once even though the paying may mean exhausting many years' savings or borrowing against a possible future inheritance.

It is perhaps unfortunate that Dr. Kubie's book should be considered in close relationship to Dr. White's, for the latter makes an idealistic plea to the practicing analyst to look searchingly into his own procedures and "with that rare, unprejudiced, critical ability which is part of the well trained, well balanced scientific mind . . . go forward with his researches unhampered by any other motive than the search for truth." Yet Dr. Kubie as a practicing analyst, and a highly successful one (he is on the staff of both the New York Neurological Institute and the College of Physicians and Surgeons), proves himself far less able to assume the impersonal, disinterested attitude of a scientist than are any of the "faith healers" whom he denounces so righteously. Of that "wishful thinking" about which the Freudians talk so glibly Dr. Kubie's smug justification of the shoddy practices of his craft is one of the most flagrant examples on record.

GRACE ADAMS

A Hamilton of South Africa

GENERAL SMUTS. By Sarah Gertrude Millin. Volume I. Little, Brown, and Company. $3.50.

JAN SMUTS belongs to the fabulous species of "great men" who appear but occasionally and according to no easily recognizable law. Exemplars of the species are commonly supposed to fascinate by their defects as by their virtues, and Miss Millin, interviewing "supporters and opponents" of Smuts in South Africa, found them "equally puzzled by something outside precedent." It becomes clear during the course of this volume, however, that opponents at the Cape outnumber the supporters and have managed during the last twenty years to relegate Smuts to a place of secondary importance. And Miss Millin, though worshipping without false shame, is by no means too hypnotized to overlook the shortcomings of her hero.

The truth is, perhaps, that Smuts was essentially a religious man nourishing his soul on the Old Testament and recognizing no yardstick but his own Puritan conscience. It was his characteristic belief that "the Greeks were only beautiful youths, but the Jews were always men—strong, unyielding men." He was the first to concede his own lack of taste or humor, and besides making it a point to abstain from drinking, smoking, and card-playing, abhorred dancing and hunting from his youth. More seriously, he had almost no capacity for human contact and felt embarrassed even in the presence of his children: "I am what newspapers would call a distinguished stranger to them." In matters of statesmanship he consulted no one and in the field informed no one of his intentions. When the occasion demanded the use of military force to break a strike or execute a traitor, his simple justification in the face of popular outcry was his "duty." It need hardly be pointed out that such men, while they often may have been outstanding, are never representative of their peoples, and are dangerous to be trusted as leaders.

It is significant that, of all Americans, Smuts seems to admire most Alexander Hamilton, for his own tragedy bears a definite similarity to that of Hamilton. Fired by a vision of South Africa's awakening and seeing the world through the eyes of Cecil Rhodes, he rallied to the cause of his backward people at the news of the Jameson raid. The war subsequently proved the young Cambridge-trained lawyer a military leader of the first rank. Three years after the peace of Vereeniging he went to England and received the fiercely demanded but unhoped for gift: self-government for the Transvaal. Like Hamilton, he then pushed on toward the unification of South Africa, became its first Minister of Finance, and proceeded to run the cabinet of General Botha. When his usefulness there was at an end, he took up the conquest of the German colonies, as thoroughly convinced of the iniquitousness of German imperialism as he was of the righteousness of the British. It brought him no new popularity at the Cape, but in England he was feted as no foreign statesman had been, and invited to sit in Lloyd George's war cabinet. The role he was to play at Versailles—how he was to fall completely under the spell of another "great" American—is too well known for rehearsal here.

The problem of Smut's political career is essentially the problem of leadership and modern imperialism today. As such, Miss Millin's almost too well written biography—the second volume of which has still to be published in this country—should prove of more than incidental contemporary interest.

The SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE

By DR. HELENA B. WRIGHT

M.B.B.S.

Practicing Gynecologist in London

Over 60,000 Copies Sold

MANY married couples . . . lack the right understanding and enjoyment of the sex-act itself. It is to help such people that this book is written. The writer wants to give such definite and practical information that no one after reading it can any longer be ignorant of the nature of the sex-act, or fail to know exactly how it should be performed."

"I have a high opinion of Dr. Helena Wright's SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE. There is probably no better small manual in simple language for married people." —HAVELOCK ELLIS

"Dr. Wright, from a scientific attitude and a wide practical experience of such cases, has written a most valuable and a greatly needed book. She writes without sentimentality or evasion, of the sex organs and the sex act. She explains the difficulties of intercourse during the honeymoon and after; gives actual and explicit information about the sensations of the sex act, the behavior of each partner in mutual stimulation, and of the climax, exhilaration and relaxation which should be found in it. She describes the variety and the perfection which may be aimed at in the art of love-making . . . a most valuable and greatly needed book."

—The Journal (England)

"This book contains very detailed information about the ways in which the physical intimacies of married life may be successfully and happily managed. It is addressed to those about to be married in the hope that it may save them from mistakes and sufferings which have darkened married life for thousands of couples."

—From the Introduction by Rev. A. Herbert Gray, D.D.

"THE SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE certainly represents a free, frank, simple exposition of the details of the technic for facilitating sexual harmony. Doctor Wright has written with dignity, honesty and authority. Her experience as a gynecologist, a missionary and a mother finds expression in her understanding of vital human relationships. . . . Thoughtful physicians will have numerous occasions to recommend this volume to those who desire intelligent guidance."

—American Medicine.

"We have no hesitation in saying that the book is by far the frankest and yet most refined of any written on the subject of the sex factor in marriage."

—SHERWOOD EDDY, in The World Tomorrow.

Biography and Romance

DANTON, DICTATOR OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Hermann Wendel. Yale Press. $3.75.

BEAUMARCHAIS, ADVENTURER IN THE CENTURY OF WOMEN. By Paul Frischauer. The Viking Press. $3.50.

ARGUMENTS about the right way to write history are no doubt very entertaining for they never seem to stop and the "new" history is regularly rediscovered every twenty-three years. Occasionally, however, one comes across two or three books in rapid succession which, belonging to the same category of history-writing, nevertheless diverge so widely in their effect that all questions of method or fashion sink into irrelevance.

The two volumes under review provide just such an experience. They are both biographies of the newest new kind, with novelistic passages recreated by means of the authors' imagination; they are both about figures closely connected with the French Revolution; and they are both written by German scholars who show considerable erudition. This coincidence makes one feel that a contrast is not unjust, for the two works are alike save in the single respect under consideration: their effect. One work is a plausible biography; the other is mainly fanciful nonsense.

Mr. Wendel's book about Danton is fittingly inscribed to the spirit of Georg Büchner, the neglected German dramatist of the Romantic period whose play about Danton was revealed to the world at large some ten years ago by Max Reinhardt, and whose complete works have been recently issued in English by the Viking Press. In his conception of the pock-marked lawyer who went in for daring, Mr. Wendel owes much to Büchner. For his elaboration of the figure living through day-to-day events of volcanic magnitude he must thank only his own keen sense of political realities. One may be tempted to quarrel with the anachronism of the idea of modern dictatorship, transported backward into French revolutionary times, when telephone, telegraph, newspapers, and radio were unluckily wanting. At the same time, Mr. Wendel possesses a vigorous yet accurate style as well as a decent respect for the facts painfully extracted from the mass of archives by the labors of Hamel, Aulard, and Mathiez. His "effect," in other words, has the right to call itself an interpretation. In the great swinging quarrel between Robespierrists and Dantonists, the author holds his balance creditably. Indeed he breaks down only in the description of Danton's wife, about whom he feels it necessary to produce some very fifth-rate pathos of no authenticity whatsoever.

Mr. Frischauer had in a sense a more difficult task, for Beaumarchais was never a foreground figure. Whether he was "an adventurer in the century of women" or not is hard to tell. I for one have not the remotest idea what the phrase means. The book itself gives no enlightenment on that score, men and women occurring in it in the normal ratio, but—to make up for this obscurity—it is all too clear that Mr. Frischauer's biographical gift should exercise itself solely on the heroes of the Monte Carlo game-room and the figures of the secret service. That aspect of Beaumarchais's career—spying and speculation—has unjustly colored for the author the entire life of his subject. The result is an atmosphere of padded footsteps and secret panels behind which people count heaps of gold. This may also explain perhaps why the book is bound in a sort of leather cunningly worked to imitate cloth. Almost all the general allusions to the events of the times are erroneous and the later eighteenth century is reduced to the outworn conventionality of petty intrigues. Romanced biography, like veridical history, demands imagination, but the worth of the one as of the other depends upon the quality of that ingredient. In creating out of the blue Mr. Frischauer is below Dumas, and in deviating into absurdity he is beyond Carlyle.

Shorter Notices

THANKSGIVING BEFORE NOVEMBER. By Norman Macleod. New York: The Parnassus Press. $2.

The facts about Mr. Macleod's second book resemble those about his first, "Horizons of Death," published something over a year ago. His talent is positive; his subjects are genuine and deeply felt; and his subjects are enacted in fresh idioms. Each volume contains fifteen or so successful short poems, and in both books the most successful poems are those which combine emotion about people with emotion about landscape. In each, likewise, combinations of statement and image achieve a mood. Beyond the mood, and the uncertain excitements of implication to which the mood is limited, his success has not gone so far. His more ambitious poems—those that struggle to represent the ultimate, the actual—are comparative failures. Mr. Macleod is at that critical stage in the career of talent beyond which most poets never pass. It is the crisis of choice of direction. He has to choose between the infinite drudgery of craft which gives poetry its maximum actuality and what is in the end the worse drudgery of letting the poetic impulse run down—as his worst poems do—in language conceived as a medium of personal expression. Mr. Macleod's most urgent need at present is that of a form external to the form in which his moods find him. In the labor to find form lies the only hope his poetry has for maturity. R. P. BLACKMUR

STRANGE HOUSES. By Cora Jarrett. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

With flyleaf quotations from Pareto, Hawthorne, and Poe, a pretentious "Forward in Praise of the Hypothetical," and enough remarks about Boris Sidis, Morton Prince, and William James to show that Mrs. Jarrett has been reading up on her psychology, one embarks on this Sunday School excursion into the domain of the double personality with a certain degree of hope. But by the time one has been introduced to the bashfully brilliant psychiatrist, Clifford Rearfield, the weakly delicate Vera MacAndrew (who bruises her heart with every lump in her throat), to say nothing of the tycoon, Rodney Breen (whose plutocratic beneficence would flatter even a Liberty Leaguer), one begins to blush at man's awesome goodness. And when one reads of "ladies of station," and comes on gentlemanly dialogue like "Confound you, Rearfield," or "I can't repeat to you what she said. It was sacred," then there is nothing left but to reach for a handkerchief and a bag of sachet. If, however, one has the stamina to suffer Mrs. Jarrett's sentimental snobbery long enough to rouse up a "terrifying sense" of the "essential mysteriousness" of the emotionally askew, then ultimately one may revel in a plot whose studied intricacy would grace a Gothic romance. When "Strange Houses" is presently cut and dramatized—as it doubtless will be—to fit the Hollywood horror mold, then it can be criticized on its proper level. As it is written it can be taken seriously only by those "ladies of breeding" who are fearful (like Mrs. Jarrett) of "it's getting too grim for my light touch."

LEIGH WHITE

CLANSMEN. By Ethel Boileau. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Dedicated to "all Scots in exile," this novel is written as a reminder of Scotland's great national past and as a tribute to the ancient though sadly declining virtues of the clan spirit. In a prologue which summarizes the history of the Stuart family from 1747 to 1900 Miss Boileau sketches the gradual extinction of the clan as a formal institution. The moral of the tale would appear to be that a fixed difference in social station, instead of being incompatible with ideals of brotherhood, loyalty, and sacrifice, is indeed a condition for these virtues. Alan Stuart is a captain in the army, Hector, his kinsman and servant, a private; Alan rides ponies in India, Hector grooms them; Alan lords it over Ardbreck, Hector is a devoted retainer; Alan marries the girl, and his clansman murders her blackmailer. The supreme gesture is made by Hector when he withholds from his Highland chieftain the knowledge that they are brothers by illegitimacy. To reinforce the moral, several violently unskilful thrusts are made at the Labor Party and the Soviet Union, whose supporters are invariably identified with sex-careless gin-sots. Miss Boileau possesses a tireless talent for commercial success—her "A Gay Family" crowded the best-seller lists—and she has left no secret of popular fiction unmolested. The prologue satisfies a taste for chronicle, the wordy enthusiasm over Scottish mists and tweed engages our travel curiosity, and the political aberrations give a contemporary lift to the sure-fire themes of family conflict, kinsman loyalty, and triumphant love. GREEK LYRIC POETRY: FROM ALCMAN TO SIMONIDES. By C. M. Bowra. Oxford University Press. $7.50.

Like all good poetry Greek lyric verse of the seventh and sixth centuries was precise in its imagery. Because we have only fragments of it, and because we know so little of the life and thought of the period, its finer allusions escape the uninstructed reader. He requires a guide who is at the same time a literary critic, a philologist, and a historian. Possessing all these qualifications, Mr. Bowra, a fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, is able to throw new light upon many a well-known passage, such as this from Alcman: "No longer, maidens with honey tones and voices of desire, can my limbs carry me. Would, ah would, that I were a kingfisher, who flies with the halcyons over the flower of the waves, having a fearless heart, the holy sea-blue bird." This no longer appears as merely the vague expression of romantic desire for youth and escape when it is pointed out that, according to a piece of ancient bird lore, the male halcyon when old was believed to be carried on the wings of his females, and that the poem was possibly addressed to a chorus of maidens called the Halcyons. It becomes a tissue of ingeniously woven references, each with a specific object. By similar means Mr. Bowra is able to individualize the old poets. Ibycus, for example, emerges as a metaphysical poet who "describes an abstract and subjective situation in metaphors drawn from life," and Simonides appears not as a platitudinous moralizer but as a revolutionary critic of aristocratic values. Of special relevance to current discussions is the treatment of Greek poetry in relation to its social and political background, which determined its two main divisions. Thus choral poetry found its home in Dorian lands, where "the individual was less important than his clan or city"; the monody or personal lyric on the other hand, flourished in Ionia, "where there was no great tradition of communal experience." The Dove and the Falcon

ELIZABETH Tudor wrote a letter, after Mary Stuart had fled from Scotland, saying that she could not "slay the dove which, pursued by a falcon, has flown to me for help." It was she, of course, not John Knox, who was the falcon and she had every intention of slaying the dove. This powerful figure has become, in "Mary of Scotland" (Music Hall) a petulant harpy. Dudley Nichols—one presumes the scenarist is responsible—has reduced her from history's and Maxwell Anderson's practiced, Machiavellian ruler to the flighty and jealous step-sister of Mary Stuart's Cinderella. Mr. Nichols had the story-teller's right to tamper with history—in detail the film is actually more accurate than the play—but what did he hope to gain by the change? If he intended by reducing Elizabeth's stature to raise Mary's, so that Miss Hepburn could really be the star, he has not done so. Miss Hepburn is the star, all right, but her Mary Stuart reminds one of nothing so much as her Babbie in "The Little Minister"—both are Scottish, in love, and that's all. If Elizabeth's proportions had been retained Mary would have become interesting if only because of what she had to contend with. Her troubles make an unusually long film, but it is typical that the revelation of their source, when the two queens meet at the end, instead of the fine climax it should have been, is, like the characters, feeble.

As an object the film makes an impressive appearance. But good-looking movies are as common as good-looking movie stars in America; both are matters of re-shooting until the best aspect is photographed, and Hollywood still has the best equipment for the job. Excellent technicians are common; sumptuous production, in good taste, like that which Pandro S. Berman has given this picture, is becoming almost as common. What is not common is superior story-telling. "The Informer," a film which lacked the familiar looks to such an extent that most people thought it foreign, proved the abilities of director John Ford and scenarist Dudley Nichols as story-tellers, but they have not repeated their performance here.

To the defect of Mr. Nichols which I have suggested is added the further one of undistinguished diction. He has stated that Mr. Anderson's verse was eschewed because it might sound "stilted" on the screen, but the few lines which strike the ear with force are those retained from the play. Mr. Ford's chief fault lies in allowing production details—settings, costumes, stars—to submerge the story, and in his dependence on devices which worked in "The Informer," to click mechanically again: the Dublin street-singer sings a Scottish air and this time is altogether phony; the People are represented by portraits of "types" who are decorative and unreal, unlike the Irish citizens. But his talent is nonetheless evident. The first good filmic moment comes when Bothwell's pipers drown out Knox's tirade against Mary with their "own bags of wind": the waves of sound begin far outside the courtyard and gradually swell the frame of the screen as the pipers march in, until Knox's roar has become pantomime. The use of "stage" lighting to achieve fadeouts is quite effective in at least two instances: when Huntly in answer to Darnley's "What shall I do?" tosses a dagger on the table and the room darkens until only the glistening blade is visible; and in the trial scene when Mary, who has stood in defiance of the judges, sinks in defeat on to a stool and lights sink with her.

Miss Hepburn as Mary, like the picture, makes an impressive appearance. The choice of Florence Eldridge as Elizabeth is a piece of casting worthy of the scenarist's concept; she wears a sour look, talks loudly and indistinctly, and when she isn't shaking a fan in someone's face scrutinizes her own in a mirror. Fredric March shows surprising vigor after his recent lethargic performances; Douglas Walton as the effeminate Darnley is catarrhal and embarrassing; and John Carradine, as an Iago-like Rizzo, lurks expertly. The music, in the main sentimentalized versions of simple Scottish airs, compares curiously with the short snatch of harpsichord dance-tune at the Elizabethan court.

GYPSIES (Cameo): Battle of wits between a crafty gypsy chief and craftier kolkhoz officials. All done in good humor, with delightful acting—especially that of Alexander Granach, a German exile, as Danilo the chief. The photography, like the production, is uneven but such shots as the panoramic views of the gypsy caravan and such scenes as the soliloquy of Yudko (N. Mordvinov) in the wheat field and the duel with whips in the forest, the antics of Senka (P. Sanin) and Granach's performance make it a film decidedly worth seeing.

I WAS A CAPTIVE OF NAZI GERMANY (Globe): The document of Isobel Steele, made with bad actors and worse equipment. Unlikely to persuade anyone who is not already convinced Germany has an oppressive government.

RECORDS

THE readers of this column are, I assume, interested in the music that is sometimes designated as "cultivated"—the word designating the complexity and subtlety both of the tonal construction and of the feeling which is crystalized in the tonal construction. They are interested in this music as it is performed by artists who, in their shaping of the phrase or of the larger structure, reveal qualities of musical taste, sensitiveness, feeling and imagination that are impressive in their own right. And I wish to speak of a type of popular music that has similar claims to interest—a type known as "hot." I will assume that jazz, to most of these readers, means a tune by Geršwin or Kern or Porter, in a slick performance by one of the well publicized bands like Whiteman's, or a more actively offensive performance by people like Duchin and Green. The popular music I wish to speak of is different—the difference being in the performance; and it deserves attention, not because it is the American equivalent of a Mozart symphony or the material from which such an equivalent will be derived—in other words, not as cultivated music, which it is not, but solely as popular music, and because within the emotional and structural limitations of popular music it exhibits qualities of musical taste, sensitiveness, feeling, and imagination that are impressive.

Consider, for example, a performance of "I Surrender, Dear" by Red Norvo and his Swing Septet on Columbia 2977-D (I give the name of the band only to identify the record; the personnel behind the name may change with each recording session). In this performance there are two statements of a tune that comprises four eight-measure phrases in the pattern a a b a. The trombone plays the first two phrases, and plays them quite as the composer wrote them, with only occasional and slight ornamental turns and flourishes that are part of the player's own playing style. The saxophone continues with b, and the trombone returns to conclude not with a, but with a phrase improvised by the player to fit into a's place, into its harmonic setting and entire context. And here we have a distinguishing characteristic of this type of performance: When Schnabel plays Beethoven, his feeling and taste operate within the limits set by Beethoven's printed directions for performance—directions that specify the pitch and duration of notes and their loudness; and though we hear Beethoven through the mind of Schnabel, nevertheless it is essentially Beethoven that we hear; Schnabel's performance is merely interpretive. But the trombonist we have just heard produced something new; his playing of the last phrase constituted an exercise of the inventive skill and taste of a creative musician; and how considerable these can be, on the musical level on which they operate, one may hear in what follows. Throughout the first statement of the tune one's ear has been caught by exquisite bits of ornamental figuration from the piano; and now, when the trombone has finished, the piano improvises, for the first two phrases of the second statement, a solo of astonishing richness and subtlety of tone and rhythm—after which the clarinet plays a variant of the saxophone's b, and the xylophone (Norvo) improvises a new concluding phrase.

The pianist is Teddy Wilson, a Negro, outstanding among players of this type for the richness of his style, his imagination and subtlety, his feeling for rhythm and sense of form—all of which one can hear in other performances by groups under Norvo: "The Night is Blue" and "With All My Heart and Soul" on Columbia 3026-D, and "Blues in E flat" on Columbia 3079-D; in a performance of "Louisiana Fairy Tale" by a band under Taft Jordan on Perfect 16102; and in two performances of "Some Day, Sweetheart" that illustrate another important characteristic of this type of music. In the Norvo performances one notices the extraordinary aliveness of the playing—an aliveness of the instruments in relation to one another, and particularly of the accompanying instruments in relation to the solo instrument of the moment. Important in this connection is the size of the band: it is small enough for the players to think and feel together, to be stimulated and affected by one another in their playing. And so Wilson's playing in the performance of "Some Day, Sweetheart" by Mildred Bailey and her Swing Band on Vocalion 3057 is completely different in feeling and style from his playing in the performance by the Benny Goodman Trio on Victor 25181. There is more to say on the subject; and I will return to it shortly.

NEWS IN BOSTON

Dear Sirs: Your comment on the publicity given to the decision of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in the Associated Press case, upholding the order of the National Labor Relations Board, is interesting but inadequate. It can be credited to the wire service that they sent the news out to the press, however inadequately, advising that the act had been upheld and that Watson's reinstatement was a constitutional mandate. You missed the major reflection on the widely acclaimed freedom of the press, however—the fact that most papers gagged the item completely.

Not a single line was printed in any Boston paper concerning the decision. After reading the New York Times article, I checked with a former officer of the local Newspaper Guild unit who is now with the A. P. here, and verified the fact that a wire concerning the opinion had been received here and forwarded to all their New England subscribers at 3:40 p.m. Then I called the editors of the local papers—this was Tuesday, p.m.—and asked where I could find a reference to it. Several of them denied that they had received the story, and the rest passed the buck to the night desk. Then I wrote an official letter to each editor calling their attention to the front-page position given to the adverse decision of the Fifth Circuit Court in the Jones and Laughlin case, and the gag rule applied in this instance. Only one paper saw fit to acknowledge my letter. The Transcript, always the gentlemen, replied that the wire had been received too late for publication on Monday and that it was no longer news on Tuesday. It is still news to readers of the Boston papers.

ABORTIONS IN THE U.S.A.

Dear Sirs: I have read with great interest The Nation's articles on the Soviet abortion law. As a practicing physician of many years' experience in this country, especially among persons in poor circumstances, I have learned what doctors in similar practice usually learn, that effective contraception is too costly or requires too much effort on the part of the patient to be practiced by the great mass of people. As a result, conception occurs all too frequently. A very large percentage of women, unwilling for economic or other reasons to have a child, attempt to get rid of the pregnancy as speedily as possible.

Depending upon their circumstances, the women will either go to a midwife who in the most dangerous possible technical fashion will perform the abortion for from $5 to $10, or if they can afford it, will go to a so-called "private hospital," where the abortion is performed under sterile operating-room conditions with almost complete safety for the pregnant mother, for a fee of from $100 up.

Whereas 95 per cent and perhaps more of the medical profession will not perform abortions because of the fear of possible legal consequences or for moral or ethical reasons, there is always the remaining 5 per cent available, who will do the abortion for a price. And there are very few of the "ethical" 95 per cent who will not supply their patients, provided sufficient pressure is brought to bear, with the names and fees of one or more abortionists.

Abortions have become so common that a doctor who takes careful histories of his patients and who has their confidence will find that a large proportion of his married women patients have had one or more. Of course the average of abortions is somewhat higher for urban centers than for rural communities. I should estimate that at least 100 and probably more abortions are done annually in this community of 30,000 persons. So far as I know, there are no doctors in our community who now perform abortions, although a prominent physician did them until quite recently. But there are several doctors a few miles away who will perform them for fees of from $25 to $100. Incidentally, the ethical 95 per cent will not hesitate to attempt to induce an abortion by medication. And almost any doctor will tell you of cases he knows of, where the patient has died following "careless abortion" and nothing has been done about it. The average doctor unconsciously protects the murderers in his own profession.

I therefore regret very much that Russia has gone a step backward in doing away with abortions. I believe it would be far better if abortions were legalized in America, so that they might be done openly, with proper medical precautions, and by properly trained surgeons, rather than in the unclean, dangerous, furtive, and psychologically dangerous manner in which they are being done today.

CONFLICTING OPINIONS ON JEWS AND ARABS

Dear Sirs: Many years ago Achad Ha'Am the well-known thinker warned Jews of the danger of letting the judgment of their enemies contaminate their own consciousness. It is this contamination that has caused the phenomenon of Jewish self-hatred on which the late Theodor Lessing wrote a whole book and which in its devious manifestations is daily revealed to anyone who knows the Jewish masses.

We find this Jewish self-hatred and self-deprecation and self-torture manifested again in connection with the supposed clash of interests between the Arab and the Jewish populations in Palestine. Again and again I have met Jews, younger Jews and older Jews, who were worried about the Arabs. And these Jews generally thought they belonged to leftist groups or persuasions and had no glimmering of suspicion that their leftist leanings were in part at least Jewish flight and defense mechanisms. If (like The Nation, for instance) you worry about the Arabs, it is evident that you are a great lover of mankind and thoroughly objective and so . . . and so . . . here comes an enormous leap, both psychological and historical, the pogromchiks of the future may forget you. Don't fret. They won't. You will be mitgefangen, mitgehangen and will have nothing to look back on except the fact that you have betrayed Israel.

It has been proved over and over again on strictest scientific grounds and announced and affirmed by Gentile scientists and political leaders in books, in pamphlets, in scientific reports, and on the floor of Parliament in London that the Jewish resettlement of Palestine has been of undivided benefit to the Arab population; that the Arab standard of living has been immensely improved, that Arab vital statistics have taken an upward turn, that Arabs instead of leaving Palestine have flocked thither to share in the work and health the Jews have brought, that only 625 Arab peasants have ever been displaced from their original holdings and that these 625 received such compensation in money and in land as was heretofore unheard of in the entire Near East, that the amazing credit balance of the present Palestinian government comes out of the pockets of Jewish tax-payers, and that nevertheless in the matter of government subsidies to education, agriculture, all other purposes, the Jewish Yishub receives laughable pittances and the Arab population all the rest. Finally: all during the present disorders the Arabs, many of them recent immigrants from the Hauran, have operated with brigandage, highway robbery, knifing from ambush, arson, and wanton destruction. In other words these "revolutionaries" are hoodlums. And nevertheless the Jewish population, 400,000 strong, has not permitted itself to be goaded into a single act of reprisal and has hence shown the first example in all human history of a community that is able to act according to what is supposed to be the Christian and is in fact the Jewish principle.

So far, so good. We have a fool-proof case. And we don't need it. We did not ask to be conquered and dispersed. We did not ask Titus to destroy our city and our Temple. We did not ask Hadrian to seek to exterminate us and to sell our men and women into slavery so that the price of a Jewish slave dropped on the glutted Roman markets below the price of a horse. We did not ask the church of Christ to ally itself with empire, Roman, German, Russian, and to crucify from age to age the brethren and the people of Him whom it acclaimed its Savior. By the expulsions and murders and innumerable martyrdoms we have endured through the centuries, it is our right to demand our ancient homeland as a land of peace and freedom for us of that Christendom whose sin against us is as a cancer eating out its very heart. And we would have that right had we, brutally robbed of experience in both colonization and government, committed ten thousand errors and ten thousand involuntary injustices to the existing Palestinian population. We have not done so. Our hands are clean. The Arab problem, in so far as it has any reality, is the problem of Christendom, of that world of the West which first drove us into dispersion and then made life up to this very hour intolerable for us there. And if that world does not right this central and symbolic wrong, it will go under in strife and dirt and renewed Pagan barbarism as it is already doing in the once proud and just land of the Germans.

As a matter of cold fact the Arab problem in Palestine is a farce. Arabs live quite contentedly by the side of Frenchmen and Italians and Negroes in North Africa. Even if the French empire were smashed these populations would remain. The empire of the Arabs from Gibraltar to the twin rivers is enormous. But for centuries the Arabs have shown no vestige of political ability. A bi-national British dominion or neutralized state (like Belgium) on both sides of the Jordan would, through the work of Jews, enhance the prestige of the Arabs by virtue of their very collaboration in such a state. Arab civilization, utterly stagnant for centuries, might by the inspiration of our rebirth take on some life once more. But that is not our business either. Only Jewish idealists think that far.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Bennington, Vt., July 5

Dear Sirs: Nobody recognizes more than I the inadequacy of my article in your June 3 issue on the Jews and the Arabs. I have not told the whole truth. . . . I made the statements I did about Arab nationalism after I had been six months in the country studying the temper of the people. But not content with that I took a three-week hiking trip, walking every inch of the way between Afulah and Beisan in the Valley of Esdraelon, then through the Jordan Valley to Tiberias and up to Methulah, the last point on the Syrian frontier in Galilee. I spoke to the fellaheen and Bedouins, to Jewish colonists and merchants. Everywhere I found the same thing: Arrogant confidence among the Jews that they will not only be masters of the land in the future but are already masters now. Among the Arabs I found fear, mortal apprehension of their future among the civilized invaders, hatred, a slumbering desire for revenge, and a burning nationalism. That is the reason I wrote as I did.

There was an arithmetical error in my article. The figure 375,000 for the Jewish population in Palestine is correct, but that is 30 per cent of the total population, not 40 per cent.

HISTORIC OCCASIONS DO NOT COME ALL labeled for a gaping populace to note. But the first national convention of Labor's Non-Partisan League had about it every discernible mark of history-making. It is not only that American labor has massed itself forcefully and articulately behind Mr. Roosevelt. That might turn out to be, after all, merely an extension of labor's traditional policy of rewarding its friends and punishing its enemies. Of greater moment is labor's determination to use events and not be used by them. Progressive labor has forged an instrument in the form of the league, which can be used after 1936 for what Major George Berry called "a new political alignment." In 1936 words have to be hazy, but by 1940 these words can have only one translation—an independent labor party. Mr. Roosevelt's letter to the convention gave an assurance of his own determination to "enlarge the scope of human welfare in our nation" and to achieve "progress through law." But however firm may be the faith of labor leaders in Mr. Roosevelt personally, the Democratic Party is no rock on which American labor can build its church. Mr. Lewis is also for order through law. He wishes "to save our country the agony and the convulsions that come when extremists take hold." But he is for us a more important leader than Mr. Roosevelt, not because we like him any better, but because order through law in America can be based only on united labor action in the construction of a more efficiently functioning economy and a social system that makes more sense.

IT LOOKS AS IF GREAT BRITAIN WERE TRYING to outsmart Germany and Italy in dealing with the Spanish rebels. A week ago it appeared that Mussolini stood to achieve his ambition to turn the Mediterranean from a British into an Italian sea in case of rebel success, by obtaining in return for aid to the rebels a base at Ceuta in Morocco, directly across from Gibraltar, and another in the Balearic Islands; and that Germany also would be rewarded by certain concessions in the Spanish colonies. The Italian prospect is especially interesting in view of Mr. Viton's article, in this issue, on the Italian challenge to British power in the Near East. If Il Duce could get bases in Ceuta and the Balearic Islands he could render Gibraltar useless to Britain as a protection to Empire communications, thus practically assuring the success of his Near Eastern ambitions. While unquestionably British domination of the western Mediterranean would be much safer with a republican or even a communist government in power in Spain, the British government appears to have preferred to outbid—or at least to meet—the secret offers of Italy and Germany to the rebels. For as Miss Brenner shows in her "Who's Who" of the rebellion, Britain's virtual colony, Portugal, is governed by the same interests that are back of Gil Robles. Moreover, considerable British investments in Spanish industry will be endangered by defeat of the fascists. And so a British warship has bottled up Algeciras against the Spanish loyalists, thus protecting the rebels in landing troops from Morocco and greatly improving their chances of victory. If they win, they will be in a position to play Italy, Germany, and Great Britain against one another to suit their own advantage. Thus the British Government seems to have hit upon a rather perilous way to maintain its power in the western Mediterranean. For after a rebel victory it may find itself faced with the alternative of losing that power or fighting Italy and Germany to maintain it.

OUR FACETIOUS WISH OF LAST WEEK THAT A Negro might win every event in the Olympics came near being fulfilled in the track and field results. Our "black auxiliaries" brought us most of our victories; they also put several painful knots in the myth of white supremacy and showed up in true Olympian fashion the "sportsmanship" of Berlin. Meanwhile we find in the Manchester Guardian the contents of a confidential circular issued to the German rural population on how to behave during the great festival—a circular whose incidental revelations are more interesting than its main instructions which are in a word: Be polite even to Jews. Item: The poorer inhabitants living near main roads were to be enabled "by a collective effort on the part of the community" to cover their houses with cheap paint "which will not last very long but will fully serve the desired purpose." Item: "Gangs of farm laborers . . . must not spend their breakfast or lunch intervals on the edges of the roads. . . . Political prisoners and inmates of concentration camps are in no circumstances to work on the land." The whole Nazi regime, as everyone knows, was covered with a cheap coat of whitewash for the Olympic games. The question is will it stay on long enough to "serve the desired purpose"?

THE COUGHLIN-LEMKE GROUP HAS MADE itself some unlovely allies in Illinois. The latest accessions to the strength of this highly anomalous party are "Big Bill" Thompson, who, as mayor, stood out for his corruption even in a city like Chicago, and Newton D. Jenkins, one of the more open fascists of the Middle West. Thompson will run for Governor and Jenkins for Senator on Father Coughlin's Union Party ticket. The alliance of Jenkins and Coughlin should occasion no surprise. Incipient anti-Semitism has shown itself in Coughlin's utterances. Jenkins, who ran against Professor Paul Douglas for mayor of Chicago last year, was exposed by Douglas as a fascist; he is one of the really dangerous men of the Middle West. It is not clear whether Thompson's affiliation with the anti-Roosevelt group will prove an aid or a boomerang to the Landonites. He has been thoroughly discredited with most of the electorate, yet he may garner some votes because of his pro-German stand during the war and his later one-man crusade against the menace of King George. He is adept at gathering votes from the underworld whose many gunmen, gin-house proprietors, and dive-keepers recall with nostalgia the halcyon days of the Thompson-Hearst administration. Thompson has been a regular machine Republican, but it is doubtful whether the Republicans will touch him openly with a long pole now. The total effect of his candidacy may be to draw away votes from the Landon to the Lemke ticket.

THE REWARDS OF PROGRESSIVISM ARE NOT solely those of the gallant conscience. The recent Democratic primaries show that progressive action by Congressmen may pay substantial dividends in the form of a return to Congress. One proof is Maury Maverick's notable victory in Texas. A session of Congress without Maverick would have been desolate indeed. Another proof is what has happened with those who favored a strong food-and-drug bill in the last session. The drug manufacturers' lobby threatened rather openly that any Congressman who opposed them would rue it. Nevertheless, the two heroes of the late food-and-drug war, Representatives Rayburn and Chapman, won the Democratic primaries, which in the South amounts to winning the election. Mr. Rayburn of Texas, despite the combined opposition of the food-and-drug and utilities crowds, came through with a vote of three to one. Mr. Chapman of Kentucky, running against two competitors, received more than two-thirds of the entire vote cast. The results may mean that there was active work on their behalf by women's organizations or simply that consumers are waking up. Congressmen usually complain that they never hear from consumers but only from industry. They have now heard from consumers in the most effective way possible. We shall wait anxiously to see what the consumers will do against candidates such as Representative Kenny of New Jersey, who played such a large part in the final defeat of the bill after professing to support it. There are rumors that the women are going out after him. If they do he may learn that it is smart to be decent.

RARELY DO WE FIND OURSELVES IN SUCH complete sympathy with a minister of the gospel as we do with the Reverend Dr. Frederic S. Fleming. When the pastor of Trinity Church, in New York, comes out for a moratorium on preaching, we are with him 100 per cent. "Why," asks Dr. Fleming, "cannot a Christian be permitted to go to church to worship his God, without always being assailed by a barrage from the pulpit? . . . For the most part sermons today are a very poor edition of 'topical' homiletics, a brand of religious pep-talks, sailing forth for a transitory popularity under the guise of being inspirational. Truly the miracle of the church is the patience of the laity." To all of which we respond in traditional revivalist fashion and with traditional revivalist fervor, "Amen!" We should even like a more inclusive moratorium, which should extend to political oratory, and to all other kinds indulged in by people who prefer talking to thinking—and that would include 99 out of every 100 orators who now assail our ears from platforms and broadcasting studios all over the land. Such a moratorium would not only be good for harassed nerves; it might also help to cure the American public of its taste for senseless chatter, which ranks number one in the list of dangerous narcotics, with an appalling number of helpless addicts.

IT WAS LINCOLN STEFFENS'S DISTINCTION that he exercised great moral force without being a moralist. His muckraking articles on "The Shame of the Cities" stirred up an immense wave of righteousness by which Steffens himself was not engulfed. His muckraking researches taught him that you cannot moralize corruption or injustice out of existence. He found that city bosses like Richard Croker were more "honest"—that is, a far more integral part of the social fabric—than were the reformers who sought to clean up municipal politics. The problem became clearly one of changing the fabric itself. But although this logic should have led Steffens to stress the operation of impersonal forces in history and to work within them, his forte and his direction were always toward the personal. He had an amazing capacity for persuading people, from business leaders to revolutionists. His mind, always restless and active, broadened out in time from municipal politics to world affairs. But even there it was personal strength and leadership that his eye was always peeled for, and he admired people as diverse in their philosophy as Mussolini and Stalin. He was one of the most thoroughgoing pragmatists in American life, and he shared both the sharp American tang and the confusion that pragmatism has brought with it.

A. F. of L. into C. I. O.

THE parturition of the new American industrial labor movement from the hard but brittle shell of craft unionism has taken place. By dint of prodigious pecking, the old hens of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, John P. Frey, Arthur Wharton, William Green, et al., have succeeded in getting rid of ten of the twelve unions comprising the Committee for Industrial Unionism which have been boring from within since November of last year and disturbing no end the peace of the comfortable craft-union nest.

To the very end Mr. Green insisted that industrial unionism was not the issue. "How," queried Mr. Green querulously, "can industrial unionism versus craft unionism be the issue when the federation has never taken a position in favor of one as against the other?" The Executive Council, he said, favored both kinds. But how about the local of the aluminum workers, a federal union directly controlled by the Executive Council, which was threatened with revocation of its charter if it did not stop advocating industrial unionism, though ever so mildly, in its news sheet? The council maintained further that the issue was dual unionism, and Mr. Frey, in his arraignment of the C. I. O., charged among other crimes that C. I. O. enthusiasts had even "gone so far as to endeavor to set up dual central labor bodies." But what of the experience of a central labor council in the Allegheny Valley which in a regularly held election chose as its officials members whose sympathies lay with industrial unionism? In this instance the displaced officials, craft-union diehards, not only refused to deliver the seal and the charter of the labor council to its duly elected new officers but sent the seal back to the executive board of the A. F. of L. and turned over the charter to the diehard boss of the district.

This brings us to the other main complaint of Mr. Green, periodically issued, that the C. I. O. was trying to substitute minority for majority rule. To anyone acquainted with the hand-picked nature of the "majority" which has ruled the destinies of the A. F. of L. in the past the insincerity of this charge need not be pointed out. But even the man from Mars could see that the latest action of the Executive Council was deliberately intended to thwart majority rule. Last October it became clear that industrial unionism had made amazing inroads even into the carefully controlled ranks of the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor. To suspend 40 per cent of the membership of the federation three months before the next annual convention is obviously the desperate device of a minority which sees its control disappearing.

So much for the dishonest constitutional farce staged by the Executive Council in Washington. Its effect in stirring up discord in the trade unions of the nation is not to be minimized. This discord will be bitter and long drawn out. But for the very reason that the main body of American labor is only now in process of being enrolled in trade unions and that the job will be accomplished, if it is accomplished, by the industrial union group, the future lies with the C. I. O. That being so, the economic and political directives of this committee, both present and future, become important to everyone concerned with the future of American society. And their importance becomes immediate and pressing in view of the speed with which the industrial union movement has developed so far. It is less than three years since industrial unionism took its place as a primary issue in the labor movement. Today it is a primary public issue and by virtue of the terrific drive which lies behind the industrial idea, labor as labor and not as a mere body of voters has become an important factor in a Presidential campaign.

This year John L. Lewis and his followers are wholeheartedly supporting Roosevelt for reasons which seem to us practical. Paul Ward in last week's Nation expressed the opinion that the only difference between Roosevelt and Landon in labor matters would be that Roosevelt would hesitate two weeks longer before calling out the troops. For the long run, Mr. Ward's opinion is incontestably right; for the short run, two weeks—figuratively speaking—may be crucial. For the duration of this campaign, then, labor would seem to be justified in supporting Roosevelt if only to keep Landon out.

But what of the future? In the early days of the campaign Mr. Lewis, Mr. Hillman, and the others were careful to distinguish between Mr. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party. They also expressly set a limit to their advocacy of Mr. Roosevelt by saying that their commitment extended only to this campaign. In New York the first distinction has been technically maintained; labor supporting Roosevelt is being organized into the American Labor Party. The second limitation has not been expressly disavowed; it has certainly become dulled through not being repeatedly gone over. The danger is that the Democratic Party and Mr. Roosevelt, who know their way around, will by means of sweet political favors entangle the new labor movement. There is already talk of Cabinet appointments in return for labor support. We need hardly remind ourselves of the regularity with which such labor "triumphs" have turned into betrayals. Needless to say, every legislative device that will strengthen labor must be used. But workers and leaders must not forget the lesson of Section 7-a and depend upon the government, in any sense, for help in organizing its forces. Nothing, of course, could be calculated so thoroughly to sap the strength of a growing labor movement and to make it helpless at that moment when Mr. Roosevelt, both as the representative of the owning classes and as leader of the Democratic Party, must not only cease supporting but actually combat a labor movement grown strong enough to offer a genuine challenge to the power of the economic royalists, who for all Mr. Roosevelt's campaign eloquence are not royalists at all but his own bourgeois classmates.

It is clear what the most important single job of the next few years will be: the workers and farmers, that is the majority of Americans, must be taught where (and how) their enemies lie; they must learn the extent of their own collective power and how to use it; above all they must learn to recognize the moment when that power must be used. Finally they must learn to push their leaders as well as being led by them. Just as Mr. Lewis must know how to use the favor of a President and yet retain his own power, so the workers must know how to use the great ability of Mr. Lewis without yielding him too much control—this with due respect to the fact that Mr. Lewis's growth in political and social sagacity is one of the most heartening events of recent American history.

In this process, organization is of course the first step; and the industrial form of organization is a fundamentally radical and radicalizing form. Already the industrial movement has thrown up a corps of rank and file leaders who are amazingly clear-headed and wary and who think in terms of labor as a political entity. Needless to say, they occupy the key positions. As for those so-called intellectuals and social idealists who find themselves outside the labor movement proper, their obligation is obvious. They must first of all educate themselves in the realities of the democracy they wish to save. They must think clearly and speak honestly, and, when they can, act vigorously if they hope to influence the development of a strong radical labor movement and thus produce in fact what now exists only in theory—a government by the majority of the American people.

Moe Annenberg and the Fourth Estate

THE sale of the Philadelphia Inquirer, one of America's oldest papers, to Moses L. ("Moe") Annenberg for $15,000,000 is a matter of first-class journalistic interest. In the past Annenberg has often acted as the "dummy" for Hearst in the acquisition of newspapers where the Hearst influence was to be kept surreptitious. If it turns out in this case that Annenberg is the sole owner of the Inquirer, as he claims to be, it will be very surprising. Hearst has been known for some time as desirous of getting the property and only on the basis of the conjecture that he is the real owner does the transfer of the Inquirer have any meaning. First of all, he has been aching to get even with J. David Stern, publisher of the New York Post and the Philadelphia Record, who alone among newspaper proprietors has dared to criticize him openly. New Deal Senator Guffey and Governor Earle of Pennsylvania are reported to have an interest in Stern's papers and Stern and his associates stand high in the councils of the New Deal, while Hearst and his friends are running the Republican Party. Moreover, Pennsylvania is a crucial state in the present campaign and will continue to be so in the next four years, not only because of the industrial crises centering around steel and coal, but also because of Earle's possible Democratic Presidential candidacy in 1940. The ownership of a leading paper of Philadelphia becomes, therefore, a matter of national concern.

In 1900 Moe Annenberg was learning the use of the pistol in the basement of Hearst's Chicago American plant, the better to equip his employer in the task of "muscling in" on the existing Chicago newspapers. As a gunman, so efficaciously did he build up circulation for Mr. Hearst that he was rewarded for his services by being made circulation manager of Hearst's Examiner, while his brother, Max, who had also belonged to the gang, was given the same position on the American. In 1910 Max and Moe and their henchmen were lured away in a body by the Chicago Tribune for which they obligingly entered on a three years street warfare with the new gun-crew Hearst had perforce hired to take their places. In later years, hostilities forgotten, Moe reentered the Hearst fold, acting as dummy in the purchase of the nucleus of Milwaukee papers that became Hearst's Wisconsin News, and becoming general circulation manager and member of the executive council for Hearst in New York. Meanwhile on his own he founded the General News Bureau, a service relaying racing quotations and results to gamblers, bookies, and poolrooms, bought up most of the racing and gambling papers in New York and miscellaneous mystery and sex pulp-magazines elsewhere.

In this perhaps not wholly orthodox career as a member of the Fourth Estate, the purchase of a metropolitan newspaper has been the latest step. Fifteen million dollars is a lot of money for Moe, even though the racing business has been profitable, and at this time, too, it is a lot of money for

Hearst. The Mellons of Pittsburgh are Hearst's main supporters in the Republican Party. The Liberty League crowd has recently become very friendly with him, too. Either of these two sources would be able to put up the price for a big paper. Time alone will disclose the facts, but in view of the political issues at stake it is necessary to assume provisionally that the Inquirer under its new ownership is actively backed by Hearst, the Mellons, and the Liberty League. If Hearst is in control the paper will soon enough show its real ownership by its strident reactionary tone. If Moe alone owns it, the Inquirer can be trusted to be no worse than the Chicago Tribune. And that is bad enough.

Catalonia in Revolution

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

Barcelona, August 10

A STRANGER dropping into Barcelona today might jump to the conclusion that the city was celebrating a great national holiday. The whole population is in the streets. Cafes and restaurants are jammed. Nearly every building carries the nine-barred Catalan flag with the red, yellow, and purple of the Spanish national emblem. Airplanes drop leaflets on the crowd.

The illusion of carefree merrymaking is quickly dispelled when one observes knots of men on practically every corner with rifles strapped to their shoulders. Even some of the young men promenading with their sweethearts on the Rambla carry guns ready for instant action. Cars and trucks filled with armed men and plastered over with the insignia of the powerful trade unions—the Confederación Nacional de Trabajadores and the Unión General de Trabajadores—drive noisily through the streets at high speed, their red flags flying proudly. Barricades manned by armed workers may still be found. Nearly all luxurious hotels have been taken over by the trade unions and at least one is housing families of the volunteers attacking Saragossa.

That the workers are the actual masters of Catalonia today can scarcely be disputed. Although the civil government remains in the hands of the moderate left Republicans, the actual power is exercised by the Anti-Fascist Military Committee, composed of representatives of the leading political parties and trade unions. The Anarcho-Syndicalists of the C. N. T. and F. A. I. (Federación Anarquista Ibérica) control five of the fifteen members of the committee. The socialist trade union and Marxist parties have five, leaving only five in the hands of the moderate left groups. Even this fails to present a fair picture of the distribution of power. The C. N. T., with tens of thousands of armed workers, gained tremendously in prestige and strength as a result of the suppression of the military uprising of July 19, when workers went barehanded into the streets and literally snatched weapons from the hands of fascists. It can confiscate cars and hotels, and commandeer supplies from private business houses without challenge from the bourgeois parties. For the moment at least, none would dare try to disarm its members. Much the same is true of the Marxists. Andres Nin, leader of the P. O. U. M. (Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista), pointed out to me that the police feel it necessary to ask permission before allowing their detachments to pass the party headquarters.

Most foreign business men have long since left, confident that only chaos will result if the workingmen are allowed to rule. While civil war naturally carries a certain danger with it, Barcelona is in no danger and the fears of the foreign colony appear unjustified. No one denies that excesses occurred in the first flush of victory, but they were speedily terminated by the military committee.

It is true that if one judges by externals, the situation has all the earmarks of a proletarian revolution. Actually, however, the probability of an uprising is remote. Spain is having its February, not its October revolution, and Catalonia must be considered in relation to the country as a whole. The power is in the hands of the workers, but the basic structure of capitalism remains unchanged. And the leaders of all radical parties appear to agree that the moment is most inopportune for a drive toward fundamental change. The anarchists of F. A. I. and C. N. T. are violently opposed to capitalism but lack a positive program. The Communists and Socialists, relatively weak in Catalonia, are committed to comparatively mild reforms, hoping thereby to obtain the broadest possible support against the powerful reaction. Even the radical P. O. U. M., which is rapidly gaining strength in Catalonia, recognizes that much further preparation is necessary before there can be a successful proletarian revolution in Spain.

For the moment, therefore, radicals of all shades are concentrating their efforts upon a limited program of reform. Already the Catalan workers have obtained a 25 per cent reduction in rents, a 40-hour week, and a 15 per cent increase in wages for those earning less than $70 a month. A start has also been made toward dividing estates among the peasants. In addition the P. O. U. M. is demanding a 36-hour week, unemployment relief, immediate dissolution of the army and its replacement by a civil guard with elected officers. It also urges speedy trial of the leaders of the revolt and confiscation of the property of the church and all reactionary enemies. This last was partly carried out in a decree issued yesterday by the Catalan government. Although itself without a specific program, the C. N. T. is cooperating in most of these demands.

There remains the possibility that a revolutionary crisis will be precipitated more quickly than any one desires. Having tasted power, the workers will never again be patient with a government as weak and dilatory as the Republicans have been during their first thirty months in power. It goes without saying that strong measures must be taken to prevent further uprisings of the reactionaries and to date Madrid has been criminally dilatory in this respect—a fact recognized by both Socialists and Communists. Madrid cannot move too fast and still hold the northern provinces, but it must adopt positive reform policies if it is to avoid serious difficulties in Catalonia. Neither the anarchists nor the P. O. U. M. are members of the popular front. Both have a tradition of intransigence and both are heavily armed, yet both can be won to at least passive support of a government which actually gives promise of bringing Spain into the twentieth century.

Who's Who in Spain

BY ANITA BRENNER

THE struggle in Spain must be regarded in three ways: It is a major battle in the revolutionary march of the world; it is a deadly game of international politics; it is the climax of modern Spanish history. The decisive factors in each, however, are all facets of one thing, class war. Its outcome in Spain must affect the fate of millions in every country.

In the press, this fact of class war, and its international character, is hidden behind an opaque screen of ignorance, misunderstanding, and downright lying. The Spanish people are gratuitously insulted every day in most of our newspapers. Time, for example, calls the women peasants and workers who are defending with their lives everything that life means to them, "flat-footed mobsters." Smug critics reprove them for shedding blood in their battle against reactionaries who actually talk of "extinguishing the proletariat." Hearst's Knickerbocker hits a new low in procuring atrocity stories to discredit the popular militia. As part of that process the Spanish people's army is made to appear as a great, formless, dangerous mob. The organizations conducting the defense are blurred; their disciplines and doctrines are lumped so as to make mob, Socialist, Communist, anarchist, massacre, all read as one word.

The following guide to the forces operating in Spain is necessarily brief. The numbers are approximate but are based on pre-revolution organizational statistics, and on first-hand, constant, and careful observation of the Spanish republic and revolution.

Who Are the Fascists?

The big names on the rebel side are: Francisco Franco, Emilio Mola, Queipo del Llano, in the military field; Gil Robles, Juan March, Francisco Cambó, civilians. Franco and Mola were both "made" in the Primo de Rivera period, and were among his fascist pretorian guard. Franco is known especially as the organizer of the Spanish Foreign Legion and Riffian forces, both recruited from adventurers and mercenaries who fight as much for the promise of loot as for wages. Their behavior in the Asturias, where they burned, looted, and raped like medieval barbaric invaders, was a part of the original bargain with them, but this fact was hushed by the Lerroux-Gil Robles Government. This time they have been promised, we can be quite sure, all Spain as their oyster.

Mola was the organizer and head of the police and spy system under Primo de Rivera. It operated on terrorist principles, as described in Mola's own memoirs, and embraced all classes. Like most Spanish generals, including also Queipo del Llano, Mola has always been closely sympathetic to the junker-militarists of Germany, and to the Nazis. By advice of Gil Robles and certain foreign diplomats Mola, Franco, and the others are now trying hard to disguise themselves as republicans.

Gil Robles, head of the Catholic Acción Popular, is actually the front for Angel Herrera, editor of El Debate, a clerical paper that most Spaniards identify with the Jesuit order. Gil Robles has been groomed as a Dollfuss since 1933. At that time he was making trips to review Nazi concentrations and his paper was whooping it up for Hitler. In an interview with this writer, he left no doubt about his political philosophy: he outlined the kind of clerico-fascism that rules Austria and Portugal, and he definitely repudiated democracy. Later, as a political maneuver, he and some of his allies were "converted" to republicanism, intending by that device to carry out their original fascist scheme.

The money and most of the brains in the rebel outfit come through Herrera-Gil Robles, which is to say the church in combination with big industrial capital. Through young Primo de Rivera and the generals they link up with the gangster and señorito bands who openly call themselves fascists. Just before the revolt broke they had all come together under a single Fuehrer, the monarchist Calvo Sotelo, who had made many an openly fascist speech in parliament and who was also linked to the other big-money interests—Romanones, March, Cambó. The concentration of leadership was a signal that plans were ripe; and the murder of Calvo Sotelo necessarily moved ahead the date for the putsch.

The Spanish money sources of the rebels are the monarchist Count Romanones, owner of land and mines whose possessions in Morocco helped to provoke the Riffian war; Juan March, boss of Mallorca and tobacco "importer," who has always bought ministers and newspapers in order to keep his tax-debts unrecorded. He was tried and convicted under the first republican regime as a common felon, but "escaped" immediately after the Lerroux-Gil Robles Cabinet came into power. Cambó is a financial and electric-power magnate, a Catalan who was likewise identified with the Primo de Rivera regime. He too is a fascist. He has connections with French and Belgian capital and also with church money, and is so close a friend of certain bishops that he can always arrange interviews with them. Outside Spain the Gil Robles crowd connects with the Vatican and Mussolini on the one hand, and on the other, deviously, with British interests, whose virtual colony, Portugal, is governed, through Salazar, by the people who run the Gil Robles machine. That is why Lisbon is the Riga of this civil war while Gibraltar is its Warsaw. The Nazi link is made most naturally through the generals.

The proportion of the population represented on the fascist side is probably three or four million out of the total twenty-four. This includes probably 95 per cent of the priests, monks, friars, and nuns. The number actually fighting in the fascist ranks is at most 50,000. They are: the Foreign Legion (hired mercenaries of all nationalities); the Moroccan troops (Moors, Berbers, Riffians) recruited around the original corps organized by Franco with the promise of very high wages and very rich loot; most of the high-ranking officers of the regular Spanish army, which is to say almost the only permanent military force in Spain outside of the police, since the army itself is a draft civilian force serving from two to three years. These officers are nearly all sons of wealthy or aristocratic families. They have boundless arrogance, incompetence, and greed; Primo de Rivera was their messiah, and the Moroccan massacre in the early 'twenties their field-day.

The civilian irregulars attached to the fascist machine are recruited from the top and the dregs of Spanish society. From the top come the señoritos, young sons of landowners mostly, whose hero is Primo de Rivera. From the dregs come the hired pistoleros, who were organized at the time of Primo the elder into terrorist-strikebreaking gangs known as Sindicatos Blancos. Before that they were paid by a certain Baron Koenig, on behalf of the German army, to interfere with shipments for France during the World War. The peasant element is drawn mainly from the north, the only part of Spain where there is any considerable number of small, prosperous farmers. They are conservative, devoutly Catholic, and linked to the large landowners, especially the wheat growers, through financing and market organizations, particularly the Catholic farmers' cooperatives. The religious factor weighs very strongly with them; they are the descendants of the Carlists, who fought last century for Don Carlos and absolutism against Isabella and liberalism, considering it another holy war like the counter-Reformation. Their armies of twelve- and thirteen-year-olds were famous for their ferocity. One still hears in Catalonia talk of their raids as if they were recent horrors.

A section of this traditionally Carlist element, the Basque nationalists, however, is fighting on the other side, to the bitter amazement of the fascists. This is one of the surprises, like the republicanism of the Civil Guards.

That is the extent of the fascist machine. Who are its outside allies? They are, first, foreign ships that get in the way of the Spanish navy and block the Spanish forts, issuing warnings. At the time of the First Republic several English ships did the same thing—they also landed men and successfully suppressed the Spanish Commune. Second, there are the planes and aviators coming from Nazi, Italian, and British companies. Third, the officers lent, presumably by these same companies, to give assistance and advice. Fourth, the financiers who see to it that arms and supplies get through, in "neutral" ships through "neutral" ports. Fifth, the diplomats of "neutrals" who recognize the insurgents on the same level as the government itself, negotiating with them and giving them sympathy and advice, while at the same time bringing pressure to bear on Madrid to pay for lives and property obviously exposed in zones of war, and not to be guaranteed by anybody. Last, but not least, there are the press, the radio, and the photographers.

The Popular Front in Spain is scarcely more than a political fiction. Its pact was drawn up by the Republican Azaña and the Socialist Prieto and the object was to get united labor support behind a bourgeois regime—to try the 1930-33 experiment again. But Spain had already reached that critical point at which there must be either revolution or fascism. The pact itself contains the dynamics of class-war. It has two kinds of signers: those who propose a bourgeois program and specifically state that they oppose any radical economic measures such as nationalization of land, banks, and the like; and those who dissociate themselves, stating that they will continue to support the programs and doctrines of their several organizations. The conflict between these two forces in the Popular Front, and the distribution of strength among them, is the most important internal factor to be considered in deciding what is happening and what is likely to happen in Spain. Starting from Right to Left, the components of the Popular Front are as follows:

1. The Martinez Barrio republicans. They represent the small shopkeeper and fairly solid middle class, urban and rural. This class is not very numerous in Spain. It is only weakly sympathetic to labor, but very antagonistic to the military and the church which both represent for it a terrific tax-burden. Numerically it represents about a fourth of the Popular Front strength.

2. The Azaña republicans. Numerically, or rather organizationally, they hardly exist. The Azaña strength is to be found chiefly among the right-wing Socialists; he is their man, for the reason that he is the most left republican in Spain and at the same time the most uncompromisingly bourgeois. Under him, the program is revolution up to the limit of democratic bourgeois revolution—not an inch further, as he himself said. This was and is exactly what the right-wing Socialists want. This part of the Socialist Party and its trade-union organization, the U.G.T., is mainly the bureaucracy, which means they control the party and union machinery but have lost mass-support—so much so that Prieto, their head, was stoned by a Socialist audience not long before the civil war began.

3. The Catalan Ezquerra. They correspond, in Catalonia, to the Martinez Barrio-Azaña right Socialists of the rest of Spain. This is the governing party in Catalonia, extremely heterogenous, highly demagogic, and supported by perhaps a fourth or a third of the Catalans. Their main strength is among the rabassaires, the small farmers and sharecroppers who make up the bulk of the rural population. They are as much concerned with braking the revolution as with fighting fascists.

These are the principal republican forces. They lead about six million people; their militia totals about 100,000. Their greatest military strength is in the aviation corps and the Civil Guard, in parts of the Assault Guard and in the rank-and-file army. Their greatest weakness is that they are scattered, wavering, and disorganized, because of the internal contradictions of their own position.

Organizationally the Popular Front rests therefore on labor support which is given with a great many reservations. Radical labor is beyond question the strongest force in Spain. It numbers probably about fifteen million. It can mobilize two or three million trade-union members at least, and this force is distributed as follows:

1. Unión General de Trabajadores. (U.G.T.) This is the Socialist trade-union organization, whose membership is over a million. It controls probably about half again or twice as many people, both urban and rural workers. Its leadership is centrist and right, its mass feeling is chiefly left. The contradiction is due to the fact that its workers within the past few years have moved left so rapidly that they have not changed their bureaucracies at the same pace as their opinions. Most of them follow Francisco Largo Caballero, and a minority still farther left follows other frankly bolshevist leaders. Largo Caballero himself blows right, blows left, in the last few months mostly left because he was riding the mass-feeling. Beginning with him and going leftwards, the Socialist trade unions, the Socialist Party and particularly the Socialist youth are revolutionary, do not endorse the Popular Front pact as their own program, and embrace the idea that a workers' revolution, now, is the only genuine defense against fascism. It is to be remembered always, that the U.G.T. and the Socialist Party are highly disciplined, extremely well organized groups. They dominate Madrid and most of the center and south of Spain, as well as the larger cities and towns outside of Catalonia. Their headquarters, the Casa del Pueblo, was during the first period of the republic and is now again the real seat of political power in these regions. They dominate the railways, utilities, and big industries (outside of Catalonia) and are very strong among the sailors, both in the navy and the merchant marine. Their influence among the soldiers, who are mostly workers and peasants serving their military terms, is very important. What they are likely to do in power can perhaps be imagined from their behavior in the Asturias. In that uprising workers' committees, in which Socialists were most numerous, took the region over and ran it so efficiently and quietly that not a single industry stopped, there was no looting or disorder, and food and emergency services all went on as usual. The disorder, the horror, occurred when they had lost and the repression began.

2. Confederación Nacional de Trabajadores. (C.N.T.) This is the other big trade-union organization of Spain, controlling approximately half a million to a million, in Catalonia, the north, and some in Andalusia. Its headquarters used to be Barcelona, but is now Saragossa because its main strength shifted in that direction. This organization is anarcho-sindicalist, controlled from within by the F.A.I. (Federación Anarquista Ibérica). It owes its strength chiefly to the reformist history of the Socialists, and has until recently included practically all the most militant workers of Spain. At the same time, due to its very loose type of organization and its glorification of "direct action" and individual action, it has always been very easy for gangsters and provocateurs to operate within it. It has been torn for some time between the idea of uniting with other labor groups and hatred of the Socialists, but it did unite in Asturias and is now a fully militant part of the defense committees. Its outstanding leaders are Garcia Oliver and Durruti.

3. Communist Party. It gives its membership sometimes as 50,000, sometimes as 100,000. It has now merged its trade-union and youth organizations with the Socialists, and it is therefore difficult to estimate its approximate strength. Politically, it stands closest to the Prieto position, fully endorsing the Popular Front pact and program and backing Azaña. Its rank-and-file members are at the same time highly militant and capable of taking a prominent part in establishing a workers' government. In the Asturias they forced the party into the Workers' Alliance that conducted the 1934 uprising, though until six days before, the party line had been against these councils.

4. Catalonia. The picture in Catalonia is pretty much sui generis. The Socialist and Communist parties have virtually no strength there. The most coherent and strongest political group, in labor ranks, is the Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista, led by Andres Nin and Joaquin Maurin. The P. O. U. M. is important because it is beginning to play a part almost exactly like that played by the Bolsheviks in 1917. It was organized about three years ago as a merger between the Trotskyites and the Communist Right (Maurin) but has since been attacked by Trotsky for not joining the Socialist Party. In Catalonia, it is now the guiding political voice. Its policies and slogans have been the chief theoretical influence in the leftward moves of the Socialists. It launched the Workers' Alliances that directed Asturias and are now the vehicles of defense and government throughout most of Spain. At the time of the Popular Front pact it warned that the republicans would not dismantle and defeat the fascist movement. Its program, workers' front as against Popular Front, is what is crystallizing in the committees of defense. In Catalonia it has become a dominant voice because, while active in the defense, it has put forward certain demands at the same time—wages, hours, etc.—and got them. It is also the moving force behind the nationalization of banks and plants and has now pushed the situation to such a point that the Catalan government is hardly more than a rubber-stamp for the workers' committee, where this group gives most of the cues. Its program begins to echo in the rest of Spain, more because of the program itself and its success in Barcelona than through the party strength.

The relation between the workers' committee of Catalonia and the Catalan government is the most clear-cut illustration of something that is happening everywhere else in Spain. It is sharpest in Barcelona because there it is conscious and militant and deliberate, but it is a fact everywhere, even where the labor leaders labor hardest to keep the workers' committees coupled to the republicans. The fact is simply this: Spain is being defended by worker and peasant committees "sanctioned" by a republican front. Except where the rebels are in power, the government is the same combination of real power in the workers' committee, rubber-stamped by the Republicans. With the Asturias as precedent, we can be quite sure that an astonishing story will be told of how these committees organize and control the food-supply, prevent irresponsible violence, and maintain essential services.

These workers' and peasants' committees are at the center of the Spanish resistance to fascism. They are responsible and disciplined. They know their own strength. Knowing they represent the great majority of the people, they know that the future belongs to them—so they guard and conserve as much as they can. While the fascists announce that they will take Madrid, "reconquer" Spain, "whatever the cost," the Workers' Alliances say over and over again, "Let us be careful; let us not shoot until we have to, let us destroy as little as possible. Tomorrow Spain will be ours; and it is we who will have to rebuild."

The Education of John L. Lewis. III

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

AUGUST 4 was a momentous day in American history. On that day fourteen members of the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. voted thirteen to one to break up organized labor rather than endanger their control of it. Mad and stupefied with fear for their vested interest, they voted to suspend, which really means to expel, the Committee for Industrial Organization, unless the committee disband within a month. John Lewis immediately announced that the committee will go on. Thus the council threw out 40 per cent of the A. F. of L. membership—1,250,000 workers—as a starter. For needless to say the A. F. of L. will have to go on cutting itself away from the main stream of American labor. It split wide open every state federation of labor, every city trades and labor council, every national union down to its smallest local. And the drift will inevitably be away from Green toward John Lewis. It is that now. The vast majority of the labor bodies which have voted on the issue have voted in favor of the C.I.O. That does not mean that the struggle will not be bitter and prolonged.

The council of course voted illegally. It acted as judge and jury; one of its henchmen was the prosecutor; and since the task it had set itself was unconstitutional, the defendants refused to be party to the farce. For the constitution of the A. F. of L. expressly provides that only its annual conventions can suspend or expel constituent unions, and then only by a two-thirds majority. Green knows that the council acted illegally, in order that the suspended unions might be excluded from the convention three months hence and thus be prevented from voting on the issue. Besides the Old Guard did not really vote on any of the issues they pretended to vote on, such as dual unionism and "insurrection." "Not industrial but dual unionism is the issue," Green repeated frantically. That is untrue, and he knows it. To be sure, industrial unionism is ultimately bound to displace craft-separatism; and to that degree the C. I. O. is dual unionist. It represents the living, organic forces of our working class against the dead hand of Gompers, Green, Woll, and Company. But this duality was forced by the intransigence of the A. F. of L. oligarchy. In this fight the only issue was and is industrial unionism. The only "insurrection" the Executive Council faced was the rebellion of American labor against the racket of the Old Guard which would keep it divided for the sake of their own jobs.

From now on the Executive Council will be forced to play ever more and more the tragic role of strike-breaker. It will probably issue charters to quack paper organizations, such as the Progressive Miners in Illinois, to organize fake unions in steel, in clothing, oil, textile, rubber, and in all the other trades which are part of the C. I. O. By their vote the A. F. of L. bureaucrats have made the A. F. of L. a force only for dual unionism, both in intention and in effect. The authentic unions will be in the C. I. O., for American labor cannot live without reforming itself into industrial unionism.

Men do not betray a social movement, which in their youth they had entered with some ideals, without giving reasons. And the reasons at this farcical trial which dismembered the A. F. of L. were given by John P. Frey, who acted both as complainant and prosecutor. Frey is known as "the scholar" among the labor bureaucrats. He is as much of a scholar as a Kentucky colonel is a military expert. Incapable of the least theoretical conception, pompous, verbose, empty, and reactionary beyond belief, he was for many years the scholastic stooge for the late Sam Gompers. His "scholarship" consists in pedantic devotion to pure and simple trade unionism. Now he is the spiritual medium for Gompers's ghost. He hates Lewis with poisonous vindictiveness, which is characteristic of the Old Guard, for Lewis is the first powerful leader who has seriously endangered their sinecures. Frey is the chairman of the Metal Trades Department in the A. F. of L., one of half a dozen bureaus whose sole function it has been for years to mediate away any amalgamating tendencies in the metal trades.

Frey is the theoretical executor of Gompers's "philosophy of labor," which was that labor should have no philosophy at all. This ideological gem Gompers bequeathed to the A. F. of L. oligarchy, and ever since his death these doctors of "jurisdictional disputes" among the craft unions have cherished this heritage, untarnished and undimmed by a new idea. A new idea is heretical to the doctrine that simple-mindedness is the best policy for a labor movement.

Now the reason for this worship of pure and simple trade unionism is equally pure and simple. No one in American life is more devoutly petty middle class than the typical labor bureaucrat. His union is to him his business enterprise; and since he is a strict craft unionist, it is small business enterprise. Indeed, it is called business-unionism. He has, or tries to have, a corner on the market of a skilled trade. He controls, if he can, this market through union recognition. And he sells the labor in which he deals at the highest possible price through collective bargaining. He has two customers: he sells labor power to the boss and he sells protection from the boss to his membership. And since of his two customers the employer is the stronger, the protection he sells is necessarily limited. It is "pure and simple" labor-barter.

It is this conception of labor that the Greens and Freys and Wolls are fighting for. They have no philosophy of labor for precisely the same reason that the corner grocer has no philosophy of big business enterprise. The corner grocer hates the A. and P. for exactly the same reason that the craft-union bureaucrat hates the industrial union. For the industrial union is a trust of all the workers in each industry, which can protect their human rights and guide them in their daily struggles infinitely more effectively than the craft union. Also, like the corner grocer, the craft-union bureaucrat is against all government "interference." But with a difference. While the corner grocer yells for government protection from Big Business, the A. F. of L. wants no government interference in any form. It is all for what it chooses to call the "economic action" of organized labor. And next to his dread of industrial unionism the craft-union leader's greatest fear is of social legislation. For nothing shows up the social ineffectiveness of the old-line labor leader as glaringly as labor legislation. For this reason the A. F. of L. has maintained in Washington and in the various state capitals legislative agents whose sole function it has been to prevent labor legislation. There is not a single law for the protection of labor, including even the various workmen's-compensation acts, which the A. F. of L. has not fought tooth and nail, at least in the beginning. Social legislation, no matter how ineffective, leads to mass enlightenment. In conjunction with government regulation of industry, it points toward social planning, no matter how contradictory such planning may be under capitalist institutions. All of which brings out the futility of craft separatism and the parasitic nature of its leadership. No wonder, then, that the labor oligarchy hates Lewis with a venom which defies description. "I would rather see the whole labor movement go under and myself in hell, than have that — get away with it," raged Arthur Wharton, president of the machinists and vice president of the A. F. of L.; and he applied the same epithet to me when I expressed myself for Lewis. The bureaucrats feel about Lewis as the Hungarian fascists feel about Count Karolyi or as our so-called upper classes feel about Roosevelt. They feel that Lewis was one of them and then betrayed them. He is for social legislation; he is for government "interference" in industry; he is for industrial unionism. He is against everything that is dear to their hearts.

II

In last week's Nation I tried to trace the growth in the leadership of John Lewis throughout the 1920's; how he gradually came to realize that in an anarchic industry even victorious strikes accomplish little, if anything; and how he therefore came to believe in the stabilization of the coal industry through government regulation. In the rest of this article I will try to show how he developed further, forced toward an ever more progressive attitude by circumstances and his gift of realism. He finally came to believe that not only coal but the whole of industry must be stabilized; that such stabilization cannot be accomplished by industry voluntarily without deteriorating into mere monopolistic price-fixing; that government regulation of industry breaks down without a powerful labor movement to back it; and that labor cannot acquire significant power, with which to face finance-capital, without reforming itself into industrial unionism.

The Davis-Kelley bill, introduced in both houses in 1932, already clearly revealed this point of view. It was designed to stabilize coal production. It guaranteed to labor the right to organize in authentic as against company unions; and it made it mandatory on the government to license and impose minimal conditions on interstate coal corporations. Needless to say, the Hoover Administration got the bill shelved.

It was during the last year of the disastrous Hoover regime that Lewis concluded that what was wrong with coal was wrong with all industry. And on February 17, 1933, he appeared before the Senate Committee on Finance advocating a program of industrial stabilization for our entire productive mechanism. He came out for the suspension of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, but also for iron-clad guaranties to labor. In essence these proposals, together with the ideas which grew out of the discussion of the Davis-Kelley bill, resulted in the formulation of the NIRA. The whole conception of the NIRA was originally worked out by John L. Lewis with the able assistance of W. Jett Lauck, who for years has been acting as his economic advisor. Soon after President Roosevelt assumed office, he asked Raymond Moley and James P. Warburg to get together responsible spokesmen of labor, finance, and industry for the purpose of developing some such recovery legislation as the NIRA. The recommendations of John Lewis before the Senate Committee on Finance were adopted in essence. The licensing feature which Lewis had advocated in the Davis-Kelley bill became, under the NIRA, a congeries of codes of fair competition. The labor guaranties of the Davis-Kelley bill became the famous Section 7-a. Later on, Lewis wrote what became known as the Guffey-Snyder bill for the stabilization of the coal industry. This bill definitely recognized coal as an industry affected with a national public interest. It established a National Bituminous Coal Commission with real powers of regulation over both price-fixing and the allotment of production. And it established a Coal Labor Board to settle disputes between the operators and the United Mine Workers. Both the NIRA and the Guffey-Snyder bill were finally declared unconstitutional. And when they were, Lewis decided that it was time for labor to organize not only its industrial but also its political strength.

III

When the NIRA became law in June, 1933, John Lewis, William Green, Sidney Hillman of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, and George L. Berry of the Printing Pressmen were appointed as the labor members of the Recovery Administration. Lewis immediately stepped into the opening and began a drive to organize the unorganized workers. In his own industry he did wonders. Between June and November, 1933, he almost doubled his membership. In fact, he organized the coal industry 98 per cent. By November he had over 400,000 dues-paying members. He pushed and fought and called a series of brilliantly executed strikes, and finally he had even Kentucky and West Virginia in the bag. Even the coal diggers in the so-called captive mines, which supply the steel industry directly and are owned by United States Steel, joined the union. Much of the same militant tactics proved effective in other industrial and semi-industrial unions, especially in the needle trades.

The old-line craft unions, on the other hand, broke down the moment the NRA started. Jurisdictional disputes broke out like a rash all over the country. Green quickly accepted General Johnson's special interpretation of Section 7-a for the automobile industry, which practically nullified labor's right to organize. In some instances, various crafts, for reasons of jurisdictional disputes, scabbed on one another in strikes. Green rushed about Washington, without the least idea what it was all about, worried only lest some workers be misled into industrial unionism. Indeed he sabotaged all organizing efforts, issuing under-cover orders to his organizers to slow down. Under such circumstances it was obviously impossible for labor, even though it had the law on its side, to oppose the Weirs and the Sloans and the other great industrialists, who insisted that Section 7-a permitted the organization of company unions, though the law expressly forbade it.

It was then that John Lewis determined that craft separatism must go. He came to feel that no amount of government regulation could really stabilize industry, except as a price-fixing mechanism, without a strong labor-movement. It is for this reason that he took up the fight for industrial unionism in the A. F. of L. conventions in San Francisco and Atlantic City; that he organized the C. I. O.; that he is now tackling with real militancy the problem of organizing the basic industries; that he is the leader of a new labor movement worth fighting for.

IV

Pure and simple trade unionism has no philosophy of labor, of society, of government, of politics. It has no social strategy because it believes only in immediate tactics. It lives from hand to mouth. It wants union recognition so that it may fight for more wages, fewer hours, and better conditions on the job itself. Beyond that, it wants nothing. Hence the A. F. of L. was always politically "non-partisan." It "punished its enemies and rewarded its friends." The idea of labor-partisanship is to the old-line craft unionist almost revolutionary. Even in 1924, when Gompers had to endorse the elder La Follette as against the strike-breaking Coolidge and the Morgan lawyer John W. Davis, he reiterated time and again that La Follette was labor's "non-partisan" choice. Labor-partisanship might lead to a labor party, and nothing could be more painful to the petty middle-class soul of the standard labor-faker.

Industrial unionism is not merely another structural organization of labor. It presupposes a conception of society as a whole. It believes in the stabilization of industry, for example. It welcomes the idea of social legislation and social security. It has an intense interest in government regulation and the nature of the state. In short, industrial unionism cannot function without a progressive attitude on life, for every reactionary force threatens its advance. Hence industrial unionism inevitably leads to political action.

Through the 1920's Lewis was a Republican. Today he is a Democrat. But he is not a Democrat in the sense of having merely shifted from one old party to another. He has committed his union not so much for Roosevelt as against Landon, Hearst, the Liberty League, and all the other reactionary forces that the Republicans represent in this campaign. He has formed Labor's Non-Partisan League for Roosevelt not for reasons of non-partisanship in the old craft-union sense, nor as part of the Democratic Party. He is leading in the political awakening of our conservative labor masses, who have never before formed a labor bloc. And his Non-Partisan League is intended to survive the national election. Lewis owes no personal loyalty to Roosevelt. He is above all for labor, and the drive for industrial unionism makes it of paramount importance that Landon, who represents Big Industry and nothing else, be defeated. But should Roosevelt, in case he is re-elected, move to the right, as he probably will, there is every reason to expect that Lewis will be the leader in the formation of a labor party, which for once will have a real chance to play a role in our national life. For there is little doubt that the La Follettes, Olson, and other progressive leaders would gladly join a real farmer-labor party.

Today John Lewis knows that only industrial unionism can create a united and militant labor movement. And there is little doubt that the very drive for industrial unionism will show him that labor needs a political party in order to go forward. It seems to me that in the second half of this decade the most significant leader in American society will be John Lewis—unless we get fascism. And that "unless" is the main reason why American labor must learn and move very fast.

Resettlement by Trailer

BY ERNESTINE EVANS

A YEAR ago, a trailer was a trailer, cluttering up the roadway, a trailer and nothing more; something the British called "a caravan," pleasant for Dorothy and Sinclair to have taken their honeymoon in. Mr. B——, I knew, now a prominent New Dealer, had bought one once and paid a six months round of visits to his cottage friends in a spell of leisured unemployment.

Motor-boat life I really knew something about and liked. Trailers seemed a dusty substitute, with the water left out. Wrong. Trailers are no longer a casual phenomenon, something to be tripped over. They meet you from every direction. The trailer industry is the fastest growing industry in the country. It has moved into mass production. It is the liveliest of the new handicraft operations. Half the trailers I have seen were made in the backyards and basements of the mechanics who have since moved into them. The trailer warrants a monthly department in that estimable journal, the Auto-Body Builder and Painter; it figures increasingly in applications for patent-rights; it rates a monthly of its own, Trailer Travel, published in Chicago. It is potentially what can be hitched to every one of the country's 33,000,000 motor cars, and what has already been hitched to a quarter of a million of them.

This morning I found a Covered Wagon (a standard make) parked in front of my apartment in down-town Manhattan; the other day the Times carried two columns about the six-ton trailer the New York Park Department bought to take a horticultural exhibit to the slum children in city playgrounds. And potentially, it is in trailers that a great many slum-families may escape from the tenements to wider, opener, cheaper spaces. It is this potentiality that strikes the imagination!

About three months ago March of Time set out to do a housing film. Last week they released a film on the trailer industry for the simple reason that all that isn't too expensive and too imaginary in prefabrication is being used here—the new materials, the patent heating units, the slick designs for use of space, drawn from the long history of ship-building, from the new railroad-trains, from airplane-construction. And so far, trailer-landlords are few and trailer-evictions even fewer. See March of Time.

I became "trailer-conscious" one day last July, after a completely addled bout with the files of Subsistence Homesteads which were being turned over to the Management Division of the Resettlement Administration. I didn't like the cost of the homesteads. There seemed to me no mass solution of either the problem of stranded populations or of decentralizing industry in building an earthly paradise for two hundred miners in a county where more than ten thousand were on the relief rolls. I didn't like the selection of "homesteaders," since called clients and occupants, from among those who were judged aseptic, not "trouble makers" and sure to pay rent (which left out those with casual wages, meaning most of the badly housed). It was Christian, of course, to build fine homes for the experimental handful of stranded unemployed. But like a Republican taxpayer, I sniffed at the cost of seducing a vacuum-cleaner assembly-plant into the highlands of West Virginia, when the transport of Mahomets to some other mountain seemed cheaper and more feasible generally.

It was at this point that I read a letter complaining of Subsistence Homesteads in the columns of the New Republic. It was from a man in Michigan, who thought a fraction of the government money going for timber, cinder-block, stone and brick houses, ought to be spent on experiments in prefabrication, in studying the thousand new building materials that chemistry and mass production have brought almost, not quite, to our doors. Almost, but not quite . . . the old-line craft building trades, the landlords, the banks, and our own sluggishness are all bunkers between.

Meanwhile million after million dollars went out in Resettlement housing projects. Not one cent for trailers. Or for mobile housing, as it was now called in those endless letters that went back and forth between Mr. Corwin Willson, of Flint, Michigan, and about fifty people who were interested in housing. I disagreed with him pretty constantly. He makes a very good case for the fact that the human race lived for thousands of years following the seasons and the food supply. I cared very little for the news that the Scythians had mud-houses on wheels, and that the letter B derives from the ground floor plan of their dwellings. I have rolled too much myself to admire rolling stones for their polished mosslessness. I yearned for the stable roof, and the tended oak.

What I did like about the Willson correspondence was the persistent, enthusiastic, violent insistence that the housing problem in this country is a housing problem of the bottom layer. The rest of the population will find a way, if only the whole attention of every housing schemer and benefactor is laid on the people who make less than $1,200 a year. If one thinks in terms of an industrial population subject to cyclic unemployment, and abandonment; in terms of tenants on other men's land; and in terms of the 33,000,000 automobiles which are the outstanding characteristic of America today, movable houses seem inevitable.

They could be cheaper, cheaper than anything yet dreamed of. It is the "used trailer" market which will follow mass production that will make escape from bad shelter possible to millions. A sharecropper who could move his twenty-five-dollar bunk-house, as ample in dimensions as many of the landlords' cabins, is another fellow than the one who fights wage scales and eviction today. The stranded population that can be moved, floor, roof, walls and all, to another job, or at worst to the place where the vegetables are cheap, isn't stranded.

The picture is cheerful; and it is also a little appalling. A whole nation on the move, after the job, after the sun!

The very rich, the Brooklyn bourgeoisie, the criminal classes have long been on the move, taking Palm Beach and Miami in their stride. And how pleasant the sun is at Sarasota! Last winter eleven hundred trailers, house-cars, retreat from the drought something other than the nightmare of miserable refugeeing it has been to thousands of families.

Why the government in general, and the Resettlement Administration in particular, has been so slow to experiment with trailer-houses I do not know. There are 150,000 migratory workers on the West Coast, the stoop-labor that bends over the lettuce and the peas, and reaches for the oranges. They live wretchedly. True, Resettlement has built two camps for them with community utilities. But when so many of the workers themselves were desperately trying to house themselves in makeshift trailers, got to-call them what you will, were anchored on lots at four dollars rental per month in Sarasota's municipal trailer park, equipped with electric light, telephone, plumbing, a community laundry, a social room and dance building, and a handy canteen. Late in the season when I visited the park, two hundred cars were still parked there. Most of the trailer-owners were past middle age, with savings or pensions. But it cost few of them more than fifty dollars a month for two people to live, in the sun. The wife of a retired member of the Detroit Fire Department described to me how she had four children, all married, and a fair sized house in the city. "We went one summer to Mackinaw in a trailer. For my asthma. We liked it so well, I gave our house to my daughter and got free. That was four years ago."

"And got free"—that is the burden of the trailer dweller's song. Free of the city, free of the rents, free of the taxes, free of the cold, or the heat, or the rain. And a plentiful supply of trailers might have made the great gether from materials found on the Marysville dump, badly constructed and often too heavy for their ancient tin lizzies to haul, it seems a pity that neither Rural Resettlement nor Special Skills divisions of RA have actually put on the payroll an instructor to help these people use new materials, or master the tricks of coupling, water-proofing, and so on. Oil painters, mural painters, weavers, instructors in the dulcimer and the piccolo, have been worthy of public recompense, photographers have taken pictures of the misery, snaps of the sheep-herders' wagons, but no mechanic has been hired to tutor the handwrought rolling-house builders; and no housing projects of trailers has been invested in.

They will be, of course. Trailers are part of the boom (temporary or otherwise).

I have made notes on the young married couples (a new trend away from the old with pensions) who have made their own colony on a Chicago lot, and started what might have been slum-housekeeping, as a great adventure. I file the candid camera-shots of houses, government-built and otherwise, floating off down rivers that flood every year. Don't tell me lots of those farmers might not have liked being experimented on in Kozy-coaches, Aerocars, or Nomads. Three mobile dental clinics serve the Indian Reservations, the Coast-guard and Light-house service. Take dentists off the relief rolls, and send them to rural counties where the food is cheap, in the same blithe fashion. "Miss Couch complains of Floating Democrats," a headline reads. But it did not record my hasty vision of something the New Deal might have done to resettle voters in doubtful states. Ah, if Passamaquoddy had only spent more money on snug little Aladdins (made in Bay City), or Royal Coaches (made in Sturgis)! Bartow, Florida, has a municipal camp that turned in a profit of $400 to the town treasury. Has Kansas or Landon done better than that? Rural Electrification has daily inquiries on utilities-couplings for towns in the woods. Kropotkin's "Fields, Farms, and Factories" has always been my favorite book on subsistence homes, but I see now that only on wheels can the old life stand still, old craftsmen swing around to the garden spots.

The trailers are coming! But in passing I also observe that the latest Russian film celebrates the taming of the gypsies, all, so they say, happily nailed down on the big kolkhozes. It is round and round in both directions.

Italy Challenges Britain

BY ALBERT VITON

Jerusalem, July 8

THE most important aspect of Il Duce's recent coup de théâtre in Ethiopia is that, without firing a single round of ammunition, he defeated the greatest imperial and naval power of the world. At least, such is the view of the colonial peoples. An important Egyptian diplomat said to me a few weeks ago: "Mussolini's genius consists not in recasting Italy, not even in defeating Ethiopia, but in the fact that he is not taken in by tradition. English supremacy has been a tradition for centuries: we all believed in it. Then came Mussolini and with one stroke dispelled the illusion. He has taught us much." A statistical analysis of the Arabic press of the last eight months, I doubt not, would show that the greatest number of articles were written on The Decline and Fall of the British Empire. Even in the Zionist movement a very important group is already turning to Mussolini.

If only to recapture lost prestige in its colonial possessions England must win a war. But that is not the sole reason. The conquest of Ethiopia has only whetted Mussolini's appetite. Both to England and to Italy control of the Mediterranean is important more as a means than as an end in itself. A member of the Supreme Arab Strike Committee said to me a few days before he was incarcerated in the Sarafand concentration camp: "India will be liberated right here." Then after a few minutes reflection he added, "Or be enslaved by a new master—if the new master succeeds in his efforts to enslave us."

The Mediterranean has again become what it was in the Middle Ages, the center of the world. Developments in air transportation since the World War have greatly enhanced its importance. The air route from France and England to the Far East and India is over the Mediterranean; within the next few months there will be a parallel Italian route. Those observers of the international drama who behold it from the eastern shores of the Mediterranean are convinced that much that happens on the main stage cannot be understood without knowledge of what is happening in this side-show. The hand-shaking between England and Italy in Geneva should deceive nobody. England's readiness to abolish sanctions is due to the very same reason which prompted Sir Samuel Hoare to accept the Laval compromise months ago—to wit, stoic acceptance of an unpleasant solution which was the inevitable result of the run-down state of the imperial defenses. But English imperialism, which is said to be "satiated," will fight to maintain its bulk. Meanwhile Italian fascism is lean and hungry. The paths of the two have crossed again in Geneva, and at Lake Tsana; they have tipped their hats to one another—and gone their ways to prepare for Der Tag.

For the last two years Italy has been making extensive preparations in the Arab world for the inevitable struggle for power. A huge net of Italian schools extends from Tripoli to the border of Turkey and from the Mediterranean to the Arabian Sea; it has been woven by Mussolini's agents, often in cooperation with the Vatican. Their pupils are taught that Mussolini is the savior of the world, and their ideas cannot be distinguished from those of the Italian fascist youth whose uniforms they wear. Every year a few thousand Arab boys are taken to Italy for two months military training. The innumerable Italian hospitals in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and especially the one in Amman, the capital of Trans-Jordania, are active centers of propaganda. The doctors, Italian or Italian-trained, speak to the patients not only about their illnesses, but about matters not usually falling within the province of medical practice.

Although neither Italian money nor Italian agents are factors in the present disturbances in Palestine—of this I am reasonably certain—that, no doubt, is due to the obvious fact that there is enough fuel to keep the Palestine pot boiling without Italy's bothering to add more. A relentless pro-Italian campaign is of course still being carried on. Last week, Arabs tell me, the Arabic-speaking news-announcer at Bari, in announcing that Arabic has been made one of the official languages of Ethiopia, waxed eloquent over the traditional friendship of "Moslem Italy" for the Arabs. But Italy is not fomenting trouble now as it did last winter. Then, Caro, the young secretary of the consulate in Jerusalem, paid good pounds to many an Arab for doing a bit of stirring up in the villages; and when an illegal shipment of some $150,000 worth of ammunition was likely to cause an Arab riot, the Bari news announcer was more inciting than the Arabic press itself.

It is in Egypt, however, that Italy has been particularly active. Most of the violently anti-British Egyptian papers are either owned by Italians or heavily subsidized, and there is indisputable proof that not only did Italy amply finance the last riots in Cairo, but that many of the most violent anti-British agitators receive regular pay from the Italian consulate. Nahas Pasha, the Egyptian premier, recently informed Parliament that a powerful youth organization now calling for a resumption of violence exists by virtue of Italian funds. The chairman of the Arab delegation in Geneva, Sakhil Arslon, admits receiving money from Mussolini, and has publicly promised to continue using Italian funds because every enemy of England is ipso facto a friend of the Arabs.

Italian propagandists are using both the mails and the air. Tens of thousands of Arabs have received post cards from the Ente Italiano Audizioni Radiofoniche in Rome informing them that "The daily transmission for the Near and Far East is heard in Palestine from 4 to 5.30 p.m." The postmen deliver tons of printed matter in half a dozen languages to innumerable Arab households. During the Ethiopian war most of the propaganda was aimed at whitewashing Italy and exposing England's hypocrisy; since the end of the war Mussolini has been wooing the Arabs by telling them how much he loves them and how ready he is to help them. To eradicate the bitter memories of its terror in Libya, during which the nationalist leader Omar al-Mukhtar was executed, Rome is now sending gratis two Arabic journals from Libya to thousands of Arab households. The last issue of the Illustrated Libya opens with an editorial about a school for higher Moslem learning built by Balbo. "The opening of the school," the propagandist writes in wretched Arabic, "shows that the policy of the Fascist Government is not only to respect the religion of its Moslem citizens, but to provide for them every means for scholarship. And this policy is followed by the Fascist Government not only in Libya, but in all its colonial possessions." The issue, excellently illustrated, contains articles on The Flourishing Cities of Libya Under Fascism, Italy and the Education of Libyan Women, Mussolini's Rome, Italy and Islam, and the like. The other Arabic publication, the Barca Post, does no worse. The whole first page of the last issue to reach Palestine is taken up with a speech by Mussolini; on the second page is an impartial account of the Ethiopian war; the third page is graced with a photo of a Libyan orphanage which carries the inscription, Deeds of Civilization in Libya; on the fourth is a speech by Grandi and the picture of A Mosque in Libya Built by the Fascist Government.

Even the Vatican has harnessed itself to Mussolini's war chariot. The Pope's Italian representatives here have been so faithful to the Palazzo Chigi that an open split has developed between the Italian dignitaries and the French missionaries who watch with misgiving this subservience of the church to the state. In the Holy City, for example, the Italian Patriarch has threatened with ex-communication every Catholic daring to enter the Y.M.C.A., because in his opinion it is a Protestant missionary organization, and an English propaganda institution to boot. But this edict does not prevent the French head of the local Franciscan College from continuing to be, secretly of course, on the best terms with the Y.M.C.A. Even more glaring has been the conflict at Amman, where La Raux, the representative of the Society of Jesus, openly accused the papal representative, Gini, of being an agent of Mussolini's foreign office and of carrying on pro-Italian propaganda in the schools. Gini retaliated, and there was a merry fight over the accusation.

Italy is preparing for the conflict in the Near East in more direct ways, too. When there was talk a few months ago of England's readiness to steam out of the Mediterranean if Italy would reduce her Libyan forces, she agreed to reduce her garrison from three to two divisions. Then the matter was dropped. Now it turns out that Italy's Libyan forces, far from having been reduced, have been increased by three divisions and now number no less than 100,000 men. Even more important is its fortification of Pantelleria Island. Lying about seventy miles south of Sciacca, Sicily, and a stone's throw from the coast of Tunis, Pantelleria divides the Mediterranean in two and dominates it. All ships to the eastern Mediterranean have to pass this island within convenient firing distance, and Malta is only 130 miles away. The defenses of Rhodes are also being rebuilt.

The rapid and decisive victory of the Fascist legions in Ethiopia has rudely awakened England to the seriousness of the situation. When I arrived in Alexandria early in October, last year, every British officer I met told me that I was exaggerating the Italian menace. Even as late as January a high British officer in Cairo told me, "Before they have a chance to reach Lake Tsana—which they never will—we will be in Rome." Hastily concocted military plans and a sudden anxiety to win the friendship of the Arabs has now displaced this light-headed, genuinely British optimism.

The last few months have seen a complete change in England's naval policy. Instead of being kept at Gibraltar, the navy is now being concentrated within the Mediterranean. It is divided into two distinct fleets. One is kept in Alexandria to protect the water route to India and Egypt. The other is being concentrated at Haifa to defend the ends of the Iraq oil-pipe line and the new Far Eastern air route over Palestine which displaces the old route over defenseless Malta. The harbor of Haifa will soon be enlarged to accommodate at least twelve men-of-war and an equal number of merchant vessels, and plans have been drawn up for building an oil refinery to provide fuel for the navy.

Land defenses are also being hastily strengthened. During a trip into the interior of Egypt, I encountered everywhere, but especially along the coast of the Red Sea, reconnaissance planes and newly formed military stations. Heavy artillery and anti-aircraft guns are being posted on the mountains around Sollum; Nersa Matruh is being fortified, and everywhere new military roads are in process of construction. A new desert highway is being built between Alexandria and Cairo, to pass through the center of the Egyptian chemical industry, Wadi Natrum. Between 1,200 and 1,500 fighting planes have recently arrived; the British garrison is being augmented almost every week, and new regiments of native troops are being raised. A huge airdrome is in process of construction outside of Haifa, and smaller ones near Gaza, Jerusalem, and other strategic points. The Carmel Mountain, towering majestically above the important harbor of Haifa, will soon be a ridge of concrete artillery bases. Recalling the difficulties they had here during the World War because of the absence of good means of communication, the British are speedily building roads and telephone lines. Work will soon start on a Haifa-Bagdad road and another to Akaba, the all-important port on the Red Sea. At the end of last winter Jerusalem was for the first time linked with Bagdad by a telephone line which in the near future will be extended along the Red Sea to Arabia Saudia.

While strengthening the defenses of the countries without national military machines, Britain is at the same time encouraging the so-called independent Arab states to build up their defenses. None too eager in the past to see a strong Egyptian army, it has now of necessity abandoned this prejudice. The Egyptian press is carrying on a government-inspired campaign to induce the fellaheen to join the British-equipped, British-officered army; and it offers to those unable to join the sound advice that they invest their last two pounds in good, solid gas masks. At the urgent request of the British Residency, the Iraq Government has decided to substitute a conscript army for its professional force of 3,000; and six airplanes with a large supply of all sorts of guns have been placed at its disposal—as well as British officers.

In order to counteract Italian propaganda and to win for the coming war some of the Arab support she had in the last, England is now trying to arrive at a modus vivendi with the Arabs. Although her post-war policy was to Balkanize the Near East, she now sees that a pan-Arab federation would serve as a solid front against Italy. A federated Arabia will eliminate the inter-tribal wars which Britain has viewed complacently till now and thus prevent Italy from gaining a foothold on this side of the Mediterranean by championing one Arab state against the other. And internal peace will leave the Arab rulers free to yoke their military horses to the British war chariot.

The concessions to Arab nationalist movements implied in this policy are evident everywhere. In Egypt there is every indication that the price of "neutrality" and freedom of military action will be a final renunciation of the Capitulations and an almost entire cessation of interference in Egyptian internal affairs. In Iraq the last vestiges of British authority in civil administrations are disappearing. In Trans-Jordania Britain has at last conceded the demands of the nationalists that the Zionists be kept out and has announced a law prohibiting the sale of land to Jews. The promulgation of that law will be not only a conciliatory gesture toward Trans-Jordanian nationalists but a manifesto of its new policy for the whole Arab world.

In Palestine, however the situation is not so simple. While most of the high officials in the Palestine administration and the people in the Colonial Office in London favor a clear Arab policy, here, too, public pressure and Zionist control of Parliament have forced them to go slow. Nevertheless the last six months have seen even here a change of policy which would have been more pronounced had the strike not interrupted it. The first gesture was a new land law which will make further acquisitions of land by the Zionists almost impossible. There can be no doubt that the Royal Commission will make even more significant concessions to the Arabs. Considerations of empire demand it although the Zionists argue that they are more reliable servants than the Arabs.

In carrying out this pan-Arab policy many conflicts, most of which Britain herself has created during eighteen years of divide-and-rule policy, must be removed. Boundary disputes among various states, which England has kept going for years, are speedily being settled; British agents like St. John Philby, Cox, Oliver, Peek Pasha, and Sir Andrew Ryan are again criss-crossing the deserts, handing out promises right and left. Where necessary, even British commercial and political interests are being sacrificed. In order to get Ibn Saud, the mighty Wahabi Lord of Arabia Saudia, to come to terms with Iraq, the British government has relinquished its claims on his valuable al-Hasa oil-fields, and many of the Persian Gulf Emirites, whose theoretical independence England jealously guarded for almost a century, will soon be handed over to him. A treaty between Arabia Saudia and Iraq was signed on April 1, and a few weeks ago another one was negotiated between Arabia Saudia and Egypt. Right now negotiations are in full swing for a more sweeping Four-Power Pact to include Iraq, Trans-Jordania, Yemen and Arabia Saudia. British agents are working in Teheran, Iran, and Istambul to draw these two important Mediterranean powers more effectively into the British orbit by inducing them to sign a non-aggression mutual-assistance pact with the signatories of the Four-Power Pact. With the conclusion of these alliances Italy will be more completely encircled in her own sea than ever Germany was on land. But while the unification of the Arab world will undoubtedly make Il Duce think twice before launching a coup de théâtre here, one wonders whether in her haste to ward off the Italian menace England is not creating a vastly greater menace. United Arabistan may turn a mighty sword against British as well as Italian imperialism. The feeling among the Arab masses is that all imperialisms are essentially alike, however different their outward appearance. England will some day be told with hot lead that she is not wanted here, and that day, I am convinced, is not so far away.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THERE is something extremely humorous, as well as entirely satisfactory, in the way that Negro Americans are carrying off all the honors in Berlin—up to the time this is written. Already it is clear that if the United States triumphs at the end of the games it will be because of the representatives of those Americans who in many states of the Union are disfranchised; who are segregated and discriminated against in many parts, and in all cities, of the Union. Their triumph is highly amusing because it has taken place in the presence of Adolf Hitler, the leader of spurious Aryanism, so that that noble champion of sports and of humanity was compelled to congratulate the German winners in his private room at the stadium in order not to have to shake hands with any of the dark victors from the United States. There are so many of these that a European wit is quoted as saying that he hopes there will be a couple of white men and girls on the American team in 1940.

Well, even at home these triumphs of the colored men ought to have their good effect. Nearly all of them are or have been university students; they have shown stamina, courage, good manners, self-control, loyalty to the team, and in the reports of the drinking that took place on the Manhattan on the voyage over there has been no intimation that any of the colored men were among the offenders, of whom Mrs. Jarrett was singled out for such exemplary punishment. As for their not being received by Adolf Hitler, I agree with Richards Vidmer of the Herald Tribune that it isn't at all likely they will be "either perturbed or petulant." I should think they would be rather relieved not to have to take the blood-stained paw of that monster to whose everlasting discredit is to be set down the killing of over 1,250 people in that single night of the blood-purge of June 30, 1934. But if he were the most estimable character, these colored gentlemen would still be above and beyond feeling hurt. We Americans have trained them too well for that with our own discrimination, our own slights, our own insults, which do not even spare their women, which often poison their childhood and youth, precisely as the Jewish children in Germany are tortured to their very souls by being told in their schools that they are inferior beasts, mere contact with whom is leprous. No; the colored gentlemen who represent the United States in Berlin will not come back with any heartaches or swelled heads, but with the solid satisfaction of having contributed to the national victory, if victory it should turn out to be. And if it should appear that that victory alone prevented the Germans from walking off with all the honors, the gods on the heavenly Olympus would certainly shake with Homeric laughter.

Perhaps the news of the victory may shame our Congress into passing that anti-lynching bill which it is allowing the Southerners to defeat year in and year out. Perhaps it will enable the President to receive and honor the colored victors in the White House where Mrs. Roosevelt recently did an extremely generous and fine thing in receiving the inmates of a Negro girl reformatory. Perhaps the government itself might undertake to abandon some of those discriminations against Negro civil servants for which the special dishonor belonged to William G. McAdoo and Woodrow Wilson. Perhaps the army might feel as if it could let down its caste bars and give a really square deal to the colored Americans. Perhaps West Point with its 1,800 cadets might find room for more than one Negro student and not subject those admitted to the brutal ostracism which has made life at West Point for Negroes who endured the ordeal call for greater strength, moral and physical, than was ever displayed at an Olympic.

One thing I must record with great satisfaction. In the South the reaction to these Negro successes will be far more generous and friendly than would have been the case a few years ago. I have seen some superb editorials from Southern editors' pens ridiculing or denouncing that Senator from South Carolina who walked out of the Philadelphia convention of the Democratic Party because a Negro clergyman pronounced the blessing. The foremost of these commentators was a Richmond editor, and a reader of The Nation has written in to urge that The Nation ascertain his name and put him on its Honor Roll for 1936. I think it should be done, but there will be a number of the newer generation of Southern journalists who will be ready to welcome these Negroes and publicly honor them, as, for example, that admirable son of Josephus Daniels, Jonathan Daniels, who now conducts the Raleigh (North Carolina) News and Observer. I do not wish to be unduly optimistic, especially as long as lynching continues, but I think we have gone a long distance from the days when the whole South roared in outrage because Theodore Roosevelt invited the most distinguished Negro of his time, Booker T. Washington, to luncheon at the White House. Indeed, we have gone far from that spirit which led some Southerners of the basest type to kill Negro soldiers returning from France in order to "teach them their place" because they had been associating so freely with Frenchmen—and women.

There is nothing more wonderful in all the United States than the patient endurance of wrong, injustice, and oppression by the Negroes—too patient by far. But in spite of it they are steadily coming to the front with their great singers, great actors, writers, and poets. And now they win the greatest honors at the Olympics—to share them with us white Americans!

PERSONS who commute from Stamford, Connecticut, would do well to watch out for a large ambling man, somewhat resembling the late Gilbert K. Chesterton, who may attempt to engage them in conversation. He operates in the club car of the 10.48 every morning except Sunday. He engaged my attention by saying that it looked like rain in spite of the heavy storm of the night before. Then he leaned forward and with very considerable emotion said, "Have a cigar!"

Before I could inform him that I never smoke he started to talk in a low and hurried voice. "My experience of last night," he began, "was so harrowing and dreadful that I must tell someone. Please bear with me. I will be brief. I must be brief. I was invited to spend a week-end with a business friend of mine named Bruce. Just before dinner we began playing contract. My partner was a man named Samuel Jabey. I had never seen him before. I will never see him again. His appearance need not concern us, although he was a little under average stature and had reddish hair. It was his conduct which was curious. As the thunder storm swept closer and closer he grew visibly excited. It was not fright but an eagerness. He kept shifting around like a small boy waiting for the curtain to go up on a burlesque show. Once Bruce spoke to him and said, 'Please, Sam, let's skip the usual performance.' My partner paid no attention and when a bolt struck near the house Jabey suddenly leaped to his feet and ran into a closet at the end of the room. He came out with a heavy, steel-shafted, mashie niblick. He held it over his head as if it had been an umbrella and darted out the front door.

"The fourth at bridge, an old gentleman named Col. Heineke, seemed to take everything in his stride and kept his seat. He was smoking a pipe. My host said, 'Howard, I owe you a thousand apologies but Sam is perfectly all right except when it storms. We can continue the game as soon as the storm abates and he comes back.'

"'What's it all about?' I asked. 'I blame it on Dr. House,' he answered. 'Sam Jabey went to him as a nerve patient and House questioned him and found that Sam was violently afraid of thunder storms and had a deep dislike of his elder brother Louis, the stock broker. Try as he would Dr. House couldn't get Sam to admit that there was any association in his mind between Louis and lightning or the other way around. So the doctor decided to cure Sam of his fear of thunder storms. At his suggestion Sam Jabey took out one of those trick policies with Lloyd's. It only cost $500 and in the event that Sam is killed by lightning his estate is to receive half a million dollars. In other words, Lloyd's is betting a thousand to one on Sam against any bolt from the blue. In spite of the house percentage the thing worked well enough in the beginning. Instead of cowering under a bed Sam would josh back and forth while a storm was in progress. 'Come and get me,' he used to cry out, 'it will cost you half a million.'

"'It was a little hysterical,' admitted Bruce, 'but not painfully so. His present behavior did not begin until the winter of 1930 when his brother Louis went bankrupt and his sister Mathilde died suddenly. I forgot to tell you that Sam loved his Mathilde as devotedly as he hated Louis.

"'And with the death of his sister Sam's mind became possessed with a fantastic sort of vengeance which he wants to wreak on his bankrupt brother. He made out a new will. Jabey's entire life for the last six years has been devoted to the effort to get struck by lightning in order to get half a million dollars and not leave it to Louis. He has named the Metropolitan Museum of Art. I forget what it was that they quarreled about in the first place. I have a vague impression that it was a little slam in clubs.'

"As we were talking, a car drew up at the door with a screeching of brakes. Without knocking, a sturdy man, though temporarily white as a sheet, flung himself in and shouted, 'One of your guests, a certain Samuel Jabey, has just been struck dead. I thought you would want to know.'

"Bruce whistled, in horror not elation, and said, 'Killed by lightning just as he had hoped.'

"'No,' answered the man at the door, 'he stepped in front of the Ajax truck as it was coming around a curve on a hurry call. He tripped over a golf club he was carrying.'

"'The Ajax truck?' Bruce asked in some bewilderment.

"'You know,' said the man, 'Al Graham's truck—the fellow that's got the Ajax lightning rod agency here and in Darien and Greenwich, for that matter. And I think they've just given him South Norwalk.'

"'Strange wasn't it?' said my companion in the club car—the large man who looked something like the late Gilbert K. Chesterton.

"'I should say it was strange,' I told him. 'It sounds exactly like one of those short shorts in Collier's.'

The big man gave me a mean look and walked right out of the club car, although we had only reached Portchester. I was startled by his abrupt departure and noticed that I still clutched in my hand a small black cigar. The Pullman conductor came by. "Do you smoke?" I asked him.

"Not that kind," he said smiling. "I see you've been talking to Howard Brown Campbell."

"What do you mean?"

"Mr. Campbell rides on this train from Stamford every morning except Sunday. He used to be a columnist, but now he has a job writing a short short story a day for one of the newspapers. He makes it a practice to engage some passenger in conversation and try out his plot. If it goes he has no further worry except to set it down on paper once he gets to his office. But if his fellow passenger seems skeptical then there's the rub. Brown realizes that his daily contribution is no good and that he must make up another story. How was he today?"

"Not up to his usual standard," I told the conductor.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE AMERICA OF JOHN DOS PASSOS

BY MAX LERNER

ONE'S impulse is to write about John Dos Passos as he has himself in his novel-trilogy written about other Americans who have been etched on our consciousness. That is to say, to write a prose-poem telling of those early impressionable days when he was carted around the world in the shelter of a well-to-do family, his dawdling at Harvard, his "one man's initiation" into the disenchantment of the war, his attempt to apply a novelist's scalpel to murder on an organized scale in "Three Soldiers" and to the entire anatomy of a diseased social system in the more firmly wrought novels that have followed. One would set down the contradictions of a sensitive (almost shy) personality, an acid intelligence, and a gusto for life which scoops up experience with both hands. Failing a prose-poem it is none the less worth saying that with "The Big Money"* Dos Passos emerges the most considerable and serious of our American writers.

His talent is expansive rather than concentrated. There is little of the creative frenzy about him. There is no tone of philosophic brooding about his books, and few of the flashing insights by which Malraux, for example, can distill a lifetime into a phrase. But there is a massiveness about Dos Passos' work, as about that of Dreiser or Lewis, that places it squarely in the path of our attention.

His aim has been to capture in three novels the whole spirit and movement of American life from the beginning of the century to the end of the boom period of the twenties. There is a central group of characters that runs through the whole trilogy. There are interlacing individual lives and destinies, but the central theme and destiny belong to America itself. The first book, "The 42d Parallel," shows America in a mood of nascent strength and recklessness, with business enterprise finding itself and expanding into new domains, with labor going through the adolescent crudeness of its I. W. W. phase on the one hand and its dreams of capital-labor cooperation on the other, with the whole complex of American life rushing into the World War. The second book, "1919," deals not with the war itself but with the fringes of it, for the author's concern is not with what happened to the cannon-fodder, but with the war as a phase of our culture. It is a study in individual rootlessness and group hysteria, and it is only at the end of the book that the magnificent lyric on the Unknown Soldier hurtles us back ironically into a consciousness of what price we had paid as a culture for the dalliance of our Eleanor Stoddards and our J. Ward Moorehouses and our Eveline Hutchinses in Paris. The last book, "The Big Money," deals with the sequel of the war in the period of boom capitalism in the twenties. It is the era of stock speculation, mushroom real estate values, advertising and marketing, paradise on the instalment plan, the flowering of junior vice-presidents. Dos Passos has caught unforgettably the flow of American life at its high point—just before the Ice Age of the depression set in. The three books together form as complete a record as we have in fiction of the crest of American capitalist culture. If America is ever destroyed by war or overwhelmed by fascist barbarism, later generations may dig up these books and read what manner of lives we led.

Dos Passos, as is well known, is not an anatomist of the individual but a historian of the collective mentality. What he seeks to build up always is the climate of opinion—the milieu of emotion, aspiration, and shibboleth in which individuals move. This is what gives unity to each of the books. In "The Big Money" the dominating mood is the feverish desire to be where the sluices of wealth are running free and strong. The principal characters—Charley Anderson, Mary French, Margo Dowling, and Richard Ellsworth Savage—are either possessed by this desire or have to reckon with it. Charley Anderson will be remembered as the western boy whose mother ran a railroad boarding house and who had roughed it about a good deal before going to war. He comes back restless but determined to get at the big money, turns his mechanical sense to aviation, grows wealthy, marries a banker's daughter. But although he boasts of being mechanically "the boy with the knowhow," the boys at the pecuniary end outsmart him; he is stripped of most of his money, and the only love and pleasure he gets are what he buys. His tragedy is the tragedy of the technician in a money age, and of fine impulses in a shoddy culture. In fact the whole character may be regarded as a footnote to Veblen's "The Engineers and the Price System." Dick Savage does, on the surface at least, a good deal better. Harvard-bred, he comes back from a soft berth behind the lines in France to become J. Ward Moorehouse's right-hand man in the publicity racket. He is cruelly drawn. His life, no less than Charley Anderson's, is stripped of any real satisfactions—a sacrifice to the Moloch of the big money. But while Charley Anderson in going to his ruin adds something at least to the industrial arts, Savage adds nothing except marvelous ideas for getting Bingham's Patent Medicines across to the country.

There is a similar contrast between Mary French and Margo Dowling. Mary, after a middle-class girlhood in Colorado, wanders into social work, meets up with some steel strikers, falls in love with a succession of radicals and near-radicals, and learns that love can be just as frustrate on the fringes of the revolutionary movement as anywhere else. But despite the frustration she does throw her energies into organizing work which may some day have meaning for America. Margo Dowling on the other hand throws hers into building the illusion of glamour on the screen. She is the ruthless career girl on whom the boom decade smiles most kindly. She learns how to sleep her way to success, and her path carries her to Charley Anderson's arms, to the Miami land boom, and finally across the country to Hollywood where her smooth heartless face makes her exactly the person for director Sam Margolies to exalt to stardom.

To portray the collective mood and the mass culture requires technical innovation in the novel. To my knowledge Dos Passos has never formulated a theory about it, as Jules Romains has done with his unanimisme. But it is clear that he has in the realm of the novel-form what H. G. Wells has called in another connection the "skepticism of the instrument." He has played havoc with spelling and his punctuation has given the traditionalists among the critics some acute distress. More important, he has selected out of the stream of American living speech a new American language which for its vitality and usability should delight Mr. Mencken. Most important, he has contrived a film technique for giving perspectives, close-ups, rapid sequences difficult for the orthodox narrative.

The problem was this. Here are people neither sensitive nor complex, living a good part of their lives not far from the level of animal behavior. Here is a culture shot through with complex currents and cross-currents of influence which touch the lives and destinies of even the simplest people. Experience is no longer the tidy unity it was once believed. How can the author catch up the splintered fragments of experience and hold them up to view while at the same time getting something like a total effect? The answer was a fourfold technique. The narrative of individual fictional lives is told in an unadorned hard-surfaced manner—a modern picaresque that gives the barest details of overt behavior. The newsreel, made up of newspaper headlines, speeches, popular songs, tries to depict the mass consciousness and furnishes a backdrop against which the individual lives are enacted. The biography deals with historical Americans who summed up and expressed in their lives the main forces of their day. Finally, the camera eye turns the searchlight of the author's own intense brooding gaze at the set of events being discussed: it is a chaotic flow of consciousness, strangely subjective and lyrical amidst the expanse of objectivity elsewhere in the book, warm and intimate with the remembered rush of personal incident. Mechanically used, these four devices may merely make the problem of communication so much more complex. Skilfully interwoven they may go to form a unity that does not simplify, and hence falsify, the reality. There is a good deal of both—mechanical and skilful—in the trilogy. But in the last book Dos Passos has written with a passion that welds his material together as never before. The improved cunning of his hand is governed by a real heat of the brain. This book is therefore easily the best of the whole series.

The America of John Dos Passos that is presented in these pages is not a lovely America. How could it be? Dos Passos is one of the few novelists writing today who are truly literate. He knows things. He knows the force of institutions and mass ideas, he knows by what impulses people are moved, he knows what things are first things in a social system and what things are derivative, he knows the ways and the speech of common people. He is part of the America that he depicts, and he bestows upon the portrait that desperate tenderness that can only flow from love and solicitude turned into satire. His social analysis owes much to Marx, but essentially he is the Veblen of American fiction, sharing Veblen's rebelliousness, his restless questing mind, his hatred of the standardized middle class culture and of the leisure class aesthetic, his insight into American traits, his divided feeling about the underlying population. But beyond social analysis he has the qualities of the great novelist—tenderness, humanity, fertility. He is never at a loss to people his world, and already his world has come to have an existence of its own in the reader's mind, apart from the America it depicts.

One thing is certain—he will keep moving. His social beliefs are still fluid, his sense for innovation still has a sharp edge. But what will carry him farthest is his belief in American life. A sentence from one of his Camera Eyes (46) contains affirmation as well as irony: "I go home after a drink and a hot meal and . . . ponder the course of history and what leverage might pry the owners loose from power and bring back (I too Walt Whitman) our storybook democracy."

Prelude to Marxism

FROM HEGEL TO MARX. By Sidney Hook. A John Day Book. Reynal and Hitchcock. $4.

PROFESSOR HOOK has already won for himself a notable place as one of the three or four outstanding Marxist authorities of the time. This volume will add much to an already distinguished reputation. It is not merely that it unravels, with a sure command of the sources, the history of a complicated intellectual evolution. It is, even more, that it enables us to understand the pattern of events and ideas out of which the full Marxian doctrine emerged. We can never understand so well the import of a doctrine as when it is set in its full historical perspective. That Professor Hook has done with an enviable learning and (granted the difficulties of the theme) a remarkable clarity. At long last, the Anglo-American public has a book on the prelude to Marxism which deserves to rank with the best continental studies of the subject.

Professor Hook begins with a summary of the Hegelian doctrine which could hardly be bettered. There he passes in review the revolt against the master in which men like Strauss, Bauer, Ruge, Stirner, and Feuerbach were the protagonists. The value of his analysis is twofold. On the one hand, it enables us to see how the general environment of the time expressed, in all the varied realms of knowledge, its protest against doctrines which were the expression of an outworn political system; Professor Hook makes us see the unity of social and ideological forces in an admirable way. On the other hand, he has the great merit of making clear just how those forces led up to the shaping of the Marxian doctrine as their culmination. We recognize, in all its fullness, the ancestry of the idea. We see Marxism emerging, not only as a body of doctrine, but, as it were, a fighting method of which the purpose is to change the world as well as to interpret it. Theology, metaphysics, anthropology, history—all of them make their contribution.

The quality, I think, which distinguishes Marx from all his predecessors lies, above all, in his ability to recognize and unify the social implications of this very diverse material. He recognized what his predecessors only partially saw, that the purpose of interpretation is action, that ideas are instruments whereby man is made—or better, makes himself—the master of his destiny. That is the fundamental distinction between him and the left Hegelians. At some point they all shrank from taking that further step which transforms the word into the deed. Sometimes the cause of this limitation was, as with Bruno Bauer, largely the outcome of a defect of character. Sometimes, as with Strauss, it was born of a vision narrowed by the confinement of the material with which it dealt. Sometimes, as with Feuerbach, so much the greatest of those to whom Hegel gave birth, we have the perfect type of the intellectual sans phrase, who can analyze, but is unable to act. The outstanding eminence of Marx is that his learning was never learning merely; in the Socratic sense, it gave birth to an insight which compelled to a philosophy of life.

That is why, I think, the movement of which he was so magistrally the embodiment is rightly called by his name. What it was, it could hardly have been without these forerunners; what it was, also, it could not have been unless he had brought to its unification his formidable insight into the nature of social forces. He did what none of his predecessors seemed able to do: he transformed a body of scattered insights into a movement which was able to change the world because it understood that change is the proper outcome of understanding.

The reader of Professor Hook's illuminating survey will see this difference clearly if he reads the admirable commentary here given us of the famous theses on Feuerbach. They will, I think, lead him to a conclusion of great significance for our own time. For we too live in one of those epochs of critical transition not dissimilar to the generation after the close of the Napoleonic wars. Then, as now, changes in the relations of production were creating the need for vital adjustments in social values. Then, as now also, men were seeking liberation from an environment which seemed to all ardent spirits destructive of the hopes to which they felt entitled. Then, as now, the tactic of reaction was either wholesale repression or the concession of minor changes which left unchanged the fundamental pattern. The problem for the young Hegelians, as it is the problem for ourselves, was the discovery of a philosophy which brought theory and practice into an organic and creative relation. The outstanding value of Professor Hook's book is its careful and scholarly picture of how Marx achieved this nearly a century ago.

So far, at least, that task remains to be accomplished for ourselves. There is a confusion of cries on the battlefield. There is, as yet, no rallying point which gives unity of direction to the movement for a new synthesis. Our metaphysics is a monumental chaos; the social sciences have been betrayed into a passion for reconstructing normative principles. Religion has lost its confidence in theology and takes refuge, as in all epochs of fundamental crisis, in an anarchistic individualism built upon the validity of personal experience which refuses reason the opportunity of analysis. What is badly needed is a survey of the whole character of our age in terms of an explanation of the breakdown in its Weltanschauung. Unless we can attain this quickly we are, I believe, certain to witness the triumph of fascism all over the world. For the cause of that triumph lies always in the failure of those who feel the need to transform the world to produce a philosophy which gives their plea for action its full intellectual program. Professor Hook has here remarkably shown how the German movement performed the task a hundred years ago. An analysis of contemporary England and America in these terms would, I suggest, have lessons of abundant significance for ourselves. HAROLD J. LASKI

Spain in Revolt

THE OLIVE FIELD. By Ralph Bates. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

THE inhabitants of Los Olivares, in Andalusia, were mostly workers in the olive groves of Don Fadrique, or tenants farming small plots of arid land on his estate. Though among them were anarchists and socialists, and a communist or two, the people as a whole were an unambitious group, content to live from fiesta to fiesta under the ministrations of the priests of San Andrés—provided, of course, the land was fruitful enough, and the feudal economy stable enough, to sustain their customary way of life. This was in 1932.

But among the younger oliveros—many of whom had but recently been forced back on the land with the closing of the Puente Nuevo factories—there was a growing suspicion of the motives of the church, and of the connection between Father Soriano and Indalecio Argote, Don Fadrique's hated mayordomo. Old Father Martinez, of course, was harmless: he believed that the mule, ploughing shallow furrows, was the ruin of all Spain. But Soriano was less complacent: he spent his time delivering prolix sermons so subtle and intractable as to arouse resentment even among the pious; and when it was later found that he had conspired with Argote to have all workers fired who were suspected of political action, he earned the hatred of everyone.

During Holy Week the Passion of Christ was celebrated as if the church were still in favor, and disaster followed: the holy images were smashed and there was fighting in the streets, brought to an end finally by the appearance of the Civil Guard and the shooting of several citizens. Then a drought set in, endangering the olives and the tenants' crops. Caro and Mudarra, both anarchists, plotted to dynamite Don Fadrique's dam, but failed. A violent hailstorm added to the ruin of the crops, and when the workers were refused a wage increase they overran the olive fields in desperation, seizing Don Fadrique's fruit for themselves. But the Civil Guard arrived and its massacre of striking workers was enough to stun Los Olivares into passive acceptance of its doom. Meanwhile the Lerroux-Gil Robles reactionaries had gained control and Mudarra was imprisoned. Joaquín Caro, in disillusionment, migrated with his family to the mines of Asturias. Later he joined the communists and fought in the abortive miners' revolt of October, 1934. But the bloodshed then achieved one end: another leftward swing resulting in the Azaña government and the current phase of Spain's revolution.

To have constructed out of all this "human drama and spiritual conflict" a novel of 200,000 words, dealing with no

HOW YOU PROFIT FROM THIS DISCOVERY

For tens of thousands of miles, in millions of automobiles, the metal pipes that carry gas and oil withstand the vibration of high speeds and the jolts of rough roads. They are stronger, they last longer, because of electric-furnace brazing. Sealed in millions of electric refrigerators, vital parts made by this process keep the mechanism operating quietly, efficiently, year after year. The greater strength that comes from brazing means more dependable service for you, and fewer repair bills.

All-metal tubes in your new radio, sewing machines that make your clothing, calculating machines that serve in your bank and office—to all these, electric-furnace brazing has brought simpler, stronger, less costly construction.

Electric-furnace brazing—a process that causes copper to penetrate deep into pieces of harder metal, joining them into a solid whole—was developed in the General Electric Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, N. Y. And when G-E research gave industry this improved manufacturing method, it was saving industry—and you—millions of dollars in the cost and maintenance of manufactured products.

less than fifty-one characters, and to have done this with even partial success, as Mr. Bates has done, is an achievement deserving wholehearted praise. Though according to the publishers English critics have likened the book to Tolstoy's "War And Peace," such a comparison is patently absurd. "The Olive Field" is a novel on a vastly different and smaller scale; it is neither profound nor philosophical; it is a tactical narrative of the attempts of the Spanish people to create order out of economic chaos, and to attain the individual security which Spain has lacked for centuries.

If the traditional Spaniards in the book—Don Fadrique, the priests, Argote—seem more credible than the revolutionary protagonists, it is not, I think, so much the author's fault as it is the effect of the blurring of moral values incident to any revolution. In both Mudarra and Caro there is a psychological stoppage of the peasant spirit; substituted for all that is traditionally Spanish in them is an obsessive mental drive compounded of fear and political method.

Though Mr. Bates's style occasionally lacks discrimination, and though his treatment of human masses is at times confusing, he has so skilfully superimposed his multiple plot on the setting of continuous events that, in retrospect, his faults seem not seriously to have marred his book's chief effect. For essentially "The Olive Field" is not a novel at all but a synthesis of Spain in revolt, a panorama of a people set in motion.

The Changing Drama

PLAYS OF CHANGING IRELAND. Edited by Curtis Canfield. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

CONTEMPORARY ONE-ACT PLAYS FROM NINE COUNTRIES. Edited by Percival Wilde. Little, Brown, and Company. $2.75.

"EVERY theater, no matter how advanced or modern it may be or how lofty its ideal in the matter of spreading light over the Art of the Theater, must at some time face the Scylla of preciosity and intellectual pretentiousness or the Charybdis of commercially successful mediocrity." With this heavy sentence Mr. Canfield introduces one of the liveliest of the plays he reprints, George Shiels's "New Gossoon." The only thing to do with an editor who writes such no-English as this is to skim rapidly over his introductions, noting the facts they contain and ignoring their wordy generalizations about Realism, Expressionism, and all the other capitalized categories dear to academic vocabularies, and enjoy the plays themselves.

For they are enjoyable, both for their matter and their manner, and for the way they point up differences between Yeats's generation and the younger Dublin group. Unfortunately, O'Casey, the chief Irish genius of the post-war period, is unrepresented—for some reason his masterpiece, "The Silver Tassie," could not be included—but in spite of this omission the collection is significant in its proof of the way the peculiar isolation of older Irish drama is breaking down under the pressure of international modern tendencies. In particular, Mary Manning's "Youth's the Season" and Rutherford Mayne's "Bridge Head" indicate very clearly that Dublin is showing the same signs of decadence and rebirth that we note in America and elsewhere. Miss Manning's unhappy young Bohemians might as well be living in London or New York as in Dublin; Mr. Mayne's self-sacrificing engineers, serving the state for the sake of a future they will never see, might as well be Russians building a Five-Year Plan or Americans in the Tennessee Valley. Local atmosphere and quaint Irish color are far less noticeable here than in the work of Yeats, Synge, and Lennox Robinson, for they are almost entirely subordinated to the central themes of decay and resurrection in the modern world.

In Mr. Wilde's collection the contemporary chaos is still more evident, for Mr. Wilde is the bolder and more catholic in taste of the two editors and has a wider field to glean. Formerly an admirer of the vaudeville and of French boulevard drama, he has come to see that today's pioneer playwriting is being done in a very different style and on entirely new themes. He therefore includes in his varied bill of fare from nine countries, Paul Green's brave and terrible "Hymn to the Rising Sun" and Clifford Odets's no less terrible "Till the Day I Die," both tragic invectives against twentieth-century brutality, and two ironic forecasts of what the next war will bring us to—his own fantastic "World Without End" and "The Next War," by Hans Gross, a German. He presents several writers hitherto almost unknown in the United States: the grim Scotch proletarian, Joe Corrie; the Austrian poet, Lernet Holenia; the popular though insignificant Hungarian, Attila von Orbók. And he includes two very representative sentimental trifles from England, one by John Drinkwater and one by Phillip Johnson, which, like Henri Duvernois's "Bronze Lady," prove that pre-war dramatic fashions still interest some large audiences. Evreinov's psychological grotesque, "The Corridors of the Soul," apparently Mr. Wilde's own favorite among these plays, he offers in a new translation from Coskor's German version which is fuller and more entertaining than the English edition published in the twenties.

The range and variety of theme and style in these nine short plays make Mr. Wilde's volume fairly representative of the contemporary theater in Europe and America. The editor's introductions, too, are informative and acute, especially his essay on The Drama and the Nazis, written with more intense feeling and therefore more freely than some of the other prefaces in which his rather formal standards for good technique are shown to be not quite abreast of recent theories and practice. Yet he everywhere gives proof of wide and first-hand knowledge of his art and of an open mind for the experiments of younger men, qualities which mark his editorial work as superior to that of most anthologists.

SUMMER WILL SHOW. Sylvia Townsend Warner. The Viking Press. $2.50.

TO those impatient Marxist critics who assess the value of a revolutionary novel in terms of its potential agitational effect upon the behavior of a steel worker, Sylvia Townsend Warner's new novel will be of small concern. Remote in time and geography from American industrial struggles, exquisitely, subtly, and intellectually wrought, "Summer Will Show" could hardly, by direct stimulation, influence the course of a single Ohio worker's life. Yet to those other Marxists who believe that the power of their revolution can be determined in part by the quality of the minds it attracts to itself, Miss Warner's tale of Paris and 1848 will be at the very least heartening.

In this novel it is Miss Warner's purpose simply to exhibit with what irresolute but energetic steps an English lady of the Victorian period walked toward the revolution. Sophia Willoughby is a country gentlewoman of birth, means, intelligence, force, and practicality. Not in her marriage to a conventional, dependent, amiable, rakish husband, nor in her two conventional young children, nor in the management of her conventional estate, can she find adequate food for her capacities.

With the death of her children, Sophia, hitherto no more than restive, begins to flounder actively toward fulfillment. Catching first at the most obvious straw, she takes herself off to Paris to ask of her estranged husband the cold favor of another child.

On this purely domestic errand, she meets the barricades. Through her husband's mistress, a Jewish disense and romantic revolutionary, she is precipitated into political activity. In the beginning, she merely gyrates about the whirlpool of insurrection, touching much that is meretricious, much that is sincere but misdirected. Confused and vacillant, Sophia nevertheless works, singing on street corners, distributing leaflets, scavenging scrap metal for bullets; works because she loves the Jewess, and because it is her nature to be efficient. Out of the defeat of the Paris Communists, Sophia salvages no shred of her personal life: she loses her husband, her money, her family connections; even the rebellious Jewess she forfeits on the barricades. The novel ends with the Englishwoman, physically beaten, shabby, sitting in the disordered apartment of her dead friend, opening, for the first time, the leaflets she has circulated, discovering the Communist Manifesto.

As the dénouement of "Summer Will Show," where elegance burns into fervor, seems to me the most triumphal single moment in revolutionary fiction, so the whole elaborate, fine-spun novel seems the most skilful, the most surefooted, sensitive, witty piece of prose yet to have been colored by left-wing ideology. There are times when Miss Warner verges on preciosity, when the skins of her two women seem too emphatically thin, and the balance of their hairtrigger relationship unnecessarily delicate. The faults of the book are, however, trifling. The book is important, first because it makes clear that Miss Warner, always a competent novelist, has graduated at last from her preoccupation with the picturesque aspects of life to a consideration of its serious emotional and ethical values; second, because it indicates, by implication at any rate, that the left wing has been able to recruit from bourgeois literature a more highly trained, more cerebral fiction writer than it has previously had in its reserve corps.

The Rest of William Morris

WILLIAM MORRIS: ARTIST, WRITER, SOCIALIST. By May Morris. Volume I: THE ART OF WILLIAM MORRIS; MORRIS AS A WRITER. Volume II: MORRIS AS A SOCIALIST; WITH AN ACCOUNT OF WILLIAM MORRIS AS I KNEW HIM. By Bernard Shaw. Oxford University Press. 52s. 6d.

THESE two volumes are supplementary to the twenty-four in which May Morris collected her father's works between 1910 and 1915, and add to that impressive monument all the chips and stone-dust which she considered worthy of being swept into view. The thirteen hundred large pages here restore to print an astonishing variety of things: reviews, prefaces to other people's books, articles, communications to editors, addresses at annual meetings of æsthetic and socialist societies, and papers on the restoration of ancient buildings. They publish for the first time a number of poems, stories, and sketches. They preserve the opinions of those who knew Morris, including chiefly Bernard Shaw. The various long introductions by the editor place on permanent record a great deal of information which only a member of Morris's family could have had concerning his habits of work and his character at home. And at the end there is an index, none too full it may be remarked, to the twenty-six volumes from which the great Victorian virtuoso now looks at us full-length, daring us to pass a final judgment upon his wisdom, his art, and his eventual usefulness in some society which may or may not turn out to be the thing he wanted society to be.

The man is obviously still alive, though he was buried in Kelmscott Churchyard forty years ago and though the habit has grown on us meanwhile of dismissing him as a sentimental medievalist who dispersed his energy among too many forms of art. It would therefore be absurd to take his dare. For one thing, what are we to make of the fact that Cunninghame Graham said of him: "Never to have known the man is to lose half of him"? Is this true, or is Shaw right when he insists at the close of his incomparable memoir: "With such wisdom as my years have left me I note that as he has drawn further and further away from the hurly-burly of our personal contacts into the impersonal perspective of history he towers greater and greater above the horizon beneath which his best advertised contemporaries have disappeared"? There could never have been any doubt that Morris was a personality of huge strength and charm, a happy man both in his birth and in his work, a force indeed still far from spent. And it has been the easier thing to suppose Cunninghame Graham correct; the furniture-designer, the painter of wallpapers, the weaver of tapestries, the practitioner in stained glass, the poet, the translator, the romancer, the socialist—all of these together were amazing, but was any of them first-rate? Shaw's answer is perhaps extravagant, yet total deafness to it at the moment would be stupid. He declares Morris to have been "quite simple and quite right" in his socialism, and prophesies that the Russians will presently discard as he did the "intellectual trifling" of Marx's dialectic. He insists that Morris was "a very great literary artist"; his lectures survive as "the best books in the Bible of Socialism," he produced in "Sigurd the Volsung," "the greatest epic since Homer," and his "Odyssey" is "a nobler translation than the tale is worth." Shaw, in other words, goes to the works themselves and claims for them an absolute value having nothing to do with their value as reminders of the essence which was Morris in the flesh. Will a generation which never knew "Topsy" have as much to say for what he left behind him? The answer is difficult.

Such a generation, for instance, may set less store than ours does by tightness in poetry. The poetry of Morris was as loose as the wind, so that even its admirers admit being unable to find evidence of its virtue in separate lines or phrases. They find abundant evidence in the poems as wholes; nor do they think less of Morris because poetry came out of him with so little labor. His daughter testifies that certain of his manuscripts show the effort if not the agony of revision, yet it must be true that most of his verses took shape as his first ones did at Oxford, in 1855, when Burne-Jones exclaimed over their excellence and Morris replied: "If this is poetry, it is very easy to write." It is conceivable that his facility may some day be forgiven him, just as his versatility in several other arts has long ago been forgiven him by those who treasure his designs and observe that much of what he did has been absorbed into the decorative procedures of Europe and America today. His daughter's account of him as a decorative artist is as a matter of fact impressive; his touch was firm and human, and half a century of time does not seem to have dimmed the figure of his imagination which he painted in a dozen mediums. As for his thinking about society, it may very well be as exhaustive as it was simple. All he desired was that the world cease to be unnecessarily ugly and that its inhabitants be given the opportunity to enjoy their labor—not only the fruits of it but the thing itself. He never lost sight of those two principles, and never bothered to complicate them with intellectual operations which he supposed to be superfluous. It remains desirable that they be kept in sight.

CODICES LATINI ANTIQUIORES, A PALEOGRAPHICAL GUIDE TO LATIN MANUSCRIPTS PRIOR TO THE NINTH CENTURY. Part II. Edited by E. A. Lowe. Oxford University Press. $20.

IN THE second instalment of Dr. Lowe's magnum opus the scene of action shifts from the Vatican City to Great Britain and Ireland, in whose libraries the editor has for years been thoroughly at home. Although the same completeness, acumen, and ability to present much in little space are everywhere apparent, this reviewer must express again his regret that the manuscripts, with their facsimiles, are not arranged in chronological order. It would have been easy to arrange the items according to their kinds and their periods, with an index of manuscripts at the end. In this way the work would have been far more valuable as a "paleographical guide," stimulating the reader to compare, to distinguish, and to discover. The interest of the book is, however, by no means limited to paleography—or paleography in the old-fashioned sense. Not only are the constituents of a script nowadays discussed, but its history and its connection with the larger history of the times as well. Dr. Lowe, always modest, would be the first to admit that the final word has not yet been uttered, for instance, on the origin of the Irish script or of the essential differences between it and early English; doubtless the researches of Professor C. H. Bee-son will throw further light on these and other problems of moment. Such details are admittedly controversial, but one of the virtues of Dr. Lowe's work is that it stimulates controversy.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF PHYSICS. By Max Planck. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

THIS book can in no sense be called a philosophy of physics. It consists of Max Planck's ideas on religion, teaching, philosophy, and God. It is distressing to realize that a man of such intellect can come to advocate a German physics. His own presentation of the difficulty of the specialist's spreading his views beyond his field should have been applied at its source. "This deserves all the more emphasis because every expert tends to exaggerate the importance of his special field in proportion to the length of time spent on it and to the difficulties encountered. And once he has discovered the solution of a problem, he tends to exaggerate its scope and to apply the solution to cases of a totally different nature." There are no views presented in this book which have not been presented elsewhere, and with greater clarity.

FROM PARCHED LANDS

Dear Sirs: I do not approve of your comments on the drought in your issue of July 11. You are too far east to be conversant with history and conditions here. I came in 'sixty-nine at seven years of age. Long years ago I realized that this was a semi-arid region. I am a devoted lover of trees, shrubs, and flowers.

The first pioneers told of a drought in the early 'sixties when the native grasses failed to produce hay! Settlers in the Big Sioux, a lovely, fertile valley, had to go five and six miles to the west to the "sloughs," by which I grew up, to mow the coarse, saw-tooth-edged grass, "and," added a woman who heard the story told, "they could not tell in the morning where they left off the previous day." In 'sixty-nine and 'seventy that grass was way over the heads of us children, as we went after the cattle; we had to listen for them, could not see them.

Plenty of rain in the 'seventies. About 1875-76 wheat grew in shocks, rotted in stacks. Roads ran twin brooklets in the "slough" lands (low ground in valley of the Missouri River). Settlers pulled up stakes and went on to Oregon and Washington Territory. The winter of 1880-81 was the "winter of the big snow"; the spring of 'eighty-one was the "spring of the big flood"—the little city of Vermillion, at the foot of the table-land, washed out in one night. It grew drier through the 'eighties. In 'ninety-four came a great drought. The Brule Creek near my home went dry that year; I do not recall that occurring again 'till 1925-26. The latter year went we after August; drowned out southern and southeast Iowa, flooded coal mines, laid hay meadows flat in mud, overflowed sidewalks. About twenty years or more ago the Big Sioux overflowed fifteen consecutive years in the spring.

In the late 'nineties waves of settlers flowed into the state only to be burned out and "go back east and live with the wife's folks," leaving their all behind in the shape of good buildings on the abandoned farms.

On the whole, the years have been wet or dry, with the hot dry spells every summer. But never such a succession of hot, dry years as the first half of the 'thirties, up to the present phenomenal spell of weather. Remember, this drought began in the southeast, and extends from the Rockies to the Atlantic seaboard, more or less.

People must have land to live. In my youth the frontier vanished; the arable wild land was all taken. We must restore what we have wasted. We must terrace, dam, and conserve, that men may live. A man familiar with the "west-river country" in this state figures that a wheat crop one year in three is worth two or three times the value of an annual grass crop in the same period of time.

Why this unearthly, unprecedented, hot, dry weather over all the land? Residents of the Atlantic states, which have been populated for two centuries or more, ought to be able to throw some light on the situation. We are new out here. The sloughs, creeks, and water holes are dried up. We have ditched and drained, but our corn usually stands twelve feet tall, and normally gives fifty to sixty bushels to the acre. Just now my ten-acre alfalfa is ready for a second cutting that we think will equal the first, which gave at least fifteen tons of hay.

It seems to me the physical world is in revolution as well as the world of men.

ALICE A. TOLLEFSON

Elk Point, South Dakota, July 14, 1936

WHAT MAN HAS WROUGHT

Dear Sirs: I was struck by a sentence in your comment on a letter from M. E. Poyer in your issue of August 1. The sentence is as follows:

We call his attention to the fact that there is an unprecedented drought also in the Southeastern states where nothing new is imputable to man's action [Italics mine.]

I take it that sentence is intended, in view of what M. E. Poyer states, to mean that the same human insanity that stripped the West of its natural water holdings did not affect the Southeast.

I suggest that you stand on the banks of the Warrior, Alabama, Flint, Chatahoogie, and Savannah rivers and note the color of them all and then get some old person who knew those rivers sixty years ago, to tell you what was their color then. Sixty years ago, aye fifty, those rivers ran colored only by decayed and decaying timbers, leaves and vegetation, clear in great part and appearing black except on closer view. Today those same rivers are red in color and carrying the soil of Alabama, Georgia, the Carolinas, and western Mississippi to the sea.

Gone are the great forests which covered the hills, while for mile on mile the bare red earth, full of gullies and baked to a cinder, holds no water for any length of time. Great hills stick out bare of the red soil that once covered them, even after the timber was cut, mere piles of sand which are also finding their way, blown by every gale, toward the lowlands, covering the good soil there.

Man, and man alone, is responsible for it all.

OWEN KEEFE

St. Louis, July 30

"THE JEWS OF GERMANY"

Dear Sirs: In reviewing my work, "The Jews of Germany: A Story of Sixteen Centuries," Mr. James Waterman Wise registered two complaints with which I am loath to quarrel, for apparently he means well by the book and its philosophy; but in order to advance his own points he has, I think, belittled and misrepresented mine.

His first complaint is that while I have "repeatedly" shown the economic basis of anti-Semitism, I have done so "at times with insufficient explicitness." Thumbing the book I estimate that I have devoted well over one-third of its 425 pages to the economic background of German and Jewish history—a greater proportion, as far as I know, than has ever been given to economics in any general history of Jewry or a portion of Jewry. It would have been fairer of Mr. Wise to state in what period and connection my economics were insufficient.

Secondly, he complains that my closing chapters "fall short in stating the wider implications of German Jewry's fate"—meaning that I merely "whispered in dulcet tones" the important fact that anti-Semitism is a menace not only to its victims but to its exponents.

I gave over twenty pages to stating precisely this point—for example, at the beginning of my account of the Aryan myth (p. 290); in discussing the use made of Aryanism to drug the middle classes (pp. 329-331); in my analysis of the Nazi platform (pp. 326 and 367); in describing the Nazi seizure of power (pp. 397-98), the boycott of April 1, 1933 (p. 399), the method employed to put over the Nuremberg Laws and their concealed joker (pp. 403-06), and the terror after the burning of the Reichstag (p. 395).

In the course of stating these wider implications I called—and gave detailed reasons for calling—anti-Semitism “a racial cloak thrown over the class struggle.” The Jew, I expressly declared, was not only a scapegoat, but “more insidious and ruinous to his oppressors, he is used as a blind. Even as the pack hunts him with hue and cry, it is they who are stripped of their rights and strength.”

I can't argue whether my expressions, racial cloak and blind, and many other similar ones which I used, are more “dulcet” than Mr. Wise's term smoke screen; but the fact that they did not catch his ear only proves that no reader or reviewer is so deaf as the man who can hear nothing but the boom of his own voice.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL

Monsey, New York, July 10

Dear Sirs: Mr. Lowenthal has insufficiently analyzed the criticisms to which he objects in my review. He answers the first by pointing with pride to the amount of space—“well over one-third of its 425 pages”—devoted by him to the economic background of German anti-Semitism. What I criticized, however, was the lack not of extensiveness but of explicitness in this connection. Moreover, the very fact that Mr. Lowenthal totals a certain number of pages “given to economics,” rather than recognizes the functional necessity of economic interpretation throughout, proves my contention.

Again, in regretting Mr. Lowenthal's failure to state “the wider implications of Germany Jewry's fate,” I meant and mean the implications of action which can prevent its repetition elsewhere. His analysis, while correct, was undynamic. Yet, if the tragic story of the Jews of Germany has any value beyond the memorial, it is as object-lesson in the necessity of militant and united struggle against reaction. Concerning a danger imminent as I hold fascism to be, understanding which does not insistently lead to action, degenerates into folly.

As to the “boom of [my] own voice” which the author charges has deafened me to his arguments, I flee for comfort to an older and, perhaps, even more authentic tradition of Jewish life and letters than Mr. Lowenthal's. In such times and upon such issues as those which today confront the friends of peace and freedom, it permits, indeed commands, us to Cry Aloud and Spare Not!

JAMES WATERMAN WISE

New York, July 28

Dear Sirs: I turned from Marvin Lowenthal's “The Jews of Germany” to the review of it by James Waterman Wise—to discover with amazement that this reviewer considers the economic basis of anti-Semitism to have been shown with insufficient explicitness, and also that Mr. Lowenthal has fallen short in stating the wider implications of German Jewry's fate.

Having just risen from reading the book I am profoundly impressed by the brilliant manner in which the economic basis is shown to underlie every aspect of the question from the first records relating to the Jews down to the present day—and this with such deftness, balance, lucidity, and pertinacity that the most scatter-brained reader could not possibly escape the conclusion which Mr. Lowenthal does not argue but demonstrates.

This is a book of such immense importance that it seems to me something of a calamity to give a wrong impression of it. Its most valuable aspect is just the one which Mr. Wise finds lacking. It is not a book about Jews only, but about Germany; and not only about Germany, but about civilization. And any reader who does not understand from it that Germany's treatment of Jews and communists and liberals has been a smoke screen for the material and spiritual enslavement of the whole German people has certainly been wool gathering.

THE ADVANTAGES OF STRIKES

Dear Sirs: As we are not able to afford a subscription to your magazine, a kindly neighbor lends us hers, and to us it is a ray of hope in an atmosphere generally murky where labor relations are concerned. I wish that some publicity could be loosed which would be convincing to the small retail and business men that the strike is not a weapon aimed at them. The NRA showed them that while laws concerning labor will be invoked against them, the really guilty offenders will not be touched. This has made them more skeptical than ever of any form of organized labor activity. They should be helped to realize that the strike proper can be, and usually is, directed at the sorest spots, and is really a bulwark to the small dealers, as it enables them to have better buying and paying customers. Moreover, the chain store, which these small business men fear and detest, is really a weapon against the strike, because it precludes the possibility of the striker being carried by a friendly fellow townsman, and also removes the stake the local business people have in the success of the strike.

May I thank you for your honest championship of what your careful judgment dictates.

INDUSTRIAL UNIONISM

Dear Sirs: Certain of the craft union moguls in the A. F. of L. argue against industrial unionism on the ground that something similar was tried in the days of the Knights of Labor and failed. With about as plausible a show of reasoning might the framers of our Constitution have said at Philadelphia: Democracy was tried in ancient Athens. It failed. Ergo, we should not try it now.

Long ago, before craft versus industrial unionism was debated, John Stuart Mill, with that marvelous insight into economic and social relations which at times characterized him, said:

If no improvement were to be hoped for in the general circumstances of the working classes, the success of a portion of them, however small, in keeping their wages, by combination, above the market-rate, would be wholly a matter of satisfaction. But when the elevation of the character and condition of the entire body has at last become a thing not beyond the reach of rational effort, it is time that the better paid classes of skilled artisans should seek their own advantage in common with, and not by exclusion of, their fellow laborers. While they continue to fix their hopes on hedging themselves in against competition, and protecting their own wages by shutting out others from access to their employment, nothing better can be expected from them than total absence of any large and generous aims . . . Success, even if attainable in raising up a protected class of working people, would now be a hindrance instead of a help to the emancipation of the working classes at large.

The Knights of Labor failed, it is true. The present drive for industrial unionism may also fail. However, if labor is to save its own neck it will eventually have to direct its action along this line.

MATTHEW ARNOLD, BISMARCK, AND NAPOLEON

In his last effusion, "Geist," Mr. Matthew Arnold's especial target is Mr. Goldwin Smith who, in suggesting a possible alliance of England and United Germany against the Second Empire, has laid himself open to the formidable charge of "Ungeist" — unintelligence, stupidity. The alliance will rather be the other way, says Mr. Arnold, since Prussia and France, like one body, are animated by "Geist," of which England has not a particle; and he concludes his half-contemptuous attack with a recommendation to the British people to get "Geist." Mr. Arnold may sneer at the instinct of parties—he is not in sympathy with the spirit of the age when he sides with the arbitrary "Geist" of Bismarcks and Napoleons. The world has too much of it already and does not need to be told to "get" more. . . . Considering that Napoleon's reign has been a systematic repression of whatever is pure, independent, aspiring, enlightened that threatens the stability of his throne, what juster than to identify him with that Mephistopheles—"Ich bin der Geist der stets verneint"?

PARIS GOSSIP

The habit of driving, so common among English ladies, imitated here by several of the leading ambiguities, has been followed, as usual, by the lady leaders of the bon-ton; . . . At first, the sight of a lady driving would bring all walkers to a stand-still; now it is regarded as a matter of course, and no one supposes, as formerly, that a vehicle so driven must necessarily come to grief.

BENIGHTED WORKERS

Those workingmen who are in favor of an eight-hour movement have held a "Labor Congress" in which they said a good many wise things—such as that co-operation was the great remedy for the ills of the working classes; and a good many foolish things—such as their talk of "the alarming encroachments of capital on the rights of the industrial classes." If the capitalists were to refrain from these "encroachments," two-thirds of the workingmen of the country would starve. But there is, after all, something deplorable in the ignorance exhibited by workingmen of the laws which regulate their relations with their employers throughout this eight-hour agitation, and what makes it all the worse is that the agitation itself is due to the growing tendency of all classes of the public to believe that remedies for all social ills are to be found in legislation. If the American workman is unfit to make his own bargain with his employer, then democracy is a failure and our institutions no better than those of the Old World.

THE FEMALE PHYSICIAN

The common mind finds no good and conclusive reason why women should be barred from the privilege of practicing the healing art. Why should we not employ a doctress if we like? We might, it is true, have our suspicions as to the likelihood of her retaining in so high a degree as one of the sterner sex, efficiency and sang-froid in the case of dire emergency. . . . To the physician it presents another aspect. It is esteemed unprofessional for a reputable male physician to hold communion of any kind with a female physician. . . . Medical teaching whether by dissections, demonstrations, lectures and diagrams, or by the run of the hospital, becomes so unpleasantly complicated by that regard for the bien-séances which a mixed audience requires, that as yet very few professors of note have been found willing to instruct such audiences. . . . Regard for truth demands the further admission that the female aspirants for the medical profession must, as a general rule, from the very nature and condition of things as they now are, be persons at whom the individual male physician may well be pardoned if he looks askance.

HENRY JAMES ON GEORGE ELIOT

Better, perhaps, than any of George Eliot's novels does "Felix Holt" illustrate her closely wedded talent and foibles. Her plots have always been artificial—clumsily artificial—the conduct of her story slow and her style diffuse. . . . The plot of "Felix Holt" is essentially made up, and its development is forced. The style is the same lingering, slow-moving, expanding instrument which we already know. The termination is hasty, inconsiderate, and unsatisfactory—is, in fact, almost an anti-climax. It is a good instance of a certain sagacious tendency to compromise which pervades the author's spirit, and to which her novels owe the disproportion between the meager effect of the whole and the vigorous character of the different parts, which stamp them as the works of a secondary thinker and an incomplete artist. But if such are the faults of "Felix Holt," we hasten to add that its merits are immense, and that the critic finds it no easy task to disengage himself from the spell of so much power, so much brilliancy, and so much discretion. . . . George Eliot has the exquisitely good taste on a small scale, the absence of taste on a large, the unbroken current of feeling, and, we may add, of expression, which distinguish the feminine mind.

NEWS FROM SPAIN CONTINUES TO BE VERY difficult to interpret. Although both sides are lavish in their claims of victory, the situation as we go to press remains much as it was after the first few days of fighting. The government has made some progress on the crucial fronts around Saragossa and Madrid, and appears to have slightly the better of the situation in the South. The rebels, on the other hand, have recaptured Badajoz, which they held in the first week of the war, and are said to be threatening to retake San Sebastian. Without question the American newspapers have been giving a much better press to the rebels than to the government forces. In certain instances, as in the case of the Hearst press, this may be assumed to represent a definite bias, but to some extent Madrid itself is at fault. The few American correspondents who are with the government forces complain that Madrid censors are utterly lacking in news sense, and that they are prevented from sending the type of dispatches which the home editors demand. The result is that many of the best correspondents are sending very little from Madrid, and the papers continue to be filled with virtually worthless propaganda from rebel quarters.

WHILE THE PROGRESS OF THE GOVERNMENT forces has been disappointingly slow, it must be remembered that the loyalists have every advantage in a long-drawn-out struggle. At the outset the rebels were in much the stronger position. They had the whole army back of them, they were prepared, and they were aided by the element of surprise. But the government, having defeated the first thrust and held the rebels at bay for nearly a month, would seem to have increasingly favorable prospects. It controls not only the main industrial regions but practically all the ports, and has succeeded in reestablishing regular communications among the sections which it controls. The breathing space has given it a much-needed opportunity to equip and train its citizen army, as well as to perform the even more difficult task of organizing supplies on a war basis. Lacking an industrial hinterland, the rebels must depend on foreign sources for their supplies. And while Germany and Italy have shown themselves only too willing to aid their fascist colleagues, the extent of their aid is limited by the relative isolation of the rebel forces. Madrid officials admit that the struggle may go on several months before reaching a decisive stage. But with the overwhelming majority of the population strongly loyal to the republic, they admit no doubt regarding the ultimate outcome.

SECRETARY WALLACE THINKS THAT IT MAY not be necessary for the government to restrict farm production next year. That is good news. However necessary restriction may have been when we were at the bottom of the depression, it is no useful part of a permanent agricultural policy. Any such policy must turn on a detailed improvement of the land and of the condition of the farm population. It will involve erosion control and the diversification of farm production. There is need for a determined effort to replace farm tenancy by ownership, and large holdings by family farms. A real farm policy will work toward better education of farmers, particularly training in cooperation, beginning with consumer cooperation. It should be borne in mind that our serious agricultural surpluses have always been a consequence of the mining out of the fertility of our land, the draining away of the energy and hope of our farm population through excessive rentals, mortgage debt burdens, and inflated cost of supplies. If we take care of our land and the labor on it, we shall produce enough to feed our people, but not enough to choke them. Perhaps it will be necessary for a few years to play with Secretary Wallace's "ever-normal granary" in order to limit the unhealthy surpluses still produced by the continuance of our soil-robbing and soul-robbing agriculture. But it is to be hoped that not too much governmental energy will be diverted to this scheme, which, like Triple-A, can have no future.

THE SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER, HEARST organ, failed on Friday to make its morning appearance on Seattle doorsteps, after members of Typographical Union 202 had declined to walk to work through picket lines thrown round the P. I. building by striking Newspaper Guild men. Approximately forty out of sixty-odd Hearst editorial employees went out on strike Thursday to protest the dismissal of two members of the staff for union activity. Frank Lynch, staff photographer for fifteen years, and Everhardt Armstrong, dramatic critic for seventeen years, had been fired shortly after it became known that they had joined the Newspaper Guild. Though Lynch had recently been given a five-dollar increase in salary, Hearst's straw publisher, W. V. Tanner, attributed his dismissal to "inefficient and wasteful methods"; Armstrong's he laid to "gross insubordination." Solidarity is being manifested on both sides of the fence. The guild strike is being backed by the Central Labor Council, and union longshoremen, metal-trades workers, teamsters, maritime workers, and teachers are picketing side by side with guild members. The two other newspapers of the city have stretched out helping hands to William Randolph Hearst. Editorially, they have invoked the "freedom of the press" with the customary hysteria. Practically, they have offered to print Mr. Hearst's paper in their own plants. Their typographers, however, though bound by contract, have refused to participate in this entente cordiale, declaring that it would endanger life and limb to set up a scab newspaper in anybody's plant. Therefore, though the outcome remains uncertain, the guild has won the first round, for the P. I. appears to have suspended publication indefinitely. Local Landon forces are reported to be extremely upset by their ally's labor trouble. "Labor's right to organize" has been too blatantly questioned by Mr. Hearst; and it is said that state Republican chieftains are putting the heat on Mr. Tanner to take back his employees and end the strike as quickly and quietly as possible.

THE PRESIDENT'S ASSURANCE THAT NO NEW tax laws are contemplated for the next session of Congress may be good politics, but it is not good statecraft. Nobody knows how soon the increase in existing revenues caused by returning prosperity will catch up with the relief burden and make a balancing of the budget possible. Unemployment is likely to prove a more stubborn social malady than we usually assume. Production is going ahead, but as it gets under way it is sure to put into operation many new labor-saving devices that have accumulated during the depression. Farm relief is likely to prove more insistent and more expensive than ever. Whatever the inescapable public expenditures may be, we cannot safely carry them through public credit, once prosperity has returned. If we do we shall not long have any public credit left. The government must be prepared to find new sources of revenue or to increase the productivity of existing sources. Although the Republicans say little about it, they unquestionably have the sales tax up their sleeve, but the Democrats ought not to bind themselves to an exclusive reliance upon fate in recovery. In case of need they should be prepared to make the income tax more productive by raising rates, especially in the lower brackets, where the burden is very light as compared with British income taxation.

DOWN IN OLD KENTUCKY THE NATIVES SEEM to know what they like and to go in for it in a big way. The other day the inhabitants of Owensboro and surrounding points turned the official hanging of a Negro into a sort of legal lynching bee, and a pleasant time seems to have been had by all—all being so many thousand white, Nordic natives that the crowd, according to the World-Telegram, "spread out from the foot of the gallows . . . up the slope of a hill as far as the eye could see in the murky dawn light. Men and women stood on the roofs of surrounding buildings. Men and boys hung from telephone poles. Men and women leaned out of windows, stood on automobiles. There were even some on the roof of the hearse waiting to take the body away." Many of the citizens gave "hanging parties" the night before, and proceeded—not all entirely sober, it would appear—from private to public conviviality. It may or may not be considered a tribute to the delicacy of the police that "good-natured persons heated by drink were permitted to shout their pleasantries, but those who spoke out revengefully against the condemned man were suppressed." At the end there was a rush for the gallows inclosure by ghouls avid of souvenirs. Such is civilization in the commonwealth of Kentucky in this year of our Lord, 1936. And such is the American material ready to the hand of any fascist rabble-rouser. German papers please copy.

JAMES TRUE, HEAD MAN OF JAMES TRUE Associates, was planning to have a pogrom in September, according to the New Masses. Mr. True denied the story to a reporter from the World-Telegram but did admit that he was interested "in getting rid of political Jews." This advance publicity will probably cause a postponement of Mr. True's pogrom, but presumably it did not interfere with the program of the National Conference of Clergymen and Laymen, sponsored by the American Forward Movement "for Americanism, Religion, and Righteousness," which met August 12 in Asheville, North Carolina. Its aim was to have one clergyman, one business man, and one woman from every county in every state attend as a delegate, and the subjects on its programs ranged from The Truth About Consumers Cooperatives to Communism Our Common Enemy. The Reverend Ralph E. Nollner is the chairman of this little group of serious stinkers (we use the word in its good old American sense). We shall probably print further reports of the Asheville gathering if the intense heat does not cause it to explode with its own patriotic petard.

THE BLUM GOVERNMENT REALLY DOES MEAN business! Such at least was our involuntary exclamation when we read that it had laid vigorous hands upon that Holy of Holies—and Morgue of Morgues—the Comédie Francaise. Governments have come and governments have gone, but heretofore no rightist or leftist has done more than look reproachful and hurt when reminded of the fact that even country cousins now stay away from the House of Molière and that school children rebel against the occasional visit which is considered a necessary part of their education. Last week, however, the Blum government took time out to appoint Eduard Bourdet manager of the Comédie and to put Jacques Rouché at the head of the Opéra Comique, where the company recently went out on strike against its former governor. Only in France would even a leftist government make the author of "The Captive" (banned in New York because lesbianism was its theme) a government official. But if he really succeeds in modernizing the Comédie the achievement will be of international importance inasmuch as it will remove the chief existing argument against government concern with the arts.

THE SOUTH WAS DEALT ACES FROM THE NEW Deal pack when it got the TVA. But while cheap electricity generated new life in the uplands, 1,800,000 families of tenants and share-croppers starved and drudged and battled for existence in the cotton belt. In calling for a federal grand-jury investigation of peonage conditions in Arkansas, the New Deal has at last come around to them. Peonage, according to the federal statute intended to banish it forever from this country, consists in "involuntary or voluntary labor . . . in liquidation of any debt or obligation." But in the South, where the croppers never see the light of a debtless day, the holy alliance of law and the planters has made nonsense of the peonage act. Two days after the Department of Justice announced the grand-jury trial it suddenly dawned on Governor Futrell of Arkansas that the croppers were an "under-privileged class," and he called a conference of Southern governors to study remedies for the tenant situation. Governor Futrell envisages a program of long-term financing through federal and state cooperation to enable tenants to buy their own farms. This would be a step in the right direction—if it is ever taken. If the conference acts in the spirit of Governor Leche of Louisiana, whose comment was that "it never hurts to discuss a situation," or in that of Commissioner of Agriculture Holton of Mississippi, who said "it might be a good idea for friends of the South to get together and stop all this propaganda about the share-croppers," we doubt that it will be. But if the grand jury can screw its courage to the sticking-point and indict the planters for peonage, the governors may yet be pushed into doing something constructive.

PATRIOTISM MADE WHOOPEE IN HOLLYWOOD at the California state convention of the American Legion as middle-aged playboys with hangovers, led by kootch dancers, amateur clowns, and very little boys, pranced up and down Hollywood Boulevard in a five-day binge. Deprived since they came home from France of war's "ennobling experience," the legionnaires went in for a little private ennoblement at their final session when the commander and vice-commander let fly with their fists in a battle to possess the gavel, and 2,300 veterans roared and slugged and fought it out on the floor. Militarism rampant was the keynote, too, of their platform, which was pledged to stamp out communism and fascism and to defend "equal rights to all citizens of our country." High lights of this campaign are the proposed vigorous "drive against school pacifism," deportation of all aliens with socialistic tendencies, suspension of immigration for ten years, a vast and costly increase in armaments and military personnel, retention of the criminal-syndicalism law, and compulsory finger-printing of all citizens. Something about this program gives anyone who has followed recent German history a twinge of recognition. The "Americanism" pamphlet recently issued by the Willard Straight Post and the veterans' stand against teachers' oaths had given us hopes for the Legion. We should like to see its forthcoming national convention in September held in this spirit rather than in that of the Hollywood carouse.

Sacco and Vanzetti: died August 23, 1927.

Program for Progressives

WE are witnessing today in America the break-up of the traditional party system. But it is a fair question whether we are also the privileged witnesses of the birth of a new party alignment. Dorothy Thompson, writing in her column for August 13, lets the allurements of a phrase run away with her better judgment. "Mr. Roosevelt's party," she writes, "is no longer the traditional Democratic Party. It is a Popular Front Party." With the first part of her statement there can be no quarrel. But we wish we could agree with the second. Miss Thompson is jumping too far ahead. History moves fast these days, but it must reckon in America with the enormous institutional weight of the party system and even more with the dead hand of our middle-class psychology. It does not move so fast that we can see at once the death pangs of the old party order and the birth pangs of the new. To call Mr. Roosevelt's party a Popular Front Party is to confuse a transitional realignment in politics with a decisive and drastic change.

Of the party confusion of today there can be no doubt. Conservative Democrats are gathering in the Landon camp. Liberal Republicans are to a lesser degree gathering in that of Roosevelt. Trade-union organizations which have in the past stayed clear of political commitments are giving Roosevelt his most effective support. An unknown number of sincere or ambitious folk are grouping themselves under the Lemke banner. Never in recent elections has the Socialist or Communist vote been so conjectural. These are all indications that the dam of the party system has been broken and that the sluices are running freer than ever before. The process began with Mr. Roosevelt's victory in 1932; it is likely to come to an end in 1940. In such a process it is natural that the more liberal of the parties should be the more fluid, and should therefore stand to gain or lose the more heavily. And the chances are that it will gain before it loses. Like Mr. Lloyd George's social-reform government in England, Mr. Roosevelt's social-reform government has made headway by its willingness to recognize the fact of change. But like the English Liberal Party, the Democrats are likely in the end to be squeezed to nothingness between two more extreme and unyielding groups.

What chances are there for a real Popular Front Party in America? The economic crisis does not yet seem to have struck us hard enough to shatter the individualist myth, nor does the danger of a fascist capture of power seem immediate enough. But it will not be long before both of these conditions have been met. What remains is to take the steps that will enable a Popular Front Party, in the face of a common danger and a common opportunity, to assume the responsibilities of government.

It is this sort of action that will constitute during the next five years a program for American progressives. As long as our progressive groups go each their own way, wrapped up in the ecstasy of sectarian righteousness, such a program cannot be entered upon, much less fulfilled.

But given a will for common action, what should the action be? Let us set down in short order as a matter of historical record the fronts on which the progressive battle can be fought, as they appear to us in 1936.

First, the support that such progressive groups as Labor's Non-Partisan League are giving Mr. Roosevelt must be clear-eyed and unfooled. It is no popular-front alliance for common purposes in achieving a social reconstruction. It is a fair exchange of strength for strength. Mr. Roosevelt has helped and will help labor within the limits of his class outlook. Labor will help reelect Mr. Roosevelt because, whatever his inadequacies, it prefers him to Mr. Landon. The nub of the matter is that the next four years will determine whether labor can ever organize enough strength to lead a genuine popular-front movement. To muster such strength the labor leaders must conduct a difficult campaign to extend trade unionism. But that campaign can be carried on only when there is an open state of civil liberties, and when the military are not called out to suppress the workers. Under Mr. Roosevelt trade unionism may have a chance; it can have none at all under a Landon who is the puppet of big ownership.

Second, the great task of the next four years is the building of a trade-union base for political action. There is unlimited work here for progressives of every persuasion—work among skilled and unskilled labor, among technicians and professional people. It is natural that the more fruitful results will come from organizing the workers in mass-production industries along the lines of industrial unionism. But that does not mean that craft unionism must be either abandoned or neglected. It means merely that the growing-point of union organization, and therefore of political action, lies elsewhere.

Third, both the workers and the middle class must be educated in the fact that economic freedom underlies political, and that their common interests lie in the protection of both.

Fourth, there is the back-breaking effort of building local political units of a labor party, starting from the bottom up with the ward and the factory. A good example has already been set by several state and city organizations, including the American Labor Party of New York State.

Fifth, the progressive bloc in Congress must be extended and consolidated. It contains already, among its thirty or forty members, some of the best talent and finest energies in American life. With a leadership and a common program they could be welded into the genuine Opposition that has so long been needed in Congress.

Sixth, no program deserves the confidence of the country unless it is based on a realistic knowledge of the economic life of the country. Industry by industry, segment by segment the economic terrain must be explored, mapped, planned. Without such knowledge labor's strength might still be great, but it would be blind.

All this requires immense effort and patience. There may be no time to finish it, for before an adequate labor party has been securely built up the threat of fascism may become much more of a reality than it is. When that happens we shall be fortunate if the materials exist out of which a popular front can be created.

"Old Bolsheviks" on Trial

IT WAS to be expected that under the velvet glove of the new Soviet constitution there would still be the firm outlines of the iron hand. There can be no doubt that dictatorship in Russia is dying and that a new democracy is slowly being born. But dictatorships do not die an easy death. Ample proof of that may be found in the indictments handed down this week in the much-mooted "Trotsky plots" and the trial scheduled for August 19 of sixteen persons for terrorism and conspiracy against the state.

Louis Fischer, in his article published in this issue, says that the constitution marks the abdication of the dictatorship and the inauguration of a new era in Soviet civil liberties. The contradiction between this and the impression one gets of the implacable pursuit of the Trotskyites by the Stalin government seems great. And yet on second thought it is apparent that the two items are an inherent part of the same developing pattern. The constitution represents, so far as economic security is concerned, an accomplished social fact in Russia, but as concerns civil liberties it represents rather the goal toward which Soviet life is moving. The new indictments underline the difficulties still to be encountered in reaching that goal. The two can coexist because the newly emerging social order has not yet completely broken the shell of the old.

It is impossible at this time and from this distance to form any judgment of how much basis there is in the grave accusations against Zinoviev, Kamenev, and the others who have been indicted. It is unthinkable that the Soviet government should proceed with an open trial unless it has proof of guilt and equally unthinkable that Léon Trotsky should have conspired with agents of fascist Germany to overthrow the Soviet regime. One may guess that plots against Russia on the part of governments bitterly hostile to it and fearful of the Soviet power have not been lacking. One may guess also that there have been members of the group loosely known in Russia as "Trotskyites" who may have resorted to terrorism and conspiracy. One may guess furthermore that Stalin himself and his associates in the Russian governing group are not averse to making the most of what evidence there is against a group that has made a strong bid for wresting power from them. Beyond that one transcends the limits of even reasonable conjecture. We must wait for the evidence that the trial turns up.

Meanwhile, one thing seems fairly clear. The psychology of a dictatorship possesses an inertia that the actual economic and social set-up in a revolutionary regime does not possess. Charges of Trotskyite plots in Soviet Russia are no new thing. They keep recurring with a distressing regularity, bobbing up with the familiar grin of an old and exasperating acquaintance. We do not mean to deride the charges. But it is clear that the Soviet atmosphere is still filled with counter-revolutionary fears as well as with democratic hopes. It is natural that a generation of revolutionists that has been intimate with death and lived on intrigue should go on for some time having the conspiratorial blues. The Russian people still live in a sort of wilderness psychology, surrounded by the howling wolves of their foreign enemies on the east and the west. But what is more important is that their sense of hostile encirclement extends to their own country. Since they have not yet put a political democracy into effect, they do not know who their opponents are or how numerous. The result is that they fear the worst, and act on their fears.

There is irony in the fact that "old Bolsheviks" like Trotsky, Zinoviev, and Kamenev, who have given up so much to the revolution, should finally become its victims. But it is an irony of which history offers numerous examples. "Old Bolsheviks" have in every revolution had to give way when revolutionary gains had to be consolidated. Mr. Fischer feels that the new constitution inaugurates a reign of law in Soviet Russia. The best test of this claim will lie in the fairness with which the present trial is conducted.

Father Coughlin Walks Again

THE second coming of the crackpots in Cleveland caused nothing like the sensation of the first. To be sure it was announced in advance as a strictly Coughlin performance, and the good priest has noticeably calmed down since the strip act of mid-July. But there's the rub—and the reassurance. The grand conclave of Messrs. Townsend, Smith, Coughlin, and Lemke at Cleveland violated every tradition of demagoguery. Obviously there is nothing so damaging to a panacea as another panacea on the same platform. For a demagogue to admit even in a whisper that another demagogue has any of the truth is to demoralize the whole Utopian market. When Father Coughlin declares that Dr. Townsend has no right even to dream of seeing his plan for $200 a month realized until the Coughlin plan for nationalizing the Federal Reserve system has been accomplished, the average radio listener is more than likely to turn the dial. It is no accident that since the July love feast there has been nothing but bickering, indecision, and defection for all the brave talk of the man who writes publicity news stories for the Union Party. As a corollary the possible effect of the radio vote seems much less menacing. The Four Hoarsemen may separately rally their adherents once more, but we cannot help feeling that most of their ten o'clock evening scholars are sleeping it off and will vote more or less as usual in November.

If we were a Republican editorial writer (always allowing for Mark Sullivan's flair for Gerald Smith), we should proceed to the satisfying conclusion that the American people have too much common sense to be misled for long by such unsound doctrines as those inflicted on the innocent air by Messrs. Townsend, Coughlin, and Smith. We cannot accept that conclusion if only for the reason that the American people have been misled for generations by the Republican doctrine that our present economic system represents the functioning of a natural law. It is in the soil of this vast deceit, in fact, that the Townsends and the Coughlins and the Smiths flourish and will continue to flourish.

Their eclipse so far as this campaign is concerned, if it turns out to be that, must be laid to other reasons. The continuance of the recovery is an important factor, especially when it is considered in relation to the general health of the nation. The United States is so huge and diverse and husky that its body politic can absorb a great deal of poison and still go to work the next morning, just as its economic body can probably absorb even further depression without seriously cracking under the strain. We are referring to the country as a unit, of course, and we are not forgetting the thousands upon thousands of Americans who reached the end of their strength in a depression which is no longer as severe as it was but still hovers as an ever-present threat—there are, after all 11,000,000 still unemployed.

Another important factor in the deflation of the Lemke boom lies undoubtedly in the inferiority of our present crop of demagogues. As we have said, no demagogue of the first caliber, say Huey Long, would have joined forces with any other. Father Coughlin has lost caste since that first meeting by too many apologies, and the report that the Vatican had exercised a censorship over him must have cooled the ardor of many a Coughlin admirer whose hatred of the "money power" is only exceeded by his fear of popery. Father Townsend's backing and filling, together with the fact that the United States government is after him, could not have set well with the old folks. As for Gerald L. K. Smith, he is the most dangerous of the lot. But he simply has not the proportions of the man whose coat of many colors he tries to wear, and what is much more important, he lacks the fundamental faith of the really powerful demagogue. Huey's strength lay in his genuine belief that he was saving Louisiana and would save the nation. Smith hardly pretends to that faith; he cannot move votes without it. At least for the present, Roosevelt, who is himself no mean practitioner of the political art, holds the field.

Berserk

STEEL, the darling of capitalism, was "unbalanced" in the twenties. So we are told by the Council for Industrial Progress, which recently completed a case history of the most prominent member of our industrial family. An analysis of iron and steel production, wages, and employment from 1914 to 1933 showed that from 1919 to 1929 the yearly productivity of each wage-earner rose from $2,873 to $3,718, while in the same period the average yearly wage of the steel worker increased only from $1,450 to $1,568. To put it another way: the value added to raw materials by manufacturing was $821,000,- 000 in 1914; it tripled to $2,465,000,000 in 1919 because of the World War, and rose to $3,275,000,000 in 1929. It fell to a paltry $1,062,000,000 in 1933. The average yearly wage stood at $683 in 1914 and at $903 in 1933; and the average number of wage-earners in this industry group was lower in 1933 than in 1914, the respective figures being 617,776 and 554,108.

The number had risen, to be sure, to 880,882 in 1929. But will 1929 ever come again? The council doubts it, because its investigation shows that "the major portion of the increased production was achieved by maintaining employment at the previous level or by establishing a new level requiring fewer workers." And another estimate based upon production figures of the American Iron and Steel Institute related to figures on employment and working hours issued by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that even if steel output should be as high as in 1929 there would be at least one-third fewer man-hours of work available.

The council issues a warning. If the steel and iron industry, it says in effect, goes crazy again to the same degree that it went crazy between 1914 and 1929, during which period the productive capacity of the workers increased more than three times as fast as their consuming power, it will create a serious problem; old man steel, the council intimates, must lay off labor-saving devices and increases in operating efficiency—in a word, give more workers more money to buy groceries with. Otherwise "is it not possible," asks the council, "that even though we come out of a depression through 'natural economic forces,' production can swing ahead at full speed so fast and can so far outstrip purchasing power that we will not even reach a period of 'normalcy' before being plunged again into the depths?"

But alas! The issue of the New York Times which contained an abstract of this alarming fever chart printed in the same section the news that all industry, as profits rise, is spending more and more on industrial research—which means largely on labor-saving devices. This year, for instance, the steel industry is spending $9,200,000 on the various drugs expressly forbidden it by the Council for Industrial Progress. Meanwhile it has already perfected and is installing everywhere continuous rolling mills which will throw thousands out of work.

The campaign to organize the steel workers is the only development in the direction of increasing the purchasing power of steel labor. It is being greeted with cyclone fences, tear-gas, and barbed wire by the "unbalanced" steel owner who sees it merely as an attempt to raise his labor bill and cut his profits. But even if it succeeds it cannot make more than a relative improvement. There is only one genuine solution. The steel industry, if it is not to drag our whole industrial structure to ruin, must be placed in a public institution owned and operated by the people of the United States. Only then can it be scientifically controlled and fulfil the function for which it is now so marvelously equipped, namely, to supply America with steel while creating a high standard of living for that cooperative labor which has brought it to its present high efficiency.

Father Coughlin's Fish Fry

BY GEROLD FRANK

Cleveland, August 16

"JESUS!" breathed the newsreel man, gathering in his lines in the shadow of the stadium. "What an ending!" He was talking of Father Charles E. Coughlin, who brought the first annual convention of the National Union for Social Justice to a close by calling President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Rexford G. Tugwell "Communists," directing his audience to "go to your homes as to a trench," and suddenly collapsing under a hot sun and being spirited away, while 30,000 people, stunned, stood in a silent prayer.

Indeed, Father Coughlin's heavenly fish fry is over, and if it proved anything to those who underwent it, it was that the man who hopes some day to be "a simple parish priest again" is very much with the world. As a disembodied voice, he was listened to; as a living man who walks the earth, who breathes, gestures, smiles, and bends the graciousness of his shining countenance upon them who believe, he is worshiped. They love him.

It was all Coughlin Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, save for a few hours of the first day when that "Great Betrayer" and "L—" came to town quite innocently to look over the WPA projects in Cleveland. But that was not important. Father Coughlin waited until the President left at four o'clock and then delivered a surprise address in Public Hall on money and the persecution of the Jews which made the headlines of the evening newspapers.

The show lagged a bit at the beginning, but by Saturday night Father Coughlin had to be escorted through the corridors of the Hotel Hollenden in the center of a flying wedge of burly Irishmen lest the faithful dismantle him in their frenzy, and the National Union for Social Justice convention had become an orgy of affection. Maryland moved a vote of thanks to Father Coughlin's mother for bearing him. Indiana advanced to the rostrum and pointed out that his father was born in Indiana. Kentucky called him a second Lincoln. All states agreed that he was the Greatest American of All Time, and some compared him even to Christ. Thomas C. O'Brien, the Union Party candidate for Vice-President, apparently a little cagey about superlatives, merely called him "the greatest living teacher of economics," while F. L. Van Ness, a Kalamazoo, Michigan, artist, estimated that from 2:30 p.m. Friday until 1 p.m. Saturday he sold 11,500 reproductions of Father Coughlin's portrait, done in misty, saint-like pastels, at two bits each. And finally the entire assembly in convention met passed a resolution—one of a number of resolutions marked by the repeated and significant use of the term "Our Leader"—indorsing everything he ever publicly said or did as well as everything he was ever publicly to say or do.

Miss Helen Elizabeth Martin of the Bronx, New York, well-nigh swooned Saturday with the honor that was hers of nominating Father Coughlin for the presidency of the N. U. S. J. Fortyish, a red ribbon holding her frizzled auburn bangs to her forehead, Miss Helen blew two-fingered kisses at the audience and standing pale and sanctified at the rostrum, declaimed dramatically, "I dedicate this moment to the two women who prepared me for it. They are in the Great Beyond. . . . I stand alone." It developed that she was talking about her mother and grandmother.

Miss Helen performed one more noble deed before that momentous day ended. She clapped her hands and spontaneously fluttered across the platform at 8:02 p.m. to give her lacy white handkerchief to the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith, who at the moment was living up to all advance notices by dripping perspiration and indicting bankers in Brazil for the murder of little pigs in Iowa. Dr. Francis E. Townsend, third steward of discontent, also spoke, and although he promised to lend the support of his people, he was dry and didn't shout, whereupon a number of delegates began to walk out to late supper. Then the Reverend Mr. Smith began, and for a time it looked as if he might steal the show.

It may be interesting to note that it was a new Coughlin whom the reporters met Friday and Saturday. They were bowled over by his affability. He apologized for the harsh statements he had made. He was sorry. President Roosevelt? Of course he should be respected for his office. His visit in town? Just a coincidence, and if he, Father Coughlin, had known at what time the President was to pass Public Hall he, Father Coughlin, would have suggested that the convention adjourn so that the delegates could gaze upon their President. But Sunday afternoon, speaking in the stadium, Father Coughlin was all that he had ever been on the radio. It may be possible he was thinking of Gerald Smith's performance the night before and its effect. At any rate, it is known that he did not prepare his Sunday speech until Sunday morning.

It was on Friday and Saturday that Father Coughlin protested to reporters that until he should be elected president—that is, if he should be elected president—he was no more important than any other delegate. "See this?" he asked, showing his delegate's badge to the dubious reporters. "I'm just one of the boys." This was not scrupulously believed, because there were rumors that Father Coughlin knew something of the constitution and may even have had a hand in the later indorsement of William Lemke of North Dakota. Few delegates, however, had the temerity to differ with Delegate Coughlin; one tried it and had a very bad time of it. I know, because I still bear bruises where I was shoved when John H. O'Donnell, the hard-bitten Pittsburgh alternate, was escorted off the platform. Mr. O'Donnell may well tell his grandchildren that back in August, 1936, he rose to his feet, one against 8,153, and bawled "No!" when Lemke's indorsement came up. Five minutes later he was marching down a back corridor, still hard-bitten and silent, with police massed about him and frantic loyalists shouting "Judas!" after him. A middle-aged woman clawed her way through to scream, "How much did Farley pay you?" "Where'd he go?" demanded a delegate who looked like an original Berzelius Windrip man. "I don't want to see that monkey get out of here in one piece." The police kept Mr. O'Donnell in a locked room, then took him for a motor ride and suggested he spend the rest of the day at the Great Lakes Convention, which is also a big show, but less dangerous.

One of Father Coughlin's statements, made a few moments later when the audience began a demonstration for Lemke and O'Brien, may yet return to plague him. "If I don't swing 9,000,000 votes to Lemke," said Father Coughlin, bright-eyed at the sight of the yelling, marching crowd, "I'll quit broadcasting for good."

Lemke himself was even more generous with statistics, but Lemke wasn't wagering his future on them. Sitting upstairs in the Hollenden Sunday morning, a bald-pated, grinning figure in striped galluses and a baggy gray suit, Liberty Bill invited newspaper correspondents to visit him in the White House after March 4, next. "The doors will be open to you just the same," said Mr. Lemke, "even though the newspapers don't let you print the truth." Several correspondents, touchy from the humidity, unwound their handkerchiefs from their necks and began telling the next President of the United States where to get off. Things soon quieted down, however, and Mr. Lemke, folding his freckled fists together and staring at the ceiling, went on to make predictions.

"I shall poll fifteen million. An underground swell is now becoming a tidal wave. It will sweep me into the White House and Roosevelt and Landon into discard." While he was talking, said Mr. Lemke, he might as well straighten the boys out about his feelings where Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Landon were concerned. "To me," he explained, "Roosevelt is a bewildered Kerensky not knowing where he's going, and Landon represents the dying shadow of a past civilization."

By whom was he being nominated, please?

"I'm being nominated by the sovereign people of the nation who work for a living," said Mr. Lemke, waving his hand. He was then asked why, if he and his party were deeply concerned with labor, the Union Party platform did not specifically mention collective bargaining.

"It doesn't have to," retorted Mr. Lemke. "That's understood in our emphasis upon a living wage for labor." He continued to speak of the people of the United States, the people who understand the spirit "in which our forefathers wrote the Constitution."

Had he examined that remarkable document the constitution of the National Union for Social Justice? Did he know that the president appointed the nominating committee which presented the names for the board of trustees from whom, in turn, the next president had to be chosen? That was a closed corporation, wasn't it, and was that written in the spirit of the forefathers?

"Well," said Mr. Lemke, "a lot of things are closed corporations. That's just what Congress has been lately." This question couldn't be pursued any farther because Mr. Lemke had meetings to attend and North Dakota hands to shake.

In all the shouting of the convention one man was quickly forgotten, yet to some extent he was an interesting figure among those present. This was Senator Rush Dew Holt of West Virginia, keynoter. Senator Holt denied that he was in the position of an innocent passerby who had unexpectedly been buttonholed and pulled in to speak, but circumstances were suspicious. He was the third choice, and the recommendation of Walter Davis, Father Coughlin's convention marshal.

The Senator was lounging about his home in Weston, West Virginia, a week ago Saturday, he said, when he was called to the telephone and informed that Father Coughlin would like to have him make the keynote speech in Cleveland on the fourteenth. "It was Davis talking," said Holt, stretched out on a sofa in his suite, one leg dangling, the other on the sofa arm wiggling from side to side, "and he said I could talk as I wished and wouldn't be expected to indorse or condemn any candidate. The next day they called me back and I told them O. K." Honestly and frankly, Holt explained, he couldn't figure out why Father Coughlin chose him. "Probably," he said, "they picked me on my record."

That record, as far as labor was concerned, was darned good, too, John Lewis or no John Lewis. "I'm sorry I accepted his support in the Senate race," said Holt, sitting up. "He's a menace. I'm still with the United Mine Workers of America—with the men who work. But Lewis is one of the most dangerous influences in America today. Do you know, he set up a dictatorial rule in the United Mine Workers, and those men can't even vote on their own affairs!" He went on to explain as he sat there, his hair mussed, the ends of his opened tie hanging down his shirt, that his aim in the Senate was to expose hypocrisy. He'd also like to work so that the laboring man could have a better wage. But he did not like the political opportunism he found in the Senate. "I'd rather go down to defeat for a principle than win through political expediency," he said.

Even if that opportunism permitted him to gain time to accomplish much more important reforms? "Absolutely," said Holt. And if he lost out, wouldn't the actual result be worse than before, so far as the reforms were concerned? "No," said Holt, "I don't believe any man can lose who fights for the right thing."

Getting back to the National Union for Social Justice—was he a member? "Oh, no," said Holt, "but I think its principles are essentially good. I was glad of an opportunity to explain my views on economics and politics as outlined by the principles of the union."

Well, did he think, perhaps, that the National Union for Social Justice might ever turn into a fascist tool?

"Gosh," said the Senator from West Virginia, "I hope not."

Addendum: Sunday afternoon Mr. Lemke also spoke.

Soviet Democracy: Second View

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, August 1

THE new Soviet constitution is a remarkable and important document. Some people suspect it. "Yes," they say, "the new democracy looks very fine on paper. But how will it be carried out?" If the new constitution had suddenly sprung from the mind of a wise lawgiver or from the hands of a clever legal commission, I too would be skeptical. Actually, however, it is the fruit of an organic growth. Moreover, it is not merely a promise. Many of its provisions register changes which have already taken place.

For instance, it guarantees paid employment, leisure, and free education to all the inhabitants of the country. This describes an existing condition. There is no unemployment in the U.S.S.R.; indeed, there is a scarcity of labor. The fact that the Bolsheviks wrote universal employment into the basic law suggests that, in their opinion, the present situation in the labor market is not a passing phase but an unalterable characteristic of socialist economy. Similarly the guaranty of leisure reflects existing arrangements. A fortnight's vacation with pay for all toilers is the legal minimum, and it is often exceeded. The seven-hour day is becoming the rule in Russia; the authorities hope some day to achieve further reductions. Compulsory education has been adopted by other nations. The Soviet Union is no exception in this matter. But in no other country do so many adults go to school. I know factories in which 60 to 90 per cent of the force attend free courses. Any Soviet man, woman, or child who wants an education can already get it for the asking. In respect to employment, leisure, and education, therefore, the constitution merely clothes fact with the mantle of inalienable right.

"Women in the U.S.S.R.," reads the new constitution, "are accorded equal rights with men in all fields of economic, state, cultural, social, and political life." They have always enjoyed this equality. "Citizens of the U.S.S.R.," declares another article, "have the right to material security in old age, as well as in the event of sickness or loss of capacity to work." Old-age pensions and social insurance are ancient Soviet institutions. Likewise, "the equality of the rights of citizens of the U.S.S.R., irrespective of their nationality or race," is one of the original pillars of the Soviet regime.

This is the third Soviet constitution. The first was adopted on July 10, 1918, the second on January 31, 1924. Lenin wrote in 1909 that a constitution "expresses the real alignment of forces in the class struggle." This alignment has changed so much since the revolution that the first two constitutions quickly outlived themselves. The second constitution granted no rights to citizens. It did not even mention those rights which they already had. Its chief concern was the definition of the powers of the state. The reasons are clear. The destructive civil war was of recent memory. The dictatorship was fierce and arbitrary, for the domestic enemy had not been extirpated. The government was socialist in name, but socialist economy counted more problems than achievements, and capitalism displayed resistance and strength. Half the trade, one-fifth of the industry, and all of agriculture were in private hands. How could the state guarantee labor to all? It was not master in its own house. It had to continue the class war, and the basic law could not be individual right; it was official might.

Using the prerogatives which the revolution gave and the constitution of 1924 confirmed, the dictatorship proceeded to crush capitalism and build socialism. After twelve years of costly struggle and unprecedented sacrifices, Russian capitalism is dead and Soviet socialism has acquired colossal power. Socialist industry produced 16,100,000 tons of coal in 1924, 108,900,000 tons in 1935; 5,900,000 tons of oil in 1924, 26,772,000 tons in 1935; 800,000 tons of pig iron in 1924, 12,493,000 tons in 1935; 179 locomotives in 1924, 1,866 in 1935; 300,000 tons of cement in 1924, 4,470,000 tons in 1935; 4,056,900 pairs of leather shoes in 1924, 84,816,000 pairs in 1935; no automobiles twelve years ago, 96,700 last year; and so on through the entire amazing record of Soviet economic progress. These figures, the Bolsheviks declare, are the "music of socialism." There is no capitalist industry in the U.S.S.R. and private commerce and farming have shrunk to negligible dimensions. A new alignment of social forces has resulted.

This "victory of socialism," says the fortnightly Bolshevik, organ of the Communist Party, "permits us to undertake the normalization and ordering of all our legislative work and to strengthen our judicial system. . . . Soviet law must be precise, intelligible to the masses, and stable. The most important element in the stability of Soviet legislation is the new constitution." The constitution is thus rooted in successful agrarian collectivization, in advancing industrialization, in mounting individual productiveness. On this new basis, in Bolshevik opinion, new human rights are possible. "It is difficult for me to imagine," Stalin said recently to Roy Howard, the American newspaper publisher, "what sort of 'personal liberty' an unemployed person can have when he is hungry and cannot find any application for his labor. Real freedom," he continued, "exists only where exploitation has been abolished, where there is no enslaving of some persons by others, where there is no unemployment and poverty. . . ." Lenin put it this way: "As long as class distinctions and private ownership of means of production remain, the slogan of liberty and freedom is a lie and a hypocrisy of bourgeois society. There can be no equality," he argued, "between the person who owns property and the person who does not, between the one who is well-fed and the one who goes hungry."

Until 1929 there were exploiting classes in Russia. "Now that they are liquidated," says the Bolshevik, "now that, according to Stalin, 'our society consists solely of the free toilers of city and village—the workers, peasants, and intellectuals,' the former limitations on Soviet democracy are no longer necessary."

It is logical, consequently, that the bill of rights as set forth in Chapter X of the new Soviet constitution begins with the rights made possible by the growth and enrichment of socialist economy—paid labor, leisure, and free schooling—and then proceeds with the civil rights which were denied while the dictatorship encountered the opposition of hostile capitalist classes. These, first, are "freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly and meetings, freedom of street processions and demonstrations." The present "alignment of forces in the class struggle" would easily warrant the Bolsheviks in immediately investing this new right with concrete content. That is why it is in the constitution. But the past has adduced no evidence that anti-Communists or even Communists and pro-Communists who are excessively critical of the central authorities will soon obtain any liberty of expression on political problems. In the field of literature there has been slightly more tolerance. Even a dynamic revolutionary regime, however, is subject to inertia, and Russia has no democratic tradition. It will probably be some time before the Soviet government dispenses with the steam-roller in politics. It is no longer necessary but it remains a convenience. In regard to freedom of speech, therefore, I shall wait and see.

But the constitution grants other civil liberties even more important. Article 127 affirms that "citizens of the U.S.S.R. are insured the inviolability of person. No one may be subjected to arrest except upon the decision of a court or with the sanction of the prosecuting attorney's office." And "the inviolability of the homes of citizens and the secrecy of correspondence are protected by law."

The constitution of 1924 did not guarantee these elementary rights because conditions would have made it impracticable. The dictatorship then, operating usually through the G.P.U., exercised unlimited powers. Neither human beings nor apartments nor letters were safe from its arbitrary acts. The test of Articles 127 and 128 is the curbing of the G.P.U. Has it been curbed?

The slow eclipse of the G.P.U. commenced in 1931 when its excessive zeal turned legitimate suspicion of some engineers and technicians into an unfair crusade against vast numbers of intellectuals. In his Six-Point speech of June 23, 1931, Stalin called a halt to this unfair discrimination, and about the same time Akulov displaced Yagoda as actual chief of the G.P.U.* Akulov was more tolerant and "liberal-minded." A certain amount of relaxation resulted, but the struggle over collectivization was still fierce. The iron hand could not yet be dispensed with. The G.P.U. machine refused to cooperate with Akulov, and he was shelved. But in the spring of 1933 Stalin appointed Akulov to the newly created office of chief prosecuting attorney with authority to "supervise the legality and regularity of the G.P.U.'s acts." Akulov commenced to release large numbers of prisoners and to check arbitrary procedures. In January, 1934, the government decided to reorganize the G.P.U., restrict its authority, and rename it the Commissariat for Internal Affairs. This was a severe blow to the prestige and power of the G.P.U. But worse was in store. On December 1, 1934, Sergei Kirov, the beloved Leningrad Bolshevik leader, was assassinated. Part of the blame fell on the reconstructed Internal Commissariat. It was charged with insufficient vigilance. Some of its high officials were immediately arrested. (They are now working as prisoners on the Moscow-Volga canal.) Shortly thereafter the Internal Commissariat was shorn of the right to arrest certain categories of people—engineers and military men, for instance—without the permission of the prosecuting attorney's office. This was an unheard-of limitation, but it indicated that ruthlessness and terror had ceased to be the state's most trusted weapons.

The new constitution continues this development. The prosecuting attorney becomes the most powerful official in the Soviet government. He is selected by the supreme council or parliament for a period of seven years, whereas all other members of the government hold office for only four years. In him is "vested the highest supervision of the exact observance of the law by all People's Commissariats and the institutions under them, as well as by individual officials and citizens of the U.S.S.R." In other words, he is superior to the Internal Commissariat. Moreover (Article 117), "the representatives of the prosecuting attorney's office perform their functions independently of any local organs whatsoever, being responsible alone to the Chief Prosecutor of the U.S.S.R." The prosecutor's paramount task will be the protection of individual rights and personal inviolability. He is clothed with the power to do this. The Internal Commissariat must come to him or go to the courts for a warrant to arrest anyone or to search a residence. He can veto any of its moves. If these regulations had appeared in 1930 or 1931, few would have accepted them as realistic. But the rise of the authority of the prosecutor and the weakening of the G.P.U. has already created exactly the relationship between these two offices which is formulated, made permanent, and carried a long step further by the new constitution. The reign of law is now definitely established in the U.S.S.R. There is little doubt, accordingly, that if the present normal times continue—in other words, if there is no foreign war—Soviet citizens will hereafter really enjoy inviolability of person, home, and mail. They have the courts, too, for redress of grievances. The constitution lends the Soviet judiciary a new importance and independence. In a recent article in the Bolshevik entitled The Soviet Court and Soviet Democracy, A. Vishinsky, the chief prosecutor of the U.S.S.R., stated that the first principles of Soviet court procedure must be public hearings, freedom of discussion, a guaranty of the rights of the accused, equality of all parties in the dispute (even if the state is one of them), and unhampered activity by the defendant's lawyers. This doctrine is new in the Soviet Union. It is part of the democracy which the constitution introduces.

The constitution will be adopted by the Congress of Soviets scheduled to assemble in Moscow on November 25, 1936. That date will herald a new era in civil liberties for Soviet citizens. Inhabitants of the U.S.S.R. always had numerous liberties of great value: the absence of economic exploitation; equality and special privileges for women; the elimination of disabilities of national minorities; favoritism toward the former "lower" classes which helped them reach the highest levels in politics, economic administration, science, and so on; state care of the health of the well and the sick; consultation of the private individual at his place of work, which had the effect of giving him a measure of control over his employer, the state; the numerous avenues, including special investigating commissions and the press, through which a citizen could complain against official discrimination and obtain justice. Nevertheless, this liberty was incomplete without civil rights. Now these civil rights are granted to all, including priests, former Czarist officers, kulaks, and other ex-enemies of Bolshevism. The Soviet state fears nothing from the inside and less and less from the outside. Therefore the dictatorship yields to democracy.

The essential feature of the new democracy is a two-chamber parliament, or supreme council, which is the source of all governmental authority. The lower house is to be elected for a period of four years by popular vote—one delegate to each 300,000 inhabitants, not, significantly, voters. The upper council of nationalities, elected proportionally by the governments of the federated republics—national autonomous territories—was instituted, although the two-chamber system seems to hark back to an ancient tradition, in order to protect the interests of the Soviet Union's numerous racial groups. Parliament passes all laws (hitherto decrees having the validity of law originated with many departments) and directs all the functions of government. It may, whenever it wishes, arrange nation-wide referendums on vital questions. It exercises the right of pardon. A member of parliament enjoys immunity, of which only parliament or, when it is not sitting, its presidium of thirty-seven members, can deprive him. Both houses must approve a bill before it becomes law. If they disagree and if no conciliation is possible, parliament is dissolved and new elections take place. Both chambers together elect the cabinet and remove cabinet members. Parliament, it follows, can overthrow the government. Parliament will engage in open discussion and criticism of government acts. This may be the beginning of free speech.

The world has seen a number of parliamentary regimes converted into dictatorships. The Bolshevik dictatorship is the first to resign in favor of democracy. The Bolsheviks prepared the road for this change by destroying the classes which threatened their rule. Other dictatorships cannot do this; the classes which naturally would or actually do or some day might threaten them are too large. You cannot wipe out the working class, for instance. This Soviet phenomenon of democracy succeeding dictatorship is therefore unique in history and may remain the only instance in history of the voluntary abdication of a dictatorship.

Zioncheck: An American Tragedy

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Seattle, August 12

HUNDREDS of newsboys, longshoremen, peace advocates, college students, railroad workers, farmers, and lumberjacks attended the funeral of the Representative from the First Washington District who was buried yesterday. The death of Marion Zioncheck deprived these people of a sincere friend and courageous champion, who had come from their ranks and had kept faith with them in the measures he supported on Capitol Hill. His casket was covered with a quilt of flowers and wreaths sent by the state's labor unions and liberal organizations.

What sort of person was Marion Zioncheck? What were his political views? From the first of the year until his spectacular death here last week Zioncheck received more attention than any other public figure except the President. Relatively few of the millions amused by his exploits knew his opinions or his background. To them he was merely a haywire alcoholic who waded in fountains.

But this was only the last phase of his career. Until his mental collapse in January he was a brilliant young liberal who might one day have been the dominant political figure in the Pacific Northwest. Zioncheck came to the United States from Poland in 1903. His family moved westward to the state of Washington three years later, and at six Marion began working his way through school. In the course of his education he sold newspapers, herded cattle, and peddled fish along the wharves of Puget Sound. He entered the state university when he was nineteen, but was forced to withdraw in order to help support his parents and sister. He worked for a time as a clerk in a jewelry store and then had odd jobs in various lumber camps.

After four years he returned to the university. Coming from a background of oppression and hardships, he was first aroused by the snobbery of the fraternity system. He banded the independent, unaffiliated students into a compact political organization, and insisted on democracy in campus life and activities. In 1928 he was elected president of the student body. He immediately objected to a series of extravagant expenditures for athletic equipment, maintaining that they would delay the construction of a much-needed study and recreational center. A troop of behemoth football players, angered by such outrageous interference with the "gravy-train," dressed up one night in hooded robes, and after shaving off Zioncheck's hair threw him into Lake Washington. The local Hearst paper was privy to this amateur fascism and a photographer was on hand to make a flashlight picture of the episode.

But Zioncheck was no mere college rebel. As soon as he became a member of the bar in 1929, he began defending deportees and others in danger of losing their civil rights. With Jack R. Cluck he argued a succession of cases for the Civil Liberties Union. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Senator George Norris, and in 1931 he interested himself in the public-ownership fight in Seattle. He led the successful recall campaign against Mayor Frank Edwards, who was opposed to the municipal power activities of J. D. Ross, superintendent of city power and light. Ross, recently appointed to the Securities Exchange Commission, was a pallbearer at Zioncheck's funeral.

In 1932 Zioncheck was a spearhead in two victorious forays at the polls. He aided in the election to the Senate of Homer T. Bone, relentless crusader for public ownership, and he himself was sent to the House. In Congress he joined with the progressive bloc. He supported production-for-use, and continually raised his voice against excessive military expenditures. He made an exhaustive analysis of the use of various National Guard units in labor disputes, and declared that the people were paying taxes to enable the Guard "to see to it that scabs get in there and break strikes." He supported the New Deal power and labor measures, but he consistently opposed the Administration's gearing up of the war machine.

With the backing of the Washington Commonwealth Federation—probably the most powerful production-for-use organization in the West—Zioncheck was reelected to Congress in 1934. He at once launched a one-man campaign of Fabian warfare on Representative Thomas L. Blanton of Texas, sponsor of the infamous red-rider to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Zioncheck so thoroughly detested Blanton that he frequently overstepped the limits of good taste in his attacks on the number one red-baiter of the House. With the possible exceptions of Representatives Sisson and Maverick, the harassed teachers in the national capital had no more persistent friend than Marion Zioncheck. Here is a sample of his verbal attacks on the incomparable Blanton:

The gentleman from Texas is a great defender of the Constitution and the Supreme Court. . . . In view of this it gives one cause to wonder why it is that the Gentleman from Texas never calls the House's attention to the fact that a Negro is lynched in his district now and then . . . despite the fact that he knows that the Constitution does not make any provision for lynching Negroes in his district. . . . The Gentleman from Texas claims that he is a true Jeffersonian Democrat, and still he continues to advocate and hold on to red-riders, Kramer bills, and what have you, despite the fact that I have called his attention to it several times that Thomas Jefferson stated in writing . . . that this type of coercive legislation is bad, and that if passed and enforced half the people would become hypocrites and the other half fools.

Zioncheck had a plentiful supply of moral courage. He was not afraid of the power of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer and frequently attacked Hearst. He scored the attempts to build up a Nazi, anti-Semitic movement in his district, and he was one of the first Congressmen to expose the Townsend agitation as an alleged money-making racket. A distressingly large number of pseudo-progressives chimed in with the O.A.R.P. chorus, hoping thereby to hold the crackpot vote. Zioncheck refused to collaborate in this intellectual chicanery. He said the Townsend snare was ruining the chances of a sane old-age pension program. He put in the first resolution to investigate the Townsend financial set-up.

Political courage and intellectual honesty—those were Zioncheck's outstanding virtues. He also had faults. He was arrogant and egotistical. He needlessly antagonized people by discourtesy or downright rudeness. Frequently he was vulgar. Against these shortcomings, he had an attractive personality when he chose to be amiable. Small and wiry, he seemed to have boundless energy. He was one of the few men in the House who tried to read through every bill up for consideration. His collapse was at least partly due to overwork.

Had Zioncheck lived, it is difficult to say whether he would have been reelected. There is no doubt that many of his active supporters had been alienated by his behavior. But the workers and unemployed still had faith in his integrity, and they might have pulled him through the election. Before his collapse he was considered a possible gubernatorial candidate, and it was considered certain that he would one day be promoted to the United States Senate. His breakdown and death must be set down as an American tragedy, for Marion Zioncheck typified many of the best traditions of the Republic. An immigrant boy—the son of a family fleeing from oppression abroad—he took advantage of the opportunities offered by the great democracy of the West. He became the champion of oppressed and unfortunate people, and even until his garish end they retained unshakable confidence in him.

To millions of Americans Marion Zioncheck was a rambunctious young politician running wild. To thousands of his constituents in Seattle he was still the lad who quit school and peddled fish to help a struggling immigrant family survive in the pull-and-haul of the profit system. Just before his body was lowered into the grave at Evergreen Cemetery, the Reverend Fred Shorter of the Church of the People said, "Marion was a shell-shocked comrade who died at the barricades fighting to the very last for the poor and dispossessed." Only seconds before he threw himself from his office window Zioncheck scrawled in incoherent fashion on a piece of Congressional stationery, "My only hope in life was to improve the condition of an unfair economic system. . . ."

Arming the Industrialists

BY FRANK C. HANIGHEN

IT cost $25,000, according to the best accounts, to kill a soldier in the World War. How much it costs to kill a striker in an industrial war has never been computed. But considering the estimated $80,000,000 a year spent by American industry to break up union organization, and the persistent rumors that steel plants have been purchasing great quantities of munitions for the coming struggle, it would seem that shedding workers' blood must come rather high. The employers may or may not be nervous about this sort of outlay. But there are some business men concerned in this activity who have no reason to be disturbed and every reason to rejoice.

They are the munitions makers. While these gentlemen talk of serving law and order, they lose no time in filling up their order books. Their salesmen find it just as worth while to call on "personal directors" and company police as to visit the military men of foreign and domestic governments. Firms engaging in this sort of business do not wait for strikes to commence. They go after the business before trouble breaks out and persuade industrialists to arm, regardless of the consequences to the workers. In fact, the picture of their methods and their effect on industrial peace bears a horrible similarity to that furnished by Messrs. Vickers, Schneider, and Krupp.

In this country the true Comité des Forges of industrial munitions is Federal Laboratories, Inc., of Pittsburgh. This firm has assets of $375,000 and a force of between fifty and sixty agents in the field (exclusive of its foreign connections). Federal Laboratories sells tear gas (chloroacetophenone), sickening gas (diphenylchlorarsine), gas grenades, riot guns, and machine-guns. It acts as exclusive agent for the Thompson submachine-gun and has served as broker for other firearms. Its principal competitor is U. S. Ordnance Engineers, Inc. This firm has a capitalization estimated at $150,000 and also sells gas products, bombs, machine-guns, and firearms. So far as the records show, U. S. Ordnance Engineers, at least in the industrial field, is not as active as Federal Laboratories.

Both these firms stress their importance as suppliers of non-poisonous gases to banks, police departments, militia, and so on, for the purpose of preventing crime and disorder. According to their officials, tear gas and sickening gas provide the most humane method of suppressing riots and strike disorders, and in many instances save human life. The president of Federal Laboratories boasts that, in the Toledo Auto-Lite plant strike in 1934, they "came in there with the tear gas and I think saved further damage and some loss of life."

There is some doubt whether riot gases actually measure up to Federal Laboratories' high standard of humanity. According to Senator Clark of Missouri, two babies died after being gassed during the bonus-army troubles. The effect of sickening gas on hungry, undernourished strikers can well be imagined. The records of Federal Laboratories reveal a case (authenticated by the coroner) of the death of a man who had been under fire from these projectiles. The company report intimates that the man had a poor heart and "got too much DM [sickening gas]." According to another version, the victim died after being hit in the stomach by a gas shell. Heber Blankenhorn, of the National Labor Relations Board, takes issue with the altruistic claims of the gas firms. He says:

They say these tear-gas bombs do not hurt. I happened to see one of the men hit by one of these and all that could be seen of his face, when I saw him in the hospital, was one eye glaring at me and something like a mouth—when he tried to call for water, more blood and sputum came out than anything else. Other men were there [in the hospital] who were not pretty pictures.

Such pictures, it is true, do not adorn Federal Laboratories' highly illustrated catalogue. But the cuts on the cover of this volume suggest that protection against bank bandits and racketeers is something less than the knock-out argument in Federal Laboratories' sales arsenal. For instance, there is a photograph of the gas-filled streets of a West Virginia coal-mining town, during a strike. Another shows a mob and is labeled Against California Communists. The following photographs, all of the same sort of subject, fill out the list of illustrations: scenes from the Weirton, West Virginia strike; the Steubenville, Ohio, strike; the Clairton steel strike near Pittsburgh; a coal strike in Fayette County, Pennsylvania; a coal strike in Clarksburg, West Virginia (where several people were killed); milk strikes in Wisconsin and New York; and finally a snapshot of officers standing on the steps of the United States Capitol building during the bonus-army troubles.

When war threatened in the Chaco, Asuncion and La Paz drew munitions salesmen from Europe and the United States. Similarly, when labor troubles are imminent, representatives of the gas munitions firms are on the job. Mr. Young, president of Federal Laboratories, wrote to one of his agents as follows:

... a notice in Sunday's Herald Tribune that they were expecting labor trouble at the Panama Canal. This paper lists the Callahan Co. and Shirley, Peterson, and Gunther as contractors. This is for the new Madden Dam Alejuela. I think if these people are properly solicited they can be convinced of the importance of carrying tear gas on hand in Panama. I suggest you follow this through.

Tear Gas

Since these firms have agents in most of the large cities of the country, including industrial areas, they can and do render service, even before the event.

Some straight-from-the-shoulder sales talk accompanies these exertions. Here is a quotation from one of the circulars sent out by Federal Laboratories:

Be sure to advise your customer that when they use gas to use plenty of it. We have found from experience that if the police try to disperse a mob with too little gas, their efforts will not be successful. To toss a couple of grenades and gas shells into a fighting mob could not be expected to control it. You have got to give them gas and plenty of it.

Nor are signs of the times overlooked in these appeals. In a letter to an agent Mr. Young makes the following cogent remarks:

I am quite sure this present crisis, while it has brought a shortage of funds, has brought an acute demand for our products, which puts us in the preferred class, and we should impress upon the public officials that they should spend money for the purchase of tear-gas equipment even when they cannot afford to pay salaries.

Or, as Mr. Young explained in commenting on this letter, "I think it is well known that in prosperous times you do not have trouble with riots that you do in time of adversity."

The officers of these companies paint a vivid picture of police officials protecting property and "faithful workers" from disorderly strikers, pickets, and sympathizers and insist that only by means of gas can the police avoid killing members of the mobs. But Mr. Blankenhorn, describing to the La Follette committee the strike at the Republic Steel Company's plant in Canton, Ohio, in the summer of 1935, offered a different view. He testified that not one window in a Republic machine shop fully a third of a mile long and contiguous with a street had been broken by the strikers. Armed guards came out of the plant, charged down the street with tear gas and billies, and dispersed pickets. He summed up in these words: "There was no pretense that there was any threat to the plant. It is an example of the way these plant munitions are used; they are not for the purpose of protecting property but for the purpose of breaking up picket lines."

These firms by no means confine themselves to tear gas and equipment. Federal Laboratories obtained revolvers from Smith and Wesson for the Weirton Steel Company. On June 26, 1934, Federal Laboratories wrote the Department of Justice, asking what the attitude of the department would be toward the delivery of machine-guns to the following firms: Cudahy Packing Company, Newport, Minnesota; Gulf States Steel Company, Birmingham, Alabama; Republic Steel Company, Youngstown, Ohio; Southern Natural Gas Company, Birmingham, Alabama; Tennessee Coal and Iron Company Railroad, Birmingham.

In the records of the Senate Munitions Committee there are exhibits of about 40 waybills of shipments of arms to industrialists directly, and of about 150 shipments to local authorities. The dates indicate that these shipments took place just before labor disturbances. Among firms listed were the H. C. Frick Coke Company, the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Company, and the Essex Rubber Company, Trenton, New Jersey. Cities purchasing munitions were as follows: Boston, Massachusetts, in November, 1935, $3,000 worth of gas and munitions; Denver, between December, 1934, and April, 1935, over $5,000 worth of Tommies; Detroit, Michigan, between April and November, 1935, over $10,000 worth of Tommies and gas munitions and a $12,600 armored car; Barberton, Ohio, between November 21 and December 14, 1935 (period of strike there), nearly $5,000 worth of munitions; Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, September, 1934, over $2,500 worth of Tommies and gas. ("Tommies" are machine-guns.)

Sales of munitions, gas, and guns to industrial firms and to police bodies require, under present laws, some red tape in the form of permission from federal and local authorities. "Permission" involves at times some rather murky dealings. In some cases industrial firms pay for arms shipped to the local authorities. Thus the sheriff of the county in which a Cudahy plant was located received the guns, and the vice-president of Federal Laboratories wrote, "I think they [Cudahy] are contributing somewhat in paying for them." Sometimes shipments are made to other parties, or the marking of the shipping cases is altered to conceal from employees the nature and origin of the contents. Thus Federal Laboratories ordered forty-eight revolvers from Smith and Wesson for the Weirton Steel Company, with this warning:

Ask that the invoice be made out to Weirton Steel Company, but send it to us rather than direct to Weirton Steel Company, on account of their desire that their employees be not familiar with what they are doing. They require that we use great secrecy in the way bills are handled.

Another order for guns and gas from Federal Laboratories was marked, "Ship to Borough Hall, Duquesne Borough Hall, invoice to Carnegie Steel Company, Carnegie Building." And another for $3,000 worth of riot guns and gas equipment was marked, "Ship to John B. Michela, Wolvin Building, Duluth, invoice to H. C. Frick Coke Company, Frick Annex, Pittsburgh." Also indicated on this last invoice is the following: "Box to be marked merchandise from H. C. Frick Coke Company," instead of Federal Laboratories. The John B. Michela mentioned here appears in records as a former member of the police and espionage system of the Oliver Iron Mining Company, which is a subsidiary of United States Steel.

The ultimate effect of this on the workers is, of course, chloroacetophenone and casualties. The immediate effect is a condition extremely favorable to the sale of more guns and gas. No matter how ingeniously the cartons of munitions may be labeled, the intended victims have a sure nose for camouflage. Today, along the Monongahela, down in West Virginia, in Youngstown, in Gary, wherever steel labor moves toward organization and the inevitable strikes, rumors of large shipments of munitions to the plants add to the growing tenseness of the situation. The workers are already nervous about the spies and provocateurs in their midst, and the knowledge that munitions to be used against them are being stored in the plants fans their apprehensions to a dangerous temperature. Mr. Blankenhorn says, "They [sales of munitions to industrial firms] are a part of the cause of labor unrest among the steel companies, because when the men find these concealed devices, there is a sense among the workers that a kind of secret warfare is being made against them."

The international armament racketeers drum up business by selling to both sides in a strained international situation. The industrial armament racketeers sell to one side only, but gain the same end by different methods. For one thing, legal action in the courts has hamstrung the operations of the Wagner Act, which set up the National Labor Relations Board to enforce the principle of collective bargaining and to settle labor disputes. For another, labor espionage, industrial detective agencies, and strike-breaking firms constitute one of the surest means, first, of stirring up labor, then of suppressing its attempts at organization. And between the largest supplier of industrial munitions and these two instruments of anti-labor action there exists a strong and profitable link.

On the Board of Directors of Federal Laboratories is Roy G. Bostwick, who is a law partner of Earl F. Reed, chairman of a subcommittee of the National Committee of Lawyers of the American Liberty League. A brief composed by this committee has been utilized by industrial interests throughout the country to challenge the action of the National Labor Relations Board. In fact, the blocking of the board's rulings in many labor centers has been credited to the legal assistance provided by this committee. Beside Mr. Bostwick on this board sits W. W. Groves, the president of the Railway Audit and Inspection Company, which operates a number of espionage and strike-breaking concerns throughout the country. The connection between Railway Audit and Federal Laboratories is by no means recent. A. A. Ahner, at present head of his own detective agency, in 1928 was general manager of the Railway Audit in the St. Louis area. At that time he was arrested with a Federal Laboratories tear-gas bomb in his possession. In two cities, Atlanta and New Orleans, the offices of Federal Laboratories and Railway Audit are the same. One of Mr. Groves's exploits took place in 1932 in the General Materials strike in St. Louis. In that strike two men were killed, two others were so badly clubbed by hired strike-breakers that one of them was sent to an insane asylum. A gang of strike-breakers, some with criminal records, were arrested for this and referred police to their "boss," Mr. Groves. Mr. Groves was arrested by the police, and his bond, according to an article in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, was signed by Beverly Brown, "cuckoo gang bondsman."

Federal Laboratories, according to Mr. Blankenhorn, have pushed their connection with espionage and strike-breaking so far that in Atlanta last year they applied to Chief of Police Poole for a detective license of their own. This was refused on the ground that it would mean the introduction of spies and stool pigeons into the plants of that area, which in the opinion of Chief Poole would create the kind of disturbance for which munitions might be sold. The international arms racketeers could do no better.

Such is the net woven between industrial war and munitions. Earl F. Reed, partner of a Federal Laboratories director, works for the blocking of N.L.R.B. cases in the courts. Result: discontent among the workers with legal action for their rights, and their conversion to a policy of direct action and strikes. W. W. Groves, another director, runs an agency for espionage among the workers, a potent method of widening this discontent and hastening the process toward war. Once the ensuing situation becomes acute, Federal Laboratories steps in and, to borrow the vivid phrase of Sir Basil Zaharoff, "does the needful."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE news that Senator Borah has triumphed in the primaries in Idaho is to be welcomed. Even those of us who are beginning to feel only pity for the Senator's failure to live up to his opportunities and be the great political leader he ought to be would feel disappointed if his seat should be lost to him in the election next fall. For he is not only the Senator of longest service, but he does add intellectual distinction to the upper house, even if his course is frequently as tortuous as a snake's. From all that I can learn, his adversary, Governor Ross, would not add to the strength or wisdom of the Senate. But he may win.

Quite as satisfactory is the news from Texas that Congressman Maury Maverick has triumphed in the primaries and will be duly reelected next fall. Great sums of money went into his district to defeat him. Although he is an ex-soldier with a remarkable war record and consequent physical injuries from which he constantly suffers, the attempt was made to defeat him on the ground that he is too pacifist—and, of course, a "red." I have already gone on record as saying that it is hard to recall another case in which a young and unknown man has deservedly won so wide a national reputation as has Mr. Maverick in his first term. We have been so accustomed to having it said that no new Congressman could make a name for himself, and that to exert a genuine influence in Congress one must have reached a high committee position after three or four terms, that I think this object lesson of what one man of character, courage, and firmly held beliefs can accomplish is of the utmost importance. Like Senator Norris and many others, Mr. Maverick has proved that it pays a thousand times over to put a good man in office in Washington and that it is a lie born of cynicism and despair to say that there is no use in sending fine men to Congress because they are always dominated by the party machine.

As usual in a Presidential election, we hear too little about the contest in the various states. I want to appeal, therefore, to all my readers to interest themselves in local candidacies for Senate and House, and to give time and strength, and money if possible, to the election or reelection of men who have really shown themselves to be liberal. In any case all who are opposed to the militarization of this country and to the growing fascist spirit owe it to themselves to demand of candidates for Congress where they stand on these all-important issues, if they have not already made themselves clear. Wherever possible, pressure should be brought to bear upon them to make them aware that there is a militant minority which is opposed to compulsory military drill in our schools and colleges, opposed to our entering the naval armament race and to our running up an annual bill of $1,137,000,- 000 for army and navy. And the candidates should be polled, too, as to how they stand on the tariff and whether or not they are for as much tariff reform as the Administration is giving us in the reciprocal tariff treaties.

In this connection I want especially to call attention to the candidacy of Merle D. Vincent to succeed Senator Costigan of Colorado. Mr. Vincent is opposed by two strong candidates, the present Governor Johnson and a former Governor, William E. Sweet, who has been an ardent and able protagonist of the New Deal. Mr. Sweet, a man of high character, made a good record as Governor and I assume that the influence of the Administration is being thrown to him. But Mr. Vincent's years of hard work in behalf of an enlightened labor policy in Colorado and his outspokenness on the issues which seem to me all-compelling would make me vote and work for him if I lived in his state. I am certain that he would be a worthy successor to Senator Costigan, whose loss, with that of Senator Norris which I fear may come to pass, will be a most grievous blow to the Progressive bloc in the Senate. Mr. Vincent stands on an admirable platform. He is for the vital features of the Administration's farm program and against any extension of the landlord and tenant system. He is for the reciprocal trade agreements.

He is for saying to other nations: We will not enter your suicidal race of preparation for war. . . . We will not send an armed soldier to foreign soil or a warship to foreign waters to participate in foreign wars. He is wholeheartedly for the protection and advancement of labor. He is opposed to Supreme Court control over Congress and he is, of course, for the social-security program of the Administration while realizing that thus far only first steps have been taken. He is for producers' and consumers' cooperatives as affording the prospect of a kind of price control which safeguards both the producer and the consumer. He is especially emphatic in his demands for academic freedom in our schools and colleges, which he rightly terms a grave national issue. "We want," he says, "the children and the young men and women of our country to know the facts and conditions prevailing in the world in which they live."

Here I must make a correction. In The Nation of May 6, writing in this department, I stated that a well-known gambling resort in Florida was aided in its business by receiving its telephone messages over a Coast Guard telephone. I find that I was mistaken in this; that the telephone in question belongs to another department of the government. I am the happier to make this correction because I greatly admire the efficiency and ability of the Coast Guard, especially of its ships and their crews.

"YES, the Reverend Mr. Smith's speech was what we call 'rabble-rousing.' But under the spell of his oratory one felt that there was something fine, and to some extent justified, in the indignation with which he answered those who call him a 'rabble-rouser.'"

This heartfelt tribute to the aide of Talmadge, Huey Long, Coughlin, Lemke, and Dr. Townsend was paid by Mark Sullivan last Sunday in his syndicated column. It seems to me that Mr. Sullivan has come to be the most tragic figure in American journalism with the possible exception of Walter Lippmann. Mark Sullivan was once the leader of liberal forces in the fight against the reactionaries of the Republican Party. But when he begins to lend aid and comfort to Gerald L. K. Smith Mr. Sullivan commits treachery to the craft which he has long served. Under even the loosest dispensation it is monstrous for him to suggest that Gerald L. K. Smith is a sincere man or that there is anything fine or to any extent justified in his indignation against "those who call him a 'rabble-rouser.'"

As a matter of fact, Smith isn't even indignant. Mark Sullivan heard him in action at the National Press Club. That night Smith chose to play straight. A few weeks earlier he made the speech before a somewhat more sophisticated audience at the Dutch Treat Club in New York. This time Smith stopped in the middle, grinned at the crowd, said "How am I doing?" and swung back into his act. On Sunday he did the speech again, this time on the radio, and with full stops and tremolo.

"What he is for, whatever is his constructive philosophy, did not clearly emerge in this speech," adds Mark a little naively.

It never does. I have heard the Gerald L. K. Smith speech several times and its climax runs just about as follows: "They tell me that I mustn't refer to our sacred flag. That would make me a rabble-rouser. They say I must not speak of our glorious Constitution. That would be rabble-rousing. They tell me that I cannot quote from my beloved Bible which I hold here in my hand. Let me tell you, my friends, that if it is rabble-rousing to praise the flag and the Constitution and to love and revere the holy Bible then I pray to God that He in his wisdom will make me the greatest rabble-rouser in the land and fit to follow in the footsteps of Huey Long, who chose me as his great disciple."

As Mark Sullivan says, the constructive philosophy is just a little dim. Even as an emotional appeal it isn't very accurate. Gerald L. K. Smith was never one of Senator Long's chief lieutenants. He was merely a hanger-on. Huey referred to him as his "number two preacher." Smith filled in when the other clergyman was not available. Long treated Gerald Smith with a good deal of contempt. Paul Y. Anderson tells me that on one occasion the Kingfish said to the Reverend Mr. Smith, "Gerald, what have you done with those dirty shirts I told you to send to the laundry? They're not back yet."

Upon the death of Huey, Gerald Smith prepared to move forward from dirty shirts to dirty linen in general. Before the beginning of 1936 he boasted that he had full control of all the Share-the-Wealth clubs. He told me that in New Orleans on New Year's Eve. The local newspapermen said that Gerald was trying to cover too much territory. He was not well liked by Long's associates. In an effort to attract attention to himself he briefly sponsored an anti-Semitic drive in the state. Herman Deutsch, the novelist and newspaperman, told me that Smith had called him up late at night and announced that the Share-the-Wealth clubs would sponsor a movement against the rich Jewish merchants of New Orleans. Nothing came of it. Seymour Weiss got hold of him and told him to shut up.

With the coming of the Talmadge grass-roots convention in Georgia, Gerald L. K. Smith saw a chance for the limelight and became one of the chief backers of the show which had at least moral support from Hearst and the Liberty League. Talmadge wanted to abolish the income tax and Smith said he represented four million members of Share-the-Wealth clubs. The two things didn't seem to hitch up, but Gerald is no great stickler for logic.

All that was required of anybody was to be against Roosevelt. You may remember the Talmadge convention as the one in which a picture of a Negro professor at Howard escorting Mrs. Roosevelt into the college office building was used to fan race prejudice. The "something fine" in Smith's own speech was his shout into the microphone, "We're going to turn that cripple out of the White House."

Mark Sullivan gathered among other things that Gerald L. K. Smith was fighting dictatorship and was for the mass against the rule of a few powerful people. It might be pertinent to call the attention of Mark Sullivan to the resolutions adopted by the Coughlinites in their Cleveland convention. The indorsement begins:

"In the conduct of the affairs of the National Union for Social Justice we indorse, without any exception whatsoever, all the acts of our president and great leader, Father Coughlin."

And the final paragraph runs: "Finally, lest specification detract from the fulness of our sanction, we publish our unreserved and unqualified indorsements of all public acts, radio addresses, and statements of our leader..."

Father Coughlin is great and Gerald L. K. Smith is his prophet. If Mark Sullivan can really find in him "something fine" he is wasting his time writing columns. Mark should rent himself out as a needle-nabber for hay farmers.

NATURE AND THE MODERN MIND

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LAST year Donald Culross Peattie won a prize with his diary, "An Almanac for Moderns." He was hailed by many, including myself, as an important addition to the short list of first-rate writers about nature, and now "Green Laurels" (Simon and Schuster) confirms the judgment. This is his second book since the "Almanac" was published, and in the normal course of events it would now be time for commentators to discover the limitations they had overlooked in the first flush of their enthusiasm. But this new and lively account of the story of man's study of nature as revealed in the careers of the great naturalists is so interesting, so fresh, and so informed with an original sensibility as to disarm even the second thoughts of watchful critics.

It is true that Mr. Peattie occasionally overwrites as he did, rather more often, in the "Almanac"—that occasionally one seems to detect something almost febrile in his enthusiasm, not only for the idea of nature, but also for the idea of the naturalist. It is also true that "Green Laurels" does not appear to represent any considerable amount of new research. The facts he presents are for the most part familiar facts and constitute no important contribution to the historical record. Mr. Peattie is nevertheless much more than a mere popularizer, and he has more to give than even his remarkable power of communicating the enthusiasm he feels for his subject. That enthusiasm is based upon a definite attitude, half intellectual, half emotional, toward the whole world of living things, and it furnished him with a point of reference from which the history of the study of nature becomes much more than merely a history of gradually accumulated knowledge. It becomes primarily an account (illustrated through the work and the personality of great men) of the different kinds of facts which naturalists wanted to discover and, above all, of their aims and feelings at different periods. Thus the story of natural history includes the story of the naturalist's conception of man's relation to nature.

In our issue for July 25 Mr. Benjamin Ginzburg offered an admirable review of the volume from the standpoint of the scientist. My excuse for returning to it here is that I, as a layman, discovered in a book intended for laymen conceptions and clarifications which a scientist is naturally inclined to take for granted.

Modern natural history began, like most branches of modern knowledge, with the effort to recover the somewhat overestimated knowledge and wisdom of classical times. The Renaissance botanist, for example, thought of his task as primarily the task of identifying in his own region the plants mentioned by Dioscorides, and only with great reluctance was he forced to realize that the flora of the Mediterranean region were not coextensive with the flora of the world. When he did finally realize that fact he began to collect and to classify; Linnæus appeared to bring order out of chaos; and, finally, as has happened in the case of every new line of study opened up, Linnæan science became a dead mechanical thing. The mania for collecting and classifying actually impeded the exploitation of more fruitful fields of inquiry, just as, later, comparative anatomy came to obstruct new developments, and the great work of Cuvier was used for rather more than it was worth in the effort to block the study of evolution.

Thus the history of natural history is, on the one hand, a history of the opening up and the subsequent exhaustion of fields of inquiry. More subtly it is also the history of what attitude men took toward their materials, of what they hoped to gain from their knowledge of nature. And on this side the history is of concern to every student of the human mind because it parallels and constitutes one aspect of the more general history of the emotional and philosophical attitudes assumed in the course of the development of that mind. There is, for example, nothing more fundamental in the story of the naturalist than the fact that, like the inquirer in most other fields, his progress has been a difficult and often painful progress away from that homocentric conception of the universe which is so natural to man. The triumph of Copernican astronomy, for example, is not an isolated fact. The realization that the earth is not the center of the universe but that, instead, it revolves around a center outside itself is merely one aspect of the disturbing fact that, in general, we can understand the external world only when we make the effort to discover about what center, other than the one we naturally assume, events are moving. And though Mr. Peattie nowhere specifically calls attention to just this fact it is implicit in most of what he writes, and the course of natural history is a progress away from the conception of man's central position in the scheme of life.

The early botanists, for example, were crudely teleological as well as crudely utilitarian. They were trying to find plants useful to man; they assumed that each plant had been "put here for a purpose," (i.e., to be useful to man); and they rather suspected that each had been marked in some way, so that, for instance, a plant with a heart-shaped leaf would be good for the heart. Long after this attitude had ceased to be exhibited in so crass a form it still dominated men's minds in subtler ways. Thus the first suggestion of an evolutionary relationship between man and the other animals assumed, as a matter of course, that man was the 'original creation and that other creatures had degenerated from him. But Buffon, whom Mr. Peattie takes as the perfect, if somewhat belated, type of the more refined form of the homocentric naturalist, will illustrate better. He felt that the natural grouping of animals was that which follows the line of human thought. A reasonable man would not follow an account of the horse, with an account of the zebra but with one of the dog which follows at the horse's heels. Animals were described as "noble," "courageous," "loyal," as though animal nature were to be understood only in terms of human nature. But best of all was his comment on one of Réaumur's pioneer contributions to the knowledge of insect behavior:

In the end, a bee should not occupy more space in the head of a naturalist than it does in Nature: and this marvelous republic of flies will never be more in the eyes of reason than a swarm of little beasts that have no other relation to us than to supply us with wax and honey.

Goodness only knows, these "eyes of reason" were comforting things, and Mr. Peattie, heir to all the knowledge that Buffon instinctively feared, cannot define his relation to other living creatures so simply or so clearly as Buffon could define our relation to bees. In one sense we seem less intimate with nature because nature is no longer merely the environment provided for us and to be understood fully as such; because, too, we know now how hopeless is the attempt to understand animal consciousness in terms of our own, as though the mental life of a beetle or even of a dog were merely some simple and dimmer version of ours. We realize now that our motives and aims and thoughts are, like our way of life, merely one system of possible modes of aiming and thinking and living, so that we cannot even describe one mode as higher than another without introducing premises which are purely human. And to realize this is to be moved away a second step from that feeling of intimacy which primitive man must have had when he assumed, not only what Buffon did, but also that the beasts could on occasion hold their conferences and make their speeches.

But if we are less at home with nature, in this sense less intimate with other creatures, we have, and for the same reasons, a greater if dimmer sense of fellowship with them—more of a feeling that we are co-equals sprung from the same source and engaged, each in our own way, in the common adventure of living. To know them is not to know lesser versions of ourselves but to catch some glimpse, which we could never catch if we knew only ourselves, into that mystery of the living world of which we are a part.

There is something about almost any living thing that is plasmic, resilient, and in a way alarming. We say, "I touched something—and it was alive!" There is no such shock in touching that which has never lived. The mineral world is vast, it is mighty, rigid, and brittle. But the hand that touches vital matter—though the man were blind—infalibly recognizes the feel of life, and recoils in excitement.

Only a modern, I think, could have written exactly that because the feeling which infuses the passage is purely modern—because only a modern could realize that all protoplasm is one, that to touch something alive is not to touch something lesser than man and necessarily subordinate to him, but to touch the mystery which includes all others.

The Majestic People

THE PEOPLE, YES. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WHEN Rebecca West made mention of Sandburg's "revolutionary passion" in 1926, pausing to remark that "poem after poem is ruined by a coarsely intruding line that turns it from poetry into propaganda," it was in the nature of an afterthought. Sandburg was then concerned even more circumstantially than in the present volume with ice-handlers, dock-wallopers, wheat-stackers, and "contemporary bunkshooters"; but his status as a propagandist was incidental to his function as "poet of the Middle West." "The People, Yes," which is defined for us in a prefatory lyric as a collection of "stories and poems nobody would want to laugh at, interspersed with memoranda worth a second look," is a volume to be considered entirely in terms of its "revolutionary" content. Sandburg's tenderness for ethnological detail has not prevented him from marshaling his facts about a thesis here, the tractarian nature of which becomes unmistakable as the theme gathers bulk and momentum.

"The People, Yes" is from one standpoint a heroic poem without a hero. The intent has been to celebrate the anonymous Genius of the People as a force capable of molding into its own image not only the language and mores of a nation, but its history as well. With more prodigality than order Sandburg has set down the American folk-epic as he conceives it, chiefly by the procedure of overturning upon the pages bushel-baskets of regional legends, phrases, anecdotes, tall tales, allusions, and aphorisms interspersed with comment of his own. Occasionally this material is engrafted upon lyrical themes and knit to the general score by links of logic or contextual reference. Most often, however, the items are thrown up in series, arbitrarily, so that the effect becomes one of chanted portfolio notations rather than an orderly development of a theme.

Sandburg's fundamental conception of "The People" as a historical entity is clear both by direct statement and from a steady stream of tropes which furnish an incidental embroidery to the argument as a whole. There occur such metaphors as "a child at school writing howlers, writing answers half-wrong, half-right," a "monster turtle," a monolith, a target, a spectrum, a Pandora's box, an avalanche, an anvil, a cosmos, and a phantasmagoria; at its baldest, however, we are told: "The People is Everyman, everybody. Everybody is you and I and all others." With complete consistency, then, history becomes "a few Big Names plus People," industry "the daily chores of the people":

The plow and the hammer, the knife and the shovel, the planting hoe and the reaping sickle, everywhere these are the people's possessions by right of use.

Similarly justice becomes a verdict, not of a quorum, but of a culture. Ultimately, the concept is compacted into a trope of the People as History moving blindly through space and time and achieving its destiny not so much through conscious exercise of will as by a gradual, tortured, yet invincible exodus from trial and error to revolution.

Whether such a notion takes into account sufficiently the element of will—of conscious rather than blind self-enlightenment—as a catalyst in the hastening of historical effects, and whether it must not also in the last analysis look wholly to faith for the attainment of its ends—faith in "the majestic people," in the eventual "dignity of deepening roots"—are problems to be suggested only in passing. More to the point of present-day issues are the poet's direct avowals of sympathy and indignation: Sandburg has known of verdicts purchased through bribes, of violence hired, of murder paid for, of "pay-day patriots." "The man in the street is fed with lies in peace, gas in war," he writes, is challenged with the "animal dictate" to "do what we tell you or go hungry; listen to us or you don't eat," while "rare and suave swine . . . pay themselves a fat swag of higher salaries." He calls upon Lincoln as the exemplar of the American folk-conscience to point the way "beyond the present wilderness" of exploitation and deceit, much as Wordsworth invoked the spirit of Milton in 1802. "Always the storm of propaganda blows," he concludes; but "the learning and blundering people will live on."

The living passion of millions can rise into a whirlwind: the storm once loose who can ride it? you? or you? or you?

only history, only tomorrow, knows for every revolution breaks as a child of its own convulsive hour shooting patterns never told beforehand.

Many matters of popular moment, it is true, are skirted by a quizzical "Yes and no, no and yes"; and the reader is left to determine for himself whether the "United States of the Earth," of which mention is made in Section 87, is to be construed as an allusion to Tennyson, Marx, or Jesus. A query more easy of resolution is that addressed to the Chinese philosopher in an earlier section: "Was he preaching or writing poetry or talking through his hat?" In the present volume, surely, Sandburg has devoted the greatest part of his energies to the first, considerably less to the second, and nothing at all to the last. The result may make negligible poetry and confused preaching, but it proves Sandburg thoroughly alive to the "shock and contact of ideas" today. On this account alone—if not solely—"The People, Yes" should interest a wider audience than any of his other volumes since "Chicago Poems."

THE CAT. By Colette. Translated from the French by Morris Bentinck. Farrar and Rinehart. $1.50.

SURELY it is only in France that a novel could be written whose hero at the age of twenty-four looked at himself one night in the mirror and exclaimed: "But get to bed . . . you're all to pieces . . . it's disgraceful. . . . They think I'm beautiful just because I'm blond; dark, I'd be hideous." He stood there nevertheless and smiled "so that he might admire his teeth again; affectionately stroked the natural part in his too thick blond hair; and was pleased with the tints in his eyes, gray, shading into green near the dark lashes; the eye itself surrounded by a purplish circle." Alain was to be married in a day or two, and he had just been going over some of his old things in the charming, ugly house where he lived with his indulgent Mama. There was one box which contained his absolutely personal treasures: "a gold dollar; a signet ring; an agate charm from his father's chain; a few red seeds from a rare East Indian plant; a mother-of-pearl rosary; a broken bracelet, souvenir of a young, hot-tempered mistress who had remained in his life briefly and left it tempestuously. . . . Dreamily he fingered these small relics, shining and worthless like the bits of broken stones found in the nests of plundering birds. 'I must throw away all this . . . or leave it here. I don't care about it . . . or can it be that I do?'"

He did. He cared about everything that he could finger in this dreamy way; everything, in fact, about his mother's charming old ugly house with its wonderful walled garden where even when he shut his gray-green-purple eyes he could be sure that the expensive fertilizer about the base of every flower was exhaling a miraculous moisture. Moisture. That was it. This twenty-fourth summer was hot in Neuilly, and there was a disappointing dryness in the thoughts he was able to have from time to time concerning the rather commonplace modern girl he was going to marry. Camille was dark and lovely, and there could be no doubt of her passion for Alain. But she was hard; drove a roadster in the regulation way of pampered maidens; and was something of an intrusion, really, in this hothouse of his little memories and of his daily pleasures which after all were so difficult to disentangle from the entire secret jungle where his dreams had root. It was not easy for him in his dreams to know whether he was four or twenty-four; though it was easy to dream. He simply had to drop down on the fresh sheets which Emile would of course have spread for him in the room where nothing else must ever change; run his hands skilfully over the fur of Saha, his blue Chartreuse cat who at such a time crept silently to the breast of his pajamas; and be off at once among the great rings of light and the tropical vines of fancy which writhed together in patterns quite indescribable later on when he woke up and went with a certain unwillingness to keep some eleven o'clock engagement with the immaculately dressed Camille. Occasionally, to be sure, he dropped languidly down to the business his father had left him, and talked for an hour or two with old M. Veuillet. But that was as he chose; and more frequently he chose to remain all morning in the garden where Saha conducted her fierce little hunts after butterflies and moths, and where the two of them knew the significance of every gesture and every small cry that either of them might make.

Alain didn't know how well he would get on without Saha after his marriage. The separation was to be brief; only until the new house was ready next to this one of his mother's, which somehow seemed to him violated whenever he glanced over at the piles of wood and plaster beyond the familiar horizon of honeysuckle. But it was to be a separation. He and Camille were to spend their honeymoon in Patrick's apartment, nine stories up; and this was no place for Saha. Temporarily, as things turned out, it was the place for Alain and Camille, who learned how to forget everything else in each other's daily and nightly arms. Yet, rather to Camille's chagrin, Alain did eventually remember his cat and go to see her—and what was worse for a woman capable of French jealousy, bring her back with him. What happened afterwards is something that no reviewer should tell. But it was terrible and tragic, and on the last page it looked as if it would be a long time before either lover—if such a term was applicable now—studied again the down, black or gold as the case might be, on the other's outstretched anatomy.

Surely it is only in France that such a novel could be written and not be wholly preposterous. And probably it is only Colette who could contrive to write it in a hundred and sixty pages. In as little space as that she definitely establishes the existence of her offensive young man, his fiancée and his bride, his mother, his servants, his private world of poetry, and of course his cat. I must confess that I do not know what should be written in the heavy English hand about so able a piece of—perhaps—triviality. If every other people is slightly ridiculous to us, and if the French certainly cannot be excluded from the compliment, at least it is true that no other people manages to go on being itself so purely, so intelligently, and with such a fantastic self-possession. How well Colette understands her story I do not know, any more than I know whether I understand it at all; or whether there is anything to understand. As to its importance in the universe of books—well, that must be left to someone wise beyond the present year, and wise beyond nationality.

A Prophecy of Possibilities

THE FLOWERING OF NEW ENGLAND. 1815—1865.

By Van Wyck Brooks. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

THERE is in Mr. Brooks's narrative of the New England mind a deep kind of negative inspiration for the writers and artists of our day, New England or not; and there is, more immediately discernible but harder to enact, a deep positive inspiration for men of culture, good-will, and responsible sensibility. We have here, that is, a prophecy of possibility such as history always provides when it is taken as the record of imagination: the cycle of germination, flowering, and—not extinction, but mummification. We see ourselves always, in such a perspective, living in the ruins of unexhausted possibilities; and if we emphasize, as Mr. Brooks does in this narrative, the whole contagious juvenescence, the new and omnivorous imagination finding everywhere its natural themes almost bursting into the flower of form, we see not only that the possibility was unexhausted but that it persisted, and persists now, actually inexhaustible. The possibility was merely not taken up. The imagination grew tired, or clever, or self-conscious. It hid, so to speak, on the surface of the society it envisaged and lost the discipline of detachment, or it succumbed, like a statesman's imagination, to the exigence of office and election, when writing and thinking became the exercise of vanity and expostulation. Yet the possibility remained; still remains, and still waits. How shall it be taken up?

Prophecy is memory working forward, and springs as much from need as from desire, from the sight of necessity as much as from the blindness of hope. Prophecy puts us on the brink.

By writing, at this time, in his full powers, a narrative of appreciation so keen, so full of relish and admiration and intimations of vitality, Mr. Brooks not only celebrates the highest period (I do not say the greatest artists) of American culture, he brings us to the brink, the very possibility, of another such period. It is the brink of an abyss only if you draw back and are ever afterwards haunted. The point may be pressed. It is the point that the view you take may be determined by your awareness of your needs.

It is in the stature of his awareness that, in this volume, Mr. Brooks has increased. Granted that his subject helped him, there has also been a transformation in his point of view. In "The Ordeal of Mark Twain" he saw principally the social problem of the American artist at home, and in "The Pilgrimage of Henry James" he emphasized the problem of the deracinated artist in search of a theme; but in neither book did he demonstrate or judge the actual achievement—the greatness of imagination—of Mark Twain and Henry James. "The Flowering of New England" could easily have been written to illustrate the analogous problems of the period, could have emphasized the sterile late years of Hawthorne or the lack of composition in Emerson; only then it must have been called "The Straw Flowers of New England"—for straw flowers are cut and dried before they are completely open. The fact that Mr. Brooks's mind has so grown and so changed that he chose rather to declare not only what greatness was there but also the greatness of the possibility that was never enacted—that fact contains the inspiration of his narrative for ourselves as artists. His narrative is good for any region and any scene, and good especially for those disorders whose symptoms are lack of theme and the rootless malaise. He will not make us great writers—no one would wish for that providence—but he will make us feel the direction of magnitude and the stretch of scope; and these are not the same as the sentiments of either Thomas Wolfe or Ernest Hemingway.

The positive inspiration (which artists cannot gain except directly) for men of culture and good-will and responsible sensibility is again found in the story Mr. Brooks chose to tell as the background and support of his major story: the story of the men and women of all ranks and kinds who were alert and sentient and on the stretch at one or more focal points of sensibility and so contributed to the cooperative vitality of their culture. Most of the individuals were narrow, all of them were limited, none of them complete in our eyes; but they vitalized a culture which seemed complete and even universal to themselves—and indeed to much of Europe. If the reader will look up the unfamiliar names in Mr. Brooks's index he will I think be astonished at the high state of culture he finds exemplified, and more astonished at the breadth of learning which conditioned the culture; but if the reader is incredulous, he will be on the wrong track.

There is, finally, a point where the needs of artists and men of good-will may meet. Speaking of the orchidaceous and atrophied existence of the American exiles in Rome, Mr. Brooks observes that "Norton, with his acute social conscience, his sense of a mission at home, probed under the surface of Italian life. The repressive political system disturbed him, and he had understood, from his own observation, the sorrows of Petrarch, Dante, and Alfieri, who had mourned over their country and its degradation. . . . He had cared for the realities of Italian life. . . . The others did not wish to care. It was to escape from the prose of existence that they had left America. If their writing lost all grip and bottom, was not this the reason and the explanation?" It is because we are so widely aware that in this respect our artists no less than our men of culture are

Through Western Eyes

EYES ON JAPAN. by Victor A. Yakhontoff. Coward-McCann. $3.50.

THIS review is a melancholy record of what might have been. General Yakhontoff describes his book as "a concise source for reference on various aspects of Japan's life." A 281-page attempt to survey the history, geography, culture, economic structure, contemporary politics, manners, and morals of a country cannot contribute much that is really valuable, although even in that narrow space the author manages to squeeze in a surprising amount of material. But when such works exist as Professor Murdoch's standard history, Harold Moulton's detailed "Economic and Financial Appraisal," and Sir George Sansom's unsurpassed "Cultural History," General Yakhontoff's book seems to have only the rather dubious raison d'être of being all in one volume. What he might have done, what he comes so near doing but always just misses, would have been to give us a living, ticking likeness of modern Japan. But so occupied is the author in scurrying all over the surface of his subject that he takes no time off to dig underneath and find out what really goes on. For instance in describing the administrative set-up of the government the author never mentions its least-known but most powerful element, the jushin, or throne clique, which officially does not exist at all, but which actually exercises all the power nominally invested in that most wooden of figureheads, the Emperor. Again he misses the opportunity to bring dead words to life when he discusses the abandonment of the gold standard in abstract instead of in terms of its connection with the assassination of Premier Inukai and others in 1932; or foreign trade competition in abstract instead of in terms of last year's bitter trade war with Canada; or the constitutional position of the Emperor vis-a-vis the state in abstract instead of in terms of the Minobe controversy which last summer kept the Cabinet tottering on the brink of resignation for months and roused the military to a pitch of ire that has not died down yet. To this Yakhontoff gives one grudging sentence. The author, given the original scheme of his book, could ill afford space for such concrete illustrations. He does carry out his scheme with amazing thoroughness, filling in every nook and cranny in the Japanese state structure with some particle of information, however slight. But the reader would have a more vivid picture of how Japan lives and works had General Yakhontoff been less encyclopedic and more intensive.

In his thesis that there are no psychological differences of any importance between Japan and the West, it seems to me particularly apparent that the General, while he may have his eyes on Japan, is wearing blinkers. What differences there are, he says, are "not fundamental" and are already blending "under the irresistible pressure of economics." The latter phrase is one of the several instances where the General (who was an officer in the Czar's army, military attaché of the imperial embassy in Tokyo in 1916-18, and assistant secretary of war under Kerensky) suddenly remembers that he is now a Marxist and gives a hurried nod in the direction of the dialectic. Only in the mechanics of living are the Japanese blending with the West. Underneath they are quite dissimilar from Which brands are best buys?

A NATION-WIDE ORGANIZATION OF CONSUMERS GIVE YOU THE ANSWERS

OIL BURNERS

ARE oil burners or coal stokers more economical for heating your house? Which will give you the least trouble and require the least care? What are the "Best Buys" in (1) oil burners, (2) coal stokers, and (3) gas-fired burners?

These questions are answered by heating experts in the current issue of Consumers Union Reports, monthly publication of Consumers Union of United States. Before spending several hundred dollars on an automatic heating system consult this report. It rates twenty-two leading makes of oil burners, including Quiet May, Delco, Timken, Gar Wood, Williams Oil-O-Matic and General Electric; seven makes of coal stokers, including Motor Stoker, Iron Fireman and Electric Furnace-Man, and nine makes of gas-fired boilers and other automatic heating devices as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable."

WHAT brand of hosiery outwore all other brands in actual wear tests of fifteen leading brands? Will your annual hosiery bill be less if you buy 50 cent stockings or if you buy dollar stockings?

These questions are also answered in the current issue. If you want to know what brands of stockings will give you the least runs and the most wear for your money read this report which rates only one of fifteen brands as a "Best Buy" and nine as "Not Acceptable." Included in these ratings are Gotham, Kayser, Phoenix, CD, Van Raalte and McCallum stockings.

LAUNDRY SOAPS

WHAT are the best brands of soap to use in laundering fine fabrics? What inexpensive soaps are best for general laundry use?

Answers to such questions in these about laundry soaps are also given in this same issue which rates Chipso, Lux, Kirkman's, Selox, Ivory Flakes, Palmolive Beads, Fels-Naptha and many other brands. This issue also reports on breads, rating Bond's, Dugan's, Ward's, Cushman's and other brands; tells about the labor conditions under which many products are made; and contains an article on sanitary conditions at Coney Island.

CONSUMERS UNION of United States, with Professor Colston E. Warner, of Amherst, as president, Arthur Kallet, co-author of 100,000,000 Guinea Pigs, as director, and D. H. Palmer, technical supervisor, is a non-profit, membership organization providing usable, unbiased, technical information the comparative value of competing brands of products. This information—based on tests and investigations by expert staff technicians and reports by impartial consultants—is reported in monthly issues of Consumers Union Reports and in a yearly buying guide, with ratings of brands as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." These valuable reports—enabling you to save money and to buy intelligently instead blindly—are available to you at the low fees of $3 and $1 a year. Simply fill out and mail the coupon below if you wish to become a member of Consumers Union and receive these reports regularly. A copy of the August issue will immediately be sent you. Membership will also entitle you to receive the yearly buying guide which will be published in the latter part of the year.

us in their mental processes, their scale of values, their mores and morals. To refuse to recognize this psychological barrier is to frustrate any attempt to solve our mutual problems.

Nor does it help us toward a solution to insist that the United States has so vital an interest in China that it must at all costs keep its hold there, which, in other words, is to insist that we must ultimately come into active conflict with Japan. Out of his sympathy with the Soviet Union, which wants us to stay active in Asia as an obstacle in the way of further Japanese aggression, it is but natural that General Yakhontoff should adopt this thesis. But it is strange to find him trying to fight fire with fire; entering a plea for American imperial interests as an inducement for us to curb Japanese imperialism, for that is what his argument amounts to.

BARBARA WERTHEIM

New Trend in Philosophy

MOVEMENTS OF THOUGHT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By George H. Mead. Edited by Merritt H. Moore. University of Chicago Press. $5.

PHILOSOPHY alone of all the cultural sciences has remained comparatively unaffected by the vogue of social interpretations. Not that attempts have been wanting to depict in broad strokes obvious correlations between general tendencies in doctrine and basic social changes. But most efforts in this direction have concerned themselves merely with the uses to which doctrines have been put. The actual structure of philosophic thought, not to speak of its nuances and emphases, seems to have defied plausible social explanation. The result has been that professional philosophers whose major activity is analysis of formal questions of consistency and exploration of the technical problems immanent in philosophic tradition look askance upon the applications of historical materialism to their field. Marx's own aperçus have not been developed and the fruitful beginnings of Dewey's interpretations of Greek and modern philosophy beg for amplification. More than one ambitious program has been laid down whose thesis is that the history of philosophy is a pale conceptual reflection of the history of social organization and class struggles. But they have been, so to speak, nothing more than books with promising titles, exciting introductions, and blank pages.

One turns therefore with eagerness to the second of the trilogy of posthumous works of Professor George Mead which embodies the materials of a famous course on the development of philosophic ideas in the last century. Out of the school of Hegel, influencing and influenced by Dewey, a profound student of the history and social role of science, Mead was eminently qualified to carry through a social interpretation of philosophic movements which could stand up under critical analysis. Unfortunately Mead left little in the way of manuscripts so that the book had to be put together from students' notes. Even if we allow their verbatim character, the lectures, when delivered, were obviously not prepared for publication. Inevitable shortcomings of style and organization make the reading difficult, but there is a sufficient number of nuggets of pure gold to more than justify the editor's judgment of their worth. Here, too, Mead must rest content with the laurels of a pathfinder.

The periods with which Mead is mainly concerned cover the Kantian and post-Kantian schools in Germany and the French and English movements of the first half of the last century. Although the latter have been the subject of considerable interpretation, the former are almost virgin soil so far as detailed social investigation goes. Mead shows precisely in what sense the Kantian doctrines expressed the positive ethos of the classic bourgeois revolution. Neither Hobbes nor Locke nor Rousseau succeeded in vindicating the rational authority of science against the arbitrary authority of the church and state. And Hume's acid skepticism, by dissolving causality and the self into bundles of habitual association and seemingly calling into question all the presuppositions of the science of his day, opened a back door to entrenched custom and authority. Where reason is impugned, reigning orthodoxies are strengthened. According to Mead, with his theory of a priori synthetic judgment Kant placed the necessity and universality of science on new foundations. With his doctrine of the categorical imperative, he invested volition and desire with rational character, secured the moral ground of the rights for which the bourgeoisie was struggling, particularly property, and so saved the revolution. Now, only those interests in a community were valid which could be universalized, which were "of such a form that when a person wills something for himself he is willing the same for others."

Under Napoleon, who was too busy to read Kant, the gains of the French Revolution were consolidated in an "imperialist" form. This led to political failure, the frustration of high hopes, and reaction everywhere. In Germany one form of reaction took its intellectual point of departure from certain phases of Kant's thought. The Romantic movement in philosophy sought to justify personal, class, and national aspirations by appealing not to the identities of logic but the continuities of history. True freedom could not be won by worship of abstract Reason, which enforced its syllogistic conclusions with the guillotine and Napoleon's armies. Kant had taught that the laws of nature had been legislated by Mind. The Romantics improved upon him and maintained that not only the form but the substance of experience, i.e., the whole of history, was evolved out of the developing unity of the Self. The very object of knowledge was a construction of the Self—ethical in Fichte, aesthetic in Schelling, and logical in Hegel. Each of them assumed that the pattern of historical development is identical with the growth of self-consciousness, so that the truest as well as the most generic type of knowledge is self-knowledge. By communing with their inwards, they established continuity with a fancied past in order to project an even more glorious future in which all social needs would be realized without paying the price of the historical furies. To Napoleon's victories they counterposed an egotistic cosmic imperialism in whose economy, inconsistently enough, Napoleon appeared as a necessary historical instrument.

Primary source-materials exist, apparently unknown to Mead, which go far to confirm his social analyses especially as regards Hegel. In view of the rather excessive current dispraise of post-Kantian idealism from Fichte to Hegel, there is also some point to Mead's stress upon the fruitfulness of the evolutionary attitude which underlay this romantic madness. But it is hard to determine exactly how Mead evaluates Hegel's dialectic. In some places he refers to the procedure of the research scientist as a fitting illustration of the Hegelian logic and asserts that the dialectic can be applied to every phase of life. Elsewhere he says, "The Hegelian dialectic did not devise a statement of scientific method." Perhaps his students slurred the qualifying contexts but it is clear that Mead never made up his mind about the value of the Hegelian logic. Nowhere does he seriously attempt to differentiate between the elements of sense and nonsense in the dialectic.

Most recent historians of philosophy have appreciated the impact of the industrial revolution upon the development of utilitarianism, positivism, socialism, and modern science. But I am acquainted with no technical philosopher who interprets the industrial revolution itself as a phase in the changing social relations of production which began with the break-up of the medieval synthesis and eventuated in the establishment of the world-market. Mead sets both the industrial revolution and the social philosophies correlated with it in a larger explanatory context, attributing dominant causal influence to the immanent development of capitalism. One is tempted at this point to accuse him of rewriting Marx but there is some evidence that Mead's insights on the question are original with him. To have rediscovered an elaborate chain of causal connection for an entire period of social history is no slight achievement and explains the intellectual tribute Dewey and Whitehead have paid him. The evidence of Mead's independence of Marx is indirect and will be found in a chapter on Karl Marx and Socialism, the accuracy of which is inversely proportional to its sympathy. Mead's attempt to foster Malthusianism upon Marx proves that he never finished the first volume of "Capital," for Marx's demonstration that overpopulation is a socio-economic not a biological phenomenon is nothing less than a definitive refutation of Malthus.

There are other important and stimulating chapters. One of them, Industry a Boon to Science, undertakes to show that "the economic organization of society has been the source out of which some of the most important of our scientific conceptions and hypotheses have arisen." The theory of energy is taken as the most conspicuous illustration. The chapter presents enough evidence, however, to justify the contention that industry owes more to pure science than vice versa. Those interested in the logic of science will regard the chapter devoted to the thesis that "modern science is research science" as the best in the volume. For Mead, scientific method is an experimental rationale of continuous human adjustment to novelties for the sake of predictive mastery. Although this emphasis leads to an underestimation of the systematic character of science, it is a welcome antidote to a fashionable current of scientific thought which holds that all laws are of the same form as the proposition, "Three feet make one yard."

SIDNEY HOOK

RECORDS

COLUMBIA has replaced Weingartner's early recording of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony with a new one (five records, $7.50). The performance is simple and direct to the point of not revealing all there is in the work; the Viennese recording again (as in the case of Beethoven's Ninth, recently) does not reveal all there is in the performance—i.e., the tonal characteristics of the Vienna Philharmonic, particularly of its superb strings. It reveals more than the early set did; but in fidelity of timbre, clarity, and balance it falls short of what is being achieved today, or of what was achieved three or four years ago with this very orchestra in the "Rosenkavalier" set, and is no better than what Stokowski achieved in the earliest days of electrical recording. Occasionally, in fact, it is not even as good: the oboe, in so simple a texture as that of the third to sixth measures of the introduction to the symphony, is more distinct in Stokowski's early recording; and it is amazing to hear today what Stokowski managed to achieve: the volume, the fidelity of timbre, the unfailing distinctness even where there is lack of balance.

Columbia also has issued Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major (K. 488) in the performance of Marguerite Long with an orchestra under Gaubert (three records, $5). From this performance—all suavity, elegance, and poise—one infers that Mlle. Long's conception of Mozart is derived from the idealized classical perfection of his features in popular portraits. And if faithful recording matters less to you than faithful performance, you will choose the older Victor set, with the dynamic and at times turbulent performance of Arthur Rubinstein and the London Symphony under Barbirolli—a performance that has more to do with what Mozart really was and really looked like.

On Columbia single records are a superb performance by Gieseking, of Debussy's "Reflets dans l'eau" and one almost as good of his "Soirée dans Granade" ($1.50); brilliant performances by Szigeti of Paganini's Caprices in B minor and E major ($1.50); Bach's Twelve Little Preludes, played on the harpsichord with unrelieved emphasis by Yella Pessl (two records, $2); a Bach Sarabande and a more attractive piece by Ibert for solo flute, beautifully played by Marcel Moyse ($1); and Hugo Wolf's delightful Italian Serenade in an excellent performance by the Lener String Quartet ($1.50) (the performance by the Budapest Quartet on Victor is even finer). On Victor single records are Schumann's "Schöne Fremde," "In der Fremde," "Geisternähe" and "Meine Rose," exquisitely sung by Ria Ginster ($2); Chopin's Etude Opus 25 No. 22 and Preludes Nos. 16 and 17, played by Lhevinne in what passes for the correct Chopin style—i.e., exaggerated nuances, and lots of them ($2); a beautiful performance of the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music by Aubrey Brain, solo horn, and the rest of the B.B.C. Orchestra under Boult ($1.50); and the waltzes from "Rosenkavalier," played—with brilliant sonority but, for my ears, without feeling for the genre—by Ormandy and the Minneapolis Symphony (two records, $3).

Of less consequence are Fauré's Piano Quartet Opus 15, well played by Casadesu, Calvet, Pascal, and Mas (Columbia: four records, $6); and Lapham's Japanese Piano Concerto with the composer at the piano—a work in which a few melodies from the Japanese in a context of European harmony, structural elaboration, and concerto bombast demonstrate the lack of profit in using such melodies in any stylistic and structural context but their own (Victor: three records, $3.50).

The Gramophone Shop has issued its long and impatiently awaited "Encyclopedia of Recorded Music" ($3.50), in which, thanks to the incredible industry of Mr. R. D. Darrell, you can discover what recordings there are, here and abroad, of any piece of music that interests you, provided it is not in the class of "dance music, popular songs, encore pieces, and such ephemerae," which Mr. Darrell has not bothered with (he does, however, include Gershwin, Kern, and Duke Ellington).

From the Concert Bureau of the College of the City of New York I have received "The Record Collector's Guide" ($1), in which Mr. Julian Morton Moses lists the celebrity recordings released by Columbia and Victor between April, 1903, and January, 1912. And from the Linguaphone Institute an announcement of recordings of quartets in each of which a different instrument is omitted, so that one may practice ensemble playing by playing with the records.

DURANTY'S HITLER

Dear Sirs: Very infrequently does Mr. Walter Duranty call forth rebuttal. He not only writes as he pleases but he pleases as he writes. However, in The Nation for June 3 there appeared a review by him of two books on Hitler by Heiden and Olden which demands contradiction. It appears that these two biographies have given Mr. Duranty a higher opinion of Hitler than he had previously. He sees in him now "no Pied Piper of Hamelin" . . . but the Man whom the Occasion called forth . . . patriotic . . . who gave a hopeless people hope . . . a leaderless people leadership . . . there is power in him and quality beyond his fellows."

No summation applied to Hitler could be less true, more dangerous, or so unexpected from the pen of a man like Mr. Duranty. He has learned from these biographies that Hitler is no accident but a force continuing in a single direction through twenty years, that no situation found him lacking in powers of invention, in terms of betrayal, duplicity, compromise, brutality, blood-letting, and horror. Mr. Duranty has undoubtedly been led to believe, as have most of us until recently, that Hitler was an opportunist, and he is amazed to discover that he is a colossal monster. This discovery moves him to appreciation of the quality of the monster as monster rather than the quality of the monster as man.

Out of Hitler's mouth have come the following circumscriptions upon the German people: They are to be given less education, for they must no longer think, only obey. They are to be trained for war instead of educated for peace because the cultural contribution of the German people in the new era is to be war. They are to be deprived of the right as a people or as individuals to vary in color, size, or turn of mind or spirit, for the highest duty of this great people is blind obedience to the dictates of one man, Hitler. Because the masses of the people are stupid, democracy is a ridiculous concept, a lampoon of reality, and the unfeeling and unthinking masses are clods to be manufactured for the nation, which he further identifies as the expression of his own supreme will.

His history has been a steady climb into the bosom of heavy industry, from which rostrum he has dictated his abolition of every promise or sanction of liberty for individuals and associations of individuals. From this high place he has ordered murder and repression against every group of people in Germany except one, the small group of monopolists, the backbone and heart of the German war machine.

Hitler is no Pied Piper of Hamelin, Mr. Duranty; you are right. He is Nemesis. He betrays not only children, although he betrays them, but sixty million people who wish to walk and talk and love and live as they please within the bounds of decency.

DEFENDING MR. BULLITT

Dear Sirs: In your issue of June 24 one of your writers suspected Ambassador Bullitt of being friendly to the Nazis. If I remember correctly your writer went so far as to state that he has definite information that Mr. Bullitt endeavored to influence the British Foreign Office in favor of the Nazis.

I have known Bill Bullitt for many years. He was in Philadelphia recently during the Democratic convention, and though I did not see him personally, I did ask J. David Stern to have someone interview him. I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Stern saying "there is absolutely no truth" in the statements made by your writer. Knowing Bill Bullitt as I do, I would just as well believe that President Roosevelt tried to influence the British Foreign Office in favor of the Nazi government.

I have such a high regard for The Nation, and I quote it so often to many of my tory friends, that I would like your publication to be a little more careful on facts, especially when it concerns a man of such liberal tendencies as Bill Bullitt.

A. T. MALMED

Philadelphia, July 28

[Our correspondent refers to an editorial paragraph in which we discussed charges made against Mr. Bullitt by The Week, of London. Far from stating that we had any definite information that these charges were true, we remarked that we found them almost incredible in view of Mr. Bullitt's past record. We did, however, express the opinion that they were serious enough to warrant a thorough investigation by the State Department, and drastic action if they were found to be correct.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

LABOR VICTORY IN MINNEAPOLIS

Dear Sirs: Because you and your readers are familiar with the recent history of the Minneapolis labor movement, and because it is highly unusual for an international union to reinstate an "outlaw" local on honorable terms, you will be interested to hear that General Drivers' Local 574, after an independent existence of fifteen months, has been taken back into Daniel Tobin's International Teamsters' Union.

On July 15 the Northwest Organizer, weekly organ of 574, announced that, after a three weeks' period of friendly discussion, an agreement has been reached whereby the local Truck Drivers' Unions have been united by the return of the full membership of General Drivers 574 into the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and the American Federation of Labor . . . Under the new arrangements there will be only one General Drivers' Union which will function through a new International charter to be issued under a new number.

Details of the agreement were worked out through further negotiations. The officers of the new local will consist of three from former Local 574, and three International officials from the Chicago district. All of 574's organizers are to be retained; the new union is to be part of the Teamsters' Joint Council; and the semi-industrial structure of the union is to be preserved for at least one year. The Northwest Organizer is to continue publication under the editorship of Miles Dunne.

If one compares this agreement with the ultimatum laid down by Tobin in April, 1935 (which would have split the union up into six or seven sections and barred all officers and active members), one realizes that the new agreement is a tribute to the power of 574, and an index of the relationship of forces in Minneapolis. That the united Teamsters' Council is going to be a formidable weapon against the employers is shown by the fact that two notorious open-shop dairy companies have been brought to their knees during the past week with short, effective strikes. A campaign has already been initiated to organize every driver in the Northwest. Though local bankers and employers maintain that the new labor set-up is "twice as bad as before," friends of labor will rejoice in this union of forces which climaxes two years of turmoil and strike in the ranks of the workers in Minneapolis. One of these days, if you hear that Local 544 is going to town, remember that it carries on where 574 left off.

WHO SHALL GOVERN SPAIN?

Dear Sirs: Your editorial, Drunken Dictators, in your issue of August 8, strikes a splendid note in these trying days. One of your sentences struck me particularly. Speaking of the French government, you say: "It is a centrist government at a time in history when the center is a vacuum, and it is afraid to move lest it be sucked into the void." The way to fight the fascists is to fight the fascists.

In these critical hours the left seems to think it is defeating the fascists by the distribution of handbills, much talk about "Down with Franco, Hitler, Mussolini," and the hurling of devastating epithets. While the left talks the right moves into action. Your editorial calls for the sorely needed counter-action.

But please permit me to remind you that it says little of the present government in Spain. Yes, the Spanish working class is heroic, valiant, and advanced—but what does it stand to gain? Undoubtedly the defeat of Spanish reaction would be a significant victory. But what of allowing the establishment of a working-class state? How do you characterize the present regime? Isn't it really centrist? Hasn't it armed the workers only because it had to summon all forces ready to defend it against the onslaughts of the right? Now, what to do with this monster which it has created? The regime is on the defensive; the proletariat is on the offensive. Where will the centrists stand when the Francos and the Molas have been annihilated?

My point is that you place too much emphasis upon the defense of democracy per se, without full realization that the maintenance of such a democracy will not do away with the Francos, the Molas, the Villanuevas who are to be. My feeling is that only an iron dictatorship of the working class can guarantee the annihilation of the barbarism of the past.

WILLIAM COOPER

New York, August 9

[We are in agreement with our correspondent concerning the nature of the Spanish government—before the present rebellion. It has since been steadily pushed to the left. All reliable commentators agree that a loyalist victory will leave the Spanish workers in a position of great power. In that case we may expect the emergence of a much more radical government than the old republican regime.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

FROM FATHER DIVINE'S KINGDOM

Dear Sirs: I write to call to your attention a practice I have remarked in your pages which is not in accordance with the principles of social justice which The Nation has so courageously championed.

I know that race segregation is an evil which you have opposed as one of the darkest spots on the American scene, and for that reason I feel sure you will give due consideration to this question of using words, or terms, in referring to certain groups of people which tend to nourish this seed of segregation, not only in the minds of the ignorant but in many supposedly enlightened places in this country.

You would not use an article that referred to Huns, Frogs, Dagos, or Kikes. Recently I was even corrected by a little boy returning from school for speaking of a Chinaman. "You must say 'Chinese,'" he said, "They don't like to be called 'Chinamen.'" So it is with the word Negro which you are using in The Nation. This term originated in a desire on the part of people to belittle and exploit a whole group of other people. It has no geographical significance, and should, like the word Jew, be dropped from the vocabulary of everyone who believes wholeheartedly in the brotherhood of man.

It is through the teaching of Father Divine that I have come to realize how far-reaching race prejudice is, and how utterly destructive it is to the human race. So emphatic is Father Divine on this whole question that we, who call ourselves his followers, will no longer encourage by our patronage any paper or periodical that uses these prejudicial terms.

I sincerely hope that the editors of The Nation will recognize the validity of dropping from its pages these segregating terms, as I should be sorry to be obliged to discontinue my subscription, and I know that many others, especially those who are active on Father Divine's Righteous Government, would miss such a reliable source of truthful information.

THE CONCERNS WHOSE BUSINESS IT IS TO SPY on workers for their employers are a tough lot, as the disreputable nature of their trade demands. Therefore it is not surprising that the La Follette committee has already had to cite for contumacy the officials of the Railway Audit and Inspection Company, one of our busier purveyors of spies and strike-breakers to industrial concerns. Not only did these officials refuse to obey the committee's summons to appear before it, but they destroyed a lot of damaging correspondence—a move which the committee's investigators checkmated by keeping a watchful eye on the company's wastebaskets. The president of this concern, W. W. Groves, will be remembered by readers of Frank Hanighen's article in our issue of August 22 as a member of the board of Federal Laboratories, Inc., a company which supplies munitions to industrialists bent upon keeping their workers "contented" by means of guns and tear gas. Since a number of our richest companies employ this method, Mr. Groves, in his dual capacity, is well situated to sell more and more tear gas and machine-guns by stirring up more and more discontent among the workers through his spies and provocateurs. His company is presumably well able to fight the law which empowered the committee to cite its officials for contempt. They will no doubt do so, since because of a delay due to a technical error in the labeling of the bill it was not finally signed by the President until July 13, more than ten days after Congress adjourned, and its validity is therefore open to question.

THE AMERICAN PUBLIC WAS TREATED TO A fine first-hand demonstration of German fascist methods the other day when officers and men of the steamship Bremen brutally beat up a group of Communists protesting against German support of Spanish fascism. And we record with chagrin that the New York police, who have themselves rather specialized in brutality against Communists in time past, didn't even seem to resent the competition. They arrested the injured demonstrators and allowed their torturers to sail away to the Führerland with their right to assault American citizens unchallenged. With even greater chagrin we note the silence of the Mayor of New York. It seems to us about time he served notice on the German government and his own police department that New York has a government empowered and able to deal in an orderly way with any breach of the peace, either real or alleged, and that private vengeance against offenders will not be tolerated. We would be in favor of a few arrests when the Bremen comes into port again. They would undoubtedly cause another "international incident." But that might take the Führer's mind off Spain.

DEATH FOR SIXTEEN BY THE FIRING SQUAD does not smell any the sweeter for being called, as the Soviet Judge Ulrich called it, "the highest form of social defense—shooting." It would be easy to construct a complete defense of the Soviet executions; easy, also, by putting the pieces together rather differently, to construct just as complete an indictment of the regime. But, beyond judgment, the deaths and the plot will go down in history as part of the world's iron age, and must be approached in an iron mood. Much of what happened at the trial belonged peculiarly to Russia and to a revolutionary psychology. The confessions might in their hysteria and their masochism have come out of the Russia of "The Brothers Karamazov," but in their final yielding to the discipline and purposes of the party they could only have come out of a revolutionary Russia. But the broader logic was international. Mussolini is building an empire; Hitler is off on a mad armaments race and is mending his alliances; Japan is tightening in on China and Russia; the new workers' energies in Spain and France have stirred the latent class tensions in all Europe. Russia feels it must gird itself for the most crucial struggle in its life—a struggle whose terrible and unyielding quality is presaged by the Spanish events. For such a struggle it must be unified, with every opposition stamped out and every national energy whipped up. The civil-war psychology is by no means at an end. It has now become part of the general European fabric.

IF WE HAD THE EAR OF THE LEFT GROUPS which now control the Spanish government, we should talk ourselves hoarse about the advisability of liberating Morocco. A daily announcement from the Madrid radio station that Morocco was free would probably give the fascists there other things to do than recruit soldiers to fight the Spanish people. And if losing Morocco would help to save Spain its liberation might be a good bit of political strategy.

THOMAS LAMONT RAISED MORE QUESTIONS than he settled in the remarkable statement he gave the press on his return from Europe. A Morgan statement on foreign affairs is so much a rarity that even the recent stock-market drop would not account for the note of optimism Mr. Lamont found it necessary to strike. The burden of his talk was that we need not fear a general European war because "Germany is determined to keep away from serious trouble with Great Britain and France."

Mr. Lamont said that his "impressions" had been gathered after talks with persons in France and England. Anyone familiar with the position of the Morgan company in international finance would conclude that these persons included such men as Montagu Norman of the Bank of England, Charles Rist of the Bank of France, and some of the best-informed political leaders, and that the statement was made with their knowledge. Mr. Lamont mentioned not a word of the German intentions in the East or of the Franco-Soviet alliance. Does he mean to convey the impression that a war between Germany and Russia could be localized? Does his statement mean that the French financial interests are determined to scrap the Russian pact at the first chance and are already treating it as non-existent? France would give up the pact only at a price. Does Mr. Lamont's statement indicate that England, Germany, and France are looking to an agreement guaranteeing the frontier that would make the Franco-Soviet pact unnecessary?

AS IF TO GIVE SPICE TO MR. LAMONT'S comments, Hitler has announced that the term of compulsory military service in the Reich will be extended to two years. In order to leave no doubt as to the object of this move, the German papers have been filled during the past week with violent attacks on the Soviet Union. The forthcoming Nazi party congress at Nürnberg on September 8 is to be devoted primarily to a discussion of the growing menace of communism. That Germany has no illusions about localizing a Russo-German war was indicated, however, by the conference at Berchtesgaden between Hitler and Admiral Horthy in which the latter apparently agreed to undertake the task of forming an anti-Soviet front among the Central European dictatorships, notably Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Italy. It is reported that England is undisturbed by the sudden increase in the German army. But what of France? Our guess is that the French people will demand a strengthening rather than a weakening of the Soviet pact in view of the Reich's latest bid for European supremacy.

A CORRESPONDENT WRITES US FROM LONDON that since the new budget, with its demand for huge unstated amounts for defense, was announced, militaristic propaganda has become widespread. In the movie theaters each performance ends with a series of shots of detachments of various branches of the army and navy. A rash of recruiting posters has broken out on walls and hoardings, especially in the so-called "distressed areas," and the Minister for Defense has broadly hinted that young men on the dole will do well to enlist before they are faced with the choice of joining up or losing their unemployment benefits. In London the Albert Hall, let to the fascists for their big rally, was refused to the League of Women against War and Fascism for a peace meeting. An organization of women teachers which passed resolutions against war was warned by the Minister of Education from his seat in the House of Commons that its action would militate against his further consideration of any of its recommendations or requests. The appointment of a new Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford University has been attacked in a reputable daily paper on the ground, among others, that he did not fight in the Great War. Nothing, apparently, is to be allowed to stand in the way of preparation for the next War to Make the World Safe for Democracy—and the British Empire.

TEXAS HAS BEEN CELEBRATING ITS BIRTHDAY in fine style. First it gave Maury Maverick a victory in the primaries and now in the run-offs it has sent Tom Blanton, for twenty years prime diehard, red-baiter, and bully of the House, down to defeat. "Happy in the thought" that he can now take a vacation and devote the rest of his life to his family, the ex-Representative says he accepts the result with a "genuine feeling of relief and satisfaction." Mr. Blanton, you took the words right out of our mouth.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION OF THE American Federation of Teachers was significant as a demonstration of the awakening of the "white-collar" groups. In contrast with last year, when a vigorous effort was made to oust the New York local on grounds of "communism," there were no sharp divisions of policy. The convention adopted a strongly worded resolution criticizing the executive council of the A. F. of L. for its action in requesting the expulsion of the New York chapter, and used even stronger language in denouncing the suspension of John L. Lewis and the C. I. O. unions. With a view to preserving the unity of the labor movement if at all possible, it did not formally vote for adherence to the C. I. O., although it turned down a resolution which would have prevented such action. The teachers were unanimous in voting to boycott Hearst, and practically so in opposing his candidate for the Presidency—Alf M. Landon. In a magnificent gesture of labor solidarity they voted $5,000 for the Spanish Workers' Red Cross and Relief Association. No better bulwark against fascism could exist in this country than a militant, powerful organization of teachers.

THE FAMOUS VERMONT MARBLE STRIKE ended July 25 with an almost complete defeat for the workers. The following item is submitted as an epitaph to a gallant fight: Some time during the past twelve months there occurred in the Marble Savings Bank of Rutland an embezzlement of a quarter of a million dollars. The embezzlement was kept secret until very recently when prosecution of a suspected employee was begun. No replacement of funds has been made. By keeping the crime a secret even for a week, the president of the bank, however pure his motives, laid himself open to legal charges; he also laid himself open to blackmail by unscrupulous persons who might know the secret. We now proceed to the two main points of this little tale. One of the most powerful trustees of the Marble Savings Bank is a vice-president of the Vermont Marble Company, against which the strike was waged. The president of the bank is Charles M. Smith, Governor of Vermont, who at any time in the course of the strike could have ended it with a victory for the literally starving workers of a whole community by invoking a state law which empowers the Governor to investigate on his own authority any controversy that in his opinion "seriously affects or threatens seriously to affect the public welfare."

FOOTNOTE TO OUR RECENT EDITORIAL ON Moe Annenberg: A week after he took charge of the Philadelphia Inquirer, it printed, in its August 16 issue, a long editorial extolling Hearst. "The people of America found in Hearst a leader. . . . Today William Randolph Hearst stands triumphant." Thus the invisible Hearst standing behind Moe Annenberg praised the visible Hearst whose employees on the Seattle Post-Intelligencer had just gone out on a very visible strike. Incidentally the Hearst papers of August 20 reprinted the whole editorial.

A CIVIL WAR IN MINIATURE IS GOING ON IN the Spanish embassy to the Holy See in Rome. Señor Zulueta, the ambassador, is a Loyalist while his counselor and first secretary are rebel sympathizers. All three live in the embassy apartments but are remaining in a state of siege behind locked doors, each one fearing that if he pokes his head out, his opponent will be waiting with a gun. Rome regards the situation as of a highly explosive nature and has the embassy guarded night and day by a cordon of carabinieri, plain-clothes detectives, and policemen in motor cars. . . . We now have the real story of the evacuation of Barcelona, in which a magnificent exhibition of bravery under fire was given by the foreigners. It seems that the British consul was absent, reconnoitering in another city, but the French consul chartered a fleet of char-à-bancs and amid a cloud of Latin gesticulation bore his comrades over the border. The British residents, not to be hurried in the hysteria of the moment, waited in stoic fortitude for the return of their consul. He took in the situation at a glance and with empire-building calm, in the hour of need, proclaimed Evacuation by Battleship. But the nationals of the smaller countries, who had no consuls, went for help to the local Spanish authorities, and being told that the trains were running normally, packed their bags and departed in comfort.

WHILE THE SUPREME COURT RESTS, THE American Bar Association is pinch-hitting. In a report to its annual convention in Boston it declares the Social Security Act unconstitutional. As the session progresses the bar will doubtless continue in necrophilic glee to play the role of judicial guillotine and lop off more New Deal heads, but pending a final report we shall make no comment. Meanwhile, next door at Cambridge, Dean Pound charged into the constitutional issue and tried to set the tone of the Harvard Law School's international conference on common law by prophesying doom as the result of the Administration's "restiveness" under judicial review. But Justice Stone and, unexpectedly, Chief Judge Frederick Crane of the New York State Court of Appeals, whose words are hard to reconcile with the spirit of his decision invalidating the minimum-wage law, refused to take their cue from Dean Pound. Scraping off the accumulation of fears and status quo stubbornness, they revealed law in its true form as a factor for progress not atrophy. Law cannot bury its head in the dry-as-dust past of stare decisis, but to serve its end—"the adequate control and protection of social and economic interests"—must accommodate itself to "changing economic and social needs" (Justice Stone); must "meet new situations and conditions with new remedies" (Judge Crane). Here is the attitude law must take if it is to be a help, not a hindrance, to the country. If the last three years mean anything in our history it will be because of governmental efforts through national legislation to bring order out of the chaos of individualism. This process must be continued. That can only be done if we are willing to unfreeze the Constitution and adapt it to a new social order.

Civil War and Intervention

GERMANY'S and Italy's acceptance of the French neutrality proposals has materially reduced the danger that the Spanish civil war might prove the spark to start a general European war. Portugal also having accepted, the last barrier has been removed to a general European pact of non-interference which would forbid the shipment of arms, ammunition, airplanes, or other war material to either side in the Spanish conflict. With Madrid willing to make amends for the Kamerun incident, and the prospect of an early settlement of the controversy arising out of the seizure of a German commercial plane, the immediate causes of friction have been removed. The international atmosphere at the beginning of the week contrasts markedly with that prevailing a few days earlier, when Italy was reported to be massing its airplanes for active intervention on the side of the rebels and the German press had flown into a paroxysm of rage against the "Communists." War may yet break out as a result of the fundamental conflict of policy over the Spanish situation, but the sudden moderation in the attitude of the fascist powers suggests that they are not wholly prepared for an immediate conflict.

Encouraging though this turn of events may be as contrasted with the sword-rattling of a few days ago, the situation does not merit unqualified optimism. There is grave danger that the neutrality pact will be a wholly one-sided document. When France and Great Britain pledge themselves not to permit the export of any war materials to the Spanish government, the world has every assurance that that agreement will be kept. Can anyone say the same of Germany and Italy—both of which are at present up to their necks in illegal trade? On August 11 twenty German bombing planes and five pursuit planes were delivered to the rebels at Seville. The Kamerun was reported to be carrying contraband gasoline. The six Italian planes sent to the rebels in the early days of the conflict have been definitely proved to be military planes manned by active army officers. International law is unequivocal on this point. Any act of assistance to a force in rebellion against the duly constituted government of a country is wholly illegal and a flagrant breach of the League Covenant. The fascist powers cannot even claim, as Britain unsuccessfully tried to maintain in the Alabama case, that the insurgents are entitled to equal belligerent rights because the country is equally divided. The rebels have no political organization behind them and little popular support. The government, on the other hand, has an unassailable constitutional status. It was returned to office only six months ago by an unprecedented electoral majority, and has been scrupulous, some say too scrupulous, in the formalities of constitutional rule.

From l'Humanité

The situation of the democratic states of Europe today is not unlike that of the Spanish Popular Front government in mid-July. They know that the enemy is armed to the teeth, that it has no respect for either legal or ethical considerations, but they hesitate to take a positive stand, even in self-defense, lest the opposition be provoked into war. As shown in Mr. Stewart's article elsewhere in this issue, the timidity and superlegality of the Spanish government were, in the last analysis, largely responsible for the civil war. Similarly, there is every reason to fear that the excessive caution—or cowardice—of the French and British governments is an open invitation to the fascist powers to attack when they think the time opportune. Meanwhile, Hitler and Mussolini stand ready to gamble against odds in the hope of having a reactionary Spain to support them in the ultimate conflict.

It is scarcely an overstatement to say that France's very existence as a democratic state depends on the success of the Popular Front government in Spain. A fascist victory would not only give heart to the De la Rocques and Dorjots, but would surround the country with fascist and potential enemy states. In such an eventuality, it is doubtful whether the Soviet or even a British alliance could save France from the terror of another war fought on its own soil. It is almost incredible, therefore, that the entire French right should have thrown its support to the Spanish rebels. Even in England all the reactionary papers are openly pro-insurgent, though they must realize that a fascist Spain would mark the end of Britain's domination of the Mediterranean and possibly the dissolution of the empire. That the extreme right, which has hitherto considered loyalty to country as its exclusive possession, should adopt a policy toward Spain which is clearly inconsistent with the national welfare is one of the most remarkable paradoxes of our time. It shows that despite the rapid growth of nationalism in recent years, class interest has definitely come to transcend national interest, not among the radicals, but among those who have been most fervid in the profession of patriotism.

The United States is in a different position from the other democracies only because of its distance from the scene. While the success of the Spanish rebels would not immediately affect our national interest, who can say that the triumph of fascism in Europe would not intimately affect the life of every American? Thus in a very real sense the Spanish workers are battling for American liberties at the same time that they struggle for their own. Interference in the affairs of another nation can bring only woe, but it is at least possible to avoid a policy which plays into the hands of the anti-democratic forces. In warning American shipping lines not to carry arms to Spain, the Administration is making precisely the same error as England and France. Under international law, trade with an established government menaced by rebellion is not only permitted but expected in the interests of law and order. There have been occasions when this principle has been subject to grave abuse. It has been widely applied in the Caribbean, for example, to bolster the power of a Washington-chosen puppet who had not the least popular support. Such abuses deserve the sharpest condemnation, but they furnish no reason for leaning over backward and applying a biased neutrality which would clearly work to the advantage of the foes of democracy. Neutrality would be of little avail in a world dominated by fascist doctrines.

Hamilton, Desert Maker

SPEAKING in Albuquerque, John D. M. Hamilton told the stockmen that the new Triple-A, through its soil-conservation provisions and its efforts to put eroding slopes to grass, "is paying every farmer of this nation to go into competition with the cattle and sheep men of the great grazing states of the West." If there were horsemen also present they must have known how to laugh.

For Albuquerque is witness to the swiftest process of desert making in all history. From the Mexican border to the Canadian, from central Nebraska and Kansas to the Pacific Coast, America has three-quarters of a billion acres of grass lands, most of it rather thin, but in its original state capable of carrying 22,500,000 animal units. (The animal unit is one cow or horse, or five sheep or goats.) According to a detailed and comprehensive "Report on the Western Range" submitted by the Secretary of Agriculture (Government Printing Office, Washington, 1936), these grazing lands are now capable of carrying only 10,800,000 animal units without causing further depletion. The range is, however, still trying to carry 17,300,000 animal units and depletion is going on apace. It does not have far to go. One-sixth of the range has already lost from 76 per cent to 100 per cent of its carrying capacity; another sixth has been depleted only moderately, under 25 per cent. The other two-thirds is about equally divided between "severe depletion," 51 to 75 per cent, and "material depletion," 26 to 50 per cent. Thus one of the great natural resources of America is plunging toward destruction. A third of the area of the United States, once known erroneously as the "Great American Desert," will soon be properly so described. Hamilton, egregious lover of desert and desert making, is afraid that America will come to its senses and take off the present destructive excess of six and a half million animal units and scatter them over the humid-land farms, where their function would be to rebuild instead of to destroy. This policy he describes with unconscious humor as "scarcity planning."

No community can fairly be judged by the odor of its garbage pickers, nor any party by the words of its campaign manager. But it is time for Landon to say what he means to do about soil conservation, and particularly about the depletion of our grazing lands.

A considerable fraction of these lands has been ruined past repair. The nutritious native grasses, adapted through millions of years to meet the condition of ever-recurring droughts, have been extirpated, and the top soil has blown away, exposing hardpan or rock. In the end nature will no doubt restore even these hopeless tracts. Lichens and cacti will take hold and catch a bit of flying dust; wiry grasses and desert shrubs will pry their roots into the forbidding subsoil. In a hundred years the land may maintain a few grasshoppers per acre; in a thousand years, a jack rabbit. After a millennium or two limited grazing will again be possible. Pessimists treat the wastes of northeastern China and of central Asia, ruined by excessive grazing a thousand years ago, as if they could never recover. They fail to think in terms of ten thousand years, as Hamilton apparently does, if he thinks at all.

But on the greater part of our range the native grasses, though hard pressed, still manage to survive. The top soil, though thinning under wind and water erosion, is still worth saving. By fifty years of moderate grazing we could restore these lands to a condition not seriously inferior to that of fifty years ago. We shall not, however, restore them through the rugged individualism that pulled them down, or by Mr. Hamilton's planning for millennia of scarcity.

Much is being said in this campaign about the absurd inventions of the Brain Trust. Lucky for them that it was the Brainless Trust that invented our ruinous grazing-land policy.

The Landon Invasion

THE Landon invasion, so far, has not been exactly a triumphal march. Between La Salle, Colorado, and West Middlesex, Pennsylvania, the Republican candidate demanded the American way of government, denounced the present Administration's extravagance in its agricultural and relief policies, advocated more tariff protection for the beet-sugar industry, praised one of our less inspiring Presidents, McKinley, called for common sense, and said that the drought should be kept out of politics. At West Middlesex he came out for the home, local government, and Crawford County maple syrup. What was worse from the Republican point of view, he admitted that there was a "lack of balance in our economic structure" and that relief must be continued as long as the need for it exists. Wall Street reports that the "tide against the New Deal is ebbing unmistakably at the moment." Mr. Landon, by his first major speech, did nothing to slow it up. As for his pilgrimage to the old home, it has been made once too often, and our frontier blood is unroused by the news that "it was from Mercer County, Pennsylvania, that John M. Landon, father of the Governor, took his family to Independence, Kansas, to pioneer in the independent oil business." The wildcats Dan'l Boone met with were not oil speculators.

Governor Landon's second speech, at Chautauqua, New York, was again devoted to generalities. They happened to be important ones. His broad declaration of faith in the freedom of the press, education, and the radio, and in particular his specific criticism of teachers' oaths exceeded anything the President has said in that line. But again the question arises whether Landon is strengthening his case with those conservative groups which are his only hope of winning the election. The average conservative gives loud lip-service to freedom, but he has a strong conviction that something should be done about teachers who talk about "isms" in their classes. The Chautauqua speech illustrates the Landon dilemma. Perhaps that is why he has avoided specific application of his general statements. But if he persists in confining himself to generalizations, he is in danger of encroaching on liberal territory which Mr. Roosevelt is in a much better position to defend.

The skill with which that defense is being conducted is obviously troubling Mr. Landon. We do not know just how dry it is in Kansas, agriculturally speaking. We do know that the entire state has had a soaking political shower. While Governor Landon was on his way to Pennsylvania to demonstrate his fitness for the Presidency by proving that he was born if not in a log cabin at least in a doubtful state, every county in Kansas was officially put in the area to be given drought relief. No wonder Mr. Landon is insisting that the drought belongs to no party and should be kept out of politics. We doubt that he was reassured by the President's statement that no politics are involved in his tour of the drought area. Mr. Roosevelt will appear, presumably, only in the role of savior. We await Mr. Landon's Buffalo appearance.

Floyd Olson: Forerunner

AT FORTY-FOUR Floyd Olson still had an exciting stretch of life ahead of him. He was serving the third term of a brilliant career as Minnesota's governor; he was almost certain to be elected in November to the United States Senate; he was easily one of the two or three logical choices for the leadership of a labor party when it emerges in 1940 as a contender for national power. If ever a man seemed to have, to use Mr. Roosevelt's phrase, a rendezvous with destiny it was Floyd Olson.

His whole life was one of those recurring miracles that have not yet vanished from America even in an era of financial concentration and lessened social mobility—the career open to talent. His father was a freight-loader and lumberjack, his mother a domestic servant; both of them were immigrants. Floyd Olson spent his boyhood in the Minneapolis slums. He went to high school and later studied law, but his real education came in the interval between these two formal schoolings. In that interval he was lumberjack, longshoreman, miner; he was a "wobbly" in the heyday of the I. W. W., and he learned his radical doctrine straight from men like himself—big, hulking men who did the work of the world and were proud to call themselves the workers of the world. It was in these years that he got his amazing capacity to understand and handle men and his even rarer belief in the common man's capacities.

He was a genuine democrat, with a small d. He believed in people, knew how to lead them, knew how to build a political organization on their aspirations and their energies. There is much to say about his career as governor—about his resourceful legislative record; his novel use of the militia not to beat up strikers but to protect their civil liberties; his program for relief, social security, and social taxation. But in the end it all sums up to a hard-headed and pragmatic radicalism. Olson came, like Thorstein Veblen, out of the Norwegian Northwest. He had behind him the same Populist tradition, the same stubborn belief in the social group, the same rootedness in the regional soil. He had also the hard-bitten American quality of working within the limits of his medium. He knew how to play the game in politics; he knew how to build his own machine, how to outsmart the smartest of the boys, how to beat them at their own tricks. But he was not merely another machine politician. When he announced in 1934, after his third victory for the governorship, "You bet your life I'm radical. You might say I'm radical as hell," he was casting his lot with those who believe that American democracy can flourish best only under a recasting of our economic set-up. In the mixture of that belief and his native shrewdness lay Olson's strength and his appeal.

And there too will lie the strength and appeal on which independent labor action in politics must be built in the next four years. Olson the governor is dead. Olson the forerunner will have a place in American political history.

The Whole Mooney Case

BY MIRIAM ALLEN deFORD

San Francisco, August 22

IN 1935 John F. Finerty, an eminent attorney who had been de Valera's American legal representative, appeared before the Supreme Court of the United States and applied for a writ of habeas corpus for Tom Mooney, on the ground that his conviction was a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. The writ was denied on the objection that Mooney had not exhausted the resources of the California courts. Three lawyers, working without fee at their own expense, then proceeded to take the indicated action. They were Finerty, who had been interested in the case since 1933; the veteran Frank P. Walsh, one of the outstanding liberals of the American bar, who had been Mooney's counsel for many years; and a brilliant young San Francisco attorney, George T. Davis. They applied first to the Superior Court of Marin County, in which San Quentin is located, and were denied a writ without even a hearing. They appealed to the Appellate Court, and received a two-to-one denial. There was then left the state Supreme Court.

In July, 1935, the California Supreme Court appointed ■ referee an obscure attorney, a classmate of the chief justice, who had never before taken part in a criminal case. The attorneys and the referee went first to Baltimore to take the testimony of John MacDonald, one of the two principal frame-up witnesses, who had long ago recanted and now, a wreck in a wheel chair, was barely able to testify. They went next to Grayville, Illinois, to interview F. E. Rigall, the small-town gambler who was sent for as ■ corroborating witness by "the honest cattleman" Frank C. Oxman, the other chief perjurer besides MacDonald, and who, when he arrived in San Francisco, got cold feet and refused to appear on the stand. Rigall, paralyzed and speechless—he has since died—was beyond their questioning. Mooney's lawyers and the representative of the respondent (the state), Assistant Attorney William F. Cleary, then returned to San Francisco, and in September, 1935, the actual hearings were begun before the referee, Addison E. Shaw. The sessions were expected to last a month. They took over a year, with 135 actual court days. The transcript runs to 15,000 pages. At first there was a love feast. Cleary, a huge, unwieldy figure who gave the impression of being towed around by his sharp little assistant, Emory Mitchell, announced that for once Mooney was going to have a fair hearing. (His father was ■ famous labor attorney, and Cleary calls himself a "liberal.") The love feast did not last long. By the end of the hearings there were sharp passages and constant warfare, with Referee Shaw openly siding with Cleary and Mitchell.

After some preliminary wrangling Warren Billings was brought down from Folsom, lodged with Mooney in the San Francisco county jail, and allowed to attend the sessions. (Because he is a recidivist, by California law no action can be taken on his case without concurrence of the entire Supreme Court.) It was a dramatic moment, the first time Mooney and Billings had met since the day before the explosion, twenty years ago. Later, in the courtroom, all five of the original Preparedness Day defendants took the witness stand in turn, and retold their story—Mooney, Billings, Rena Mooney, Weinberg, and Nolan. Nolan came from Los Angeles, Weinberg from Cleveland.

It became evident early in the proceedings that the most important matter in these hearings was going to be not the case itself but its background. Tom Mooney was not simply picked out at random to be the victim of a frame-up in the hysterical days preceding America's entry into the World War. He was framed because he was a militant, left-wing labor leader, because he had bucked the big corporations which held San Francisco and California in their grip—particularly the Pacific Gas and Electric Company and the United Railroads, now the Market Street Railway Company. And between these corporations and the conservative union officials of San Francisco there had existed an unholy alliance, a pact which traded support for the Union Labor Party in exchange for hands off in organizing the corporations' employees. Charles M. Fickert, the man most responsible for the framing of Mooney and his young coworker, Billings, ■ actually elected district attorney in 1909 on that Union Labor Party ticket, with the understanding that he would help to dismiss the remaining indictments against the defendants in the San Francisco graft prosecutions of 1907.

Therefore the story of the electrical workers' "outlaw" strike of 1913, the unsuccessful attempt to frame Mooney in Martinez on account of ■ small arsenal of weapons planted in his open boat while he and his companions had left it unguarded, the successful framing of Billings in Sacramento on a charge of carrying dynamite, the abortive street-car strike of June, 1916—these issues worked their way to the forefront of the proceedings, and at times almost obscured the story of the actual Preparedness Day case itself. On the excuse of displaying the "frame of mind" of the prosecution, both Fickert—now a pitiful physical wreck—and Edward Cunha, his assistant, who actually prosecuted the original trial of Mooney, were permitted to deliver vicious, excited harangues by the hour. They were allowed to call Mooney a madman, a murderer, a professional dynamiter. Similar outbursts were tolerated by the referee from James F. Brennan, who prosecuted Billings, and from Charles Goff, in 1916 head of the "Bomb Bureau" and now head of the San Francisco traffic squad. It became more important to know why Mooney had solicited subscriptions for Alexander Berkman's Anarchist paper, the Blast, than to account for the proved perjury of the gang of wastrels, morons, and criminals who had been the prosecution's witnesses in 1917.

In the face of all this, Mooney and his lawyers patiently and slowly built up a mass of ordered evidence that constituted the first full presentation in open court of the entire case. For more than a month they dug in the basement of the Hall of Justice and in the Attorney General's office, and brought forth over a thousand documents hitherto suppressed or hidden, some of them of vital importance. They brought to the stand scores of witnesses—some who had appeared many times before, some newly ferreted out and induced to come forward and testify after twenty years—through whose stories, against all the opposition of the respondent's attorneys and the referee, there gradually became visible a coherent record of monstrous injustice. Let me describe very briefly the evidence given by George Miller, George Grimmer, and Draper Hand.

Miller used to be a special policeman for the Southern Pacific Railroad. In 1917 he hired 150 scabs for the second United Railroads strike. In 1919 Miller, out of a job, decided that the grateful United Railroads ought to get him one. They did—two, indeed, running concurrently, one as conductor and one as spy on the other workers. Once a month he had to report his findings as a spy to Melnott McCants (now dead), assistant general manager. One day, somehow, Mooney's name came into the conversation.

"Miller," said McCants, "Mooney and Billings are going to remain in prison as long as the United Railroads can keep them there. We know they're not guilty, but they're agitators, and their kind of agitation cost us a million dollars in that strike."

Grimmer's story was pure melodrama. He had had a long career as a labor spy for street-car companies all over the United States. His experience with the United Railroads began in 1906, when President Patrick Calhoun, chief defendant in the San Francisco graft prosecutions, hired him to join the union and "holler strike from the housetops," so that the company could "force a strike and lick hell out of them."

Ten years later Grimmer was in San Francisco again, and jobless. The new president of the United Railroads, Jesse W. Lilienthal, sent him to this same McCants who had been so indiscreet with Miller. "We can use you," McCants said; "We've got a number of no-good men in this city whom we want to run out of the state or across the bay" (to San Quentin). He named Mooney as one of the "no-good men" and assigned Grimmer to shadow him. After a while Grimmer grew nervous. He went back to McCants and said, "Are you going to frame him?" "Of course not," answered McCants sarcastically. "Nobody likes to hear the word 'frame.' We just want you to be at the same place Mooney is, at the same time, if anything happens." Grimmer was scared; he threw up the assignment and McCants told him to get out. On the day of the explosion Grimmer heard the blast while he was riding in a street car, and at the end of the line he remarked to an inspector, "I guess that's going to be pinned on Mooney." A week later three strange men came up to him.

One of them said, "You've been throwing up your guts about this case. The best thing you can do is to beat it."

Grimmer decamped to Los Angeles, where, in proof of the adage that virtue is its own reward, he rose to be president of the civil-service commission. In 1920, in Los Angeles, he met Joe Daugherty, a half-breed Indian who had been a strike-breaker in the 1907 United Railroads strike and had boasted about shooting two men and being able to "crawfish out of it." Daugherty had dinner with Grimmer, and Grimmer noticed how nervous he was. "Well," said Daugherty, "I might be shot or stabbed at any minute." He wouldn't say why. After a while Grimmer got on to the Mooney case. "Who do you think pulled that stunt at Steuart and Market streets?" he asked. "Mooney?" "Naw, that ——— wouldn't have the guts," Daugherty answered. "He had absolutely nothing to do with it. I could put my hand on the man's shoulder that did it." And he placed his hand on his own shoulder.

A few months later Daugherty's decapitated body was found in an alley in Chicago, with his head neatly placed on his chest. (Chicago dispatches confirmed this fact.)

The testimony of these two men was brilliantly climaxed by the appearance of Draper Hand. In 1916 Hand was a San Francisco policeman, one of the Bomb Bureau and extremely active in the frame-up. It was he, for example, who took Oxman to "identify" first Mooney and Billings and then Weinberg's jitney bus. He told how Oxman got into the car and trailed his hand over it to see if a man could hold a suitcase on the running-board. He told how Oxman suddenly turned to him and said, "Draper, do you think they'll know we're lying?" and how MacDonald threatened to "spill everything" if they didn't get him a job. He told of Mrs. Edeau's "identification" of Mooney, Billings, Weinberg, and Nolan, after he had called each one by name in her presence. He told how she changed her first story, of being at Steuart and Market, so that she could have been in front of 721 Market and seen "everything that Estelle Smith saw," and how he was ordered to destroy his first report of her evidence and make one out in consonance with her later story. And he told how he staged a demonstration having as actors the persons who had been on the roof of the Eilers building with the Mooneys all through the parade, and how at its conclusion Assistant District Attorney Brennan threw up his hands and cried, "We've got the wrong man!" (Brennan, of course, denied this later, but he acknowledged that the case had been a "nightmare" to him.)

Hand, who has fallen on evil days since he was discharged from the police force after he had confessed his part in the frame-up to Fremont Older, and who is now on probation on a grand-theft charge, obviously delighted in baiting the slow-thinking Cleary. Suave, sarcastic, and malicious, he spoke with the completely cynical frankness of a man who has already lost everything and no longer fears anything. But the most stirring moment of these long-drawn-out months of testimony came when Mooney himself spoke out of a full heart to refute Cunha's characterization of him as a savage lunatic bent on destruction.

"I am not a destroyer," he said, his voice ringing through the courtroom. "I am a creator, a social builder.

The aim and object of my whole life has been to build a new social order which would insure justice to the workers. I abhor violence; the thought of a person's being killed, in war or by capital punishment or otherwise, is repulsive and repugnant to my nature. But I have hated and fought injustice all my life, and that is why I am in prison today." Even Shaw, even Cleary, forbore to silence that voice.

In the very last days the Supreme Court hurled its own bomb into the proceedings. For a year, after appeals to clarify its orders, it had ruled that Shaw's function was merely that of certifying the record, as a sort of glorified notary public. Then all at once, in renewing his commission, it empowered him to make findings of fact, and to pass on the credibility of witnesses, concerning whom he had no authority to judge when they actually testified.

A vehement protest against this ruling and a plea that the court itself consider the record will be made by Mooney's counsel. But it is a final proof that Mooney can secure redress only by federal action. The Mooney case is still political dynamite in California.

Inside Spain

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

Madrid, August 13

GETTING into Spain proved to be a much more thrilling adventure than we had anticipated when we left New York in mid-July. We had planned a leisurely jaunt through the country with stops at Oviedo, Madrid, Seville, and Barcelona. It was somewhat of a shock, therefore, to learn at Paris that the frontier had been completely closed as a result of the fascist uprising.

For more than a week we fretted and fumed at various places in France, angered at what seemed to be the unreasonable obstinacy of the rebel chieftains. The dribble of news which reached us through the French press was exasperating. One day the government forces would seem to be in complete control of the situation; on the next the rebels would be reported to be about to capture Madrid. There were reports that the "Communists" had taken over the whole of Catalonia, and that the country had been plunged into a social revolution. In a desperate effort to obtain information, we visited the border at Hendaye, but were not able to get within 200 yards of the international bridge. We even tried to find a ship to Portugal, but were informed that the next sailing from Bordeaux was sometime in September. Finally, when it appeared as if we should have to return to New York without setting foot on Spanish soil, we discovered a brief line in a French paper to the effect that rail transportation in Catalonia had been restored to "near normal." Three hours later we were on a train bound for the French border station of Cerbere on the Mediterranean coast.

After ten days of misinformation in the French and British press, we were prepared for anything. We had read vivid stories of red terror, of food shortage, of the confiscation of private property, and of the necessity for obtaining permits for everything from street-cars rides to meals. The report that Barcelona was in the hands of the Communists recalled tales of conditions in Petrograd and Moscow after the October revolution. At best, we were fully prepared to spend much of our limited time unwinding red tape in order to obtain living quarters and meals. At worst, we feared we should not get in at all.

For there was still the unsolved problem of how to get across the border. Lacking an official journalist's card,

I had concocted a vague scheme for besieging the Spanish consulate at Cerbere, if such existed, for a letter which might get us past the frontier guards. On arriving at the border, we noticed that most of the Spaniards who had accompanied us on the train were setting out on foot toward the tunnel which lay between us and the Spanish city of Portbou. Strongly tempted to follow, I was restrained by the thought of carrying a hundred pounds of luggage through the mile-long tunnel with the possibility of having to carry it back again. As we stood on the platform, immobilized by uncertainty, a porter approached and muttered the magic word "passport." My wife, being relatively unencumbered, rushed to the passport office, and by the time I arrived I was greeted with the information that our passport had been stamped and that we were officially out of France. There was no longer any choice about the tunnel.

Having found a porter who would take part of our bags as far as the frontier post for twenty francs, we plunged into the darkness, spurred on by word that a train would be coming through from the other direction in about twenty minutes. We plodded through the murk, unsure of what we should find at the other end. There were many others in the tunnel, most of them behind us. Who were they? Friends or enemies? As we went deeper into the blackness the strangeness of our position grew upon us. Only the French porter was a known quantity, and who was he? The tension was broken at last—when from behind us, in Spanish, French, and German, came the strains of the "Internationale." The porter dropped our suitcases and raised his clenched fist.

When we finally emerged from the darkness we were stopped by a group of workers armed with shotguns and pistols. With some misgiving we watched our porter turn back. But to our surprise the guards made only the most casual examination of our papers and luggage. Then followed a long trek sans porter to the trade-union headquarters in Portbou. As if to confirm the reports that the Communists had taken over Catalonia, virtually all the passersby raised their fists in the Communist salute to members of our party.

At the trade-union headquarters we were treated with the utmost courtesy. But the officials were frankly skeptical. We had letters showing our connection with The Nation, but the only Nation they knew was a Buenos Aires journal which is distinctly conservative in policy. They were not satisfied with the assertion that the American Nation was usually considered left-wing, and asked whether it was left for the bosses or left for the workers. When assured that it was for the workers, there was a long consultation, finally resulting in our being handed two slips of paper which, when stamped, permitted us to buy tickets for Barcelona and to purchase a much-needed meal at the station restaurant.

After this introduction we were fully prepared to find life in Spain as regimented and chaotic as it had been in Russia in the early days of the Bolshevik regime. We envisioned spending at least twenty-four hours making the 100-mile trip to Barcelona. To our surprise the train pulled out on schedule and arrived in the Catalonian capital in just three hours and a quarter. Our first impressions of Barcelona carried out the illusion of a revolutionary situation. Baggage and documents were carefully examined by workers before we left the station platform.

The streets were crowded with armed men; all automobiles, street cars, and buses bore the initials of one or another of the great trade unions; the red flag flew proudly from several of the city's greatest hotels; barricades could still be seen at several of the main intersections, some of them still guarded by armed workers; the banks, theaters, and a few of the business houses were closed, while many of the larger stores carried signs indicating that their contents had been commandeered by the government. All churches except the cathedral had been destroyed, and their ruins in some instances were still smoldering.

Superficially Barcelona appeared much as Moscow or Petrograd must have appeared in the fall of 1917. But the similarity was largely external. Life moved about as usual. We encountered no difficulty in locating a pension; food supplies appeared to be virtually normal; street cars and buses moved regularly, though service was suspended at ten o'clock in the evening; prices were stationary, and we observed no sign of shortage in essential supplies.

Despite its proximity to the front, Madrid seems much more normal than Barcelona. Theaters are open; street-car and subway service is maintained until the early hours of the morning; armed men are much less in evidence, though each hotel and restaurant has to provide a definite number of free meals to trade-union men serving in the popular militia. Most of the churches have been untouched, though they are closed by government order. The number of temporary hospitals which have been set up and the ambulances scurrying through the streets bring the war much closer home than at Barcelona. For this reason, perhaps, we have been distinctly less conscious of the class struggle.

Contrasted with Paris, Berlin, or other non-Socialist capitals, however, Madrid bears a very proletarian aspect. The streets and theaters are thronged with robust workers. The editor of one of Spain's greatest newspapers wore overalls when he met us for tea at a sidewalk cafe. One of the foreign correspondents told me that the commander-in-chief of the army received the press similarly clad.

In view of these externals it is perhaps not surprising that the sensational and reactionary press of England and the United States should refer to the Madrid government rather indiscriminately as red, Socialist, Communist, and Anarchist. While the radical parties are not represented in the government, they are unquestionably powerful and command a high degree of sympathy from the middle and well-to-do classes. Here in Madrid as well as at Barcelona I have talked with men of all shades of political opinion — excluding, of course, the fascists, who are none too available at the moment—and I find no one, even among the government's own party, who is not bitter against the spineless, dilatory tactics of the Cabinet. Weeks before the uprising, rumors began to leak out of a pending fascist coup that would be headed by high military officers. True, such rumors had been heard in Spain almost continuously since 1931, but never before had the evidence been so complete and incontrovertible. It was widely known that Calvo Sotelo was being groomed as dictator of the proposed totalitarian state, and that General Franco was one of the chief conspirators. The exact date of the expected outbreak was not known, but it was generally believed that it would come no later than August or September. As more and more information regarding the plot accumulated, the leaders of the working-class organizations—

Socialists, Communists, Unified Marxists, and the trade unions—pleaded with the government to take action against the suspects and to strengthen its own defenses. The Republican leaders, notably Azaña, refused either to investigate the reports or to take the slightest precautions. Several of the rebel leaders who were under suspicion were named to positions of responsibility within a few weeks of the uprising.

Fortunately the working-class organizations were thoroughly aroused, and when Sotelo was assassinated in the early morning of July 12, they prepared for the inevitable blow. For several days before the outbreak workers crowded the Barcelona Rambla as early at five o'clock in the morning planning how to resist the coup. Both in Barcelona and Madrid the trade unions demanded that the government distribute arms, but the request was denied despite Prieto's prophetic speech of July 15. Finally, on Saturday evening, July 18, after the reports had come in of the rebellion in Morocco, the government agreed to arm the Madrid workers. About midnight of the same day the insurgents at the Montana barracks delivered an ultimatum calling upon the government to resign, and actual fighting broke out early the next morning. At Barcelona only a handful of the workers were armed when the fighting began, and most of these had obtained their weapons by storming a supply depot a few hours before the uprising.

Barricade in Spain

Even when confronted with the fact of the rebellion, President Azaña refused to believe that the generals were disloyal to the republic. In the hope that a slight change in governmental policy might conciliate the rebel leaders, he hastily called for the resignation of his relatively energetic Premier, Caesares Quiroga, and named the conservative Martínez Barrio in his stead. Barrio was in turn replaced a few hours later by José Giral, a mild-mannered scientist whose sincerity is above suspicion but who is wholly untried in high government office.

With the government virtually immobilized, the real power naturally fell to the only groups possessing an effective, vital organization—the trade unions and radical parties. While the power of the workers' organizations is by no means as complete in Madrid as in Barcelona, it cannot be denied that the government owes the fact that it still exists largely to the almost superhuman efforts of the Socialists, Communists, and members of the Union General de Trabajadores. When the Red Cross needs a new hospital or medical equipment, it appeals not to the government but to one or another of the Marxist parties.

The rebels have not been slow to seize upon this fact as proof of "red" domination of the Madrid regime. And Madrid's reply that it has not a single Socialist or Communist in the government fails to carry conviction. Nevertheless, there is a vast difference between domination by the working class and social revolution. Faced with the threat of reaction, even the most radical of the working-class leaders recognize the necessity for a broad united front of all anti-fascist elements. Their program is far from revolutionary. At the moment the Communist Party is the largest political party in Spain, its membership having risen from less than 25,000 in February to approximately 150,000 today. For international as well as immediate local reasons this party is committed, for the time being at least, to unqualified support of a moderate reform program for the Popular Front. It very frankly admits that there is no immediate possibility of a proletarian revolution, and feels that at present it would be most unwise to stress its ultimately revolutionary aims.

Behind this seemingly excessive caution lie the realities of the war situation. Although the government appears to have the upper hand thus far, it would be fatal to underestimate the strength of the opposition. While the Spanish army is not noted for its efficiency or prowess, it has tremendous advantages over the citizen militia in training, discipline, and equipment. The truth regarding the chaos, confusion, and disorganization of the workers' armies in the first week of the struggle has never been half told. Only leaks and the fact that the air force and navy remained loyal to the republic prevented the insurgents from gaining all the key positions on the first day of the uprising. Supporting the rebel leaders are three of the most powerful elements in Spain—the church, the big landowners, and the financial oligarchy. Although frightened by the legislation proposed by the republic, these groups had suffered no weakening in economic power prior to the outbreak. Fascism as engineered by them would be devoid of even progressive phrases, and would involve little more than a return to the feudal landlordism and church-fostered ignorance of the eighteenth century. For this reason the middle class has not, as in other countries, mounted the fascist band-wagon. As long as the Popular Front confines itself to a broad progressive program, it stands an excellent chance of holding and extending its influence with this class. A premature revolutionary outbreak, on the other hand, would throw the middle class into the arms of reaction and doom Spain to a fate far worse than that of Italy and Germany.

Although the desperate necessity of resisting fascist aggression has temporarily fused all the left forces of the republic, it has also sown the seed of possible future discord. No matter how decisive the final Republican victory may be, it is evident that the status quo ante can never be restored. The bankruptcy of the moderate left parties must be obvious to all Spaniards who are politically conscious. For the time being, however, there is an absolute moratorium on politics. Nothing is heard of the friction between the two wings of the Socialist Party, and there are no signs of dissension within the ranks of the Popular Front. The program of immediate reforms which has been agreed upon by all parties, including the Anarchists, may be counted on to preserve unity for at least a short time after the suppression of the rebellion. Obviously much needs to be done in the way of education and organization before there can be any possibility of transforming Spain into a socialist state. This is seen by the leaders, but the rank and file are not so discerning. In the interminable political discussions which one hears in public squares, on trains, and wherever workers are gathered, the possibility of an immediate overturn of capitalism is frequently assumed without question.

The situation is particularly critical in Catalonia, where tens of thousands of armed workers in the Anarchist-controlled C. N. T. (Confederación Nacional del Trabajo) dominate the province. Neither the left parties represented in the Catalan Generalidad nor the organizations controlled by the Socialists and Communists have any real power in the province. Next to the C. N. T. and the Anarchists' political organ, the F. A. I. (Federación Anarquista Iberica), the Trotskyist P. O. U. M. led by Andrés Nin is perhaps most influential. All these groups are outside the Popular Front, and the Anarchists, especially, have a long tradition of intransigence toward all authority. These men will not easily forget that they were forced to fight bare-handed against machine-guns because a timid government feared to put arms in the hands of the workers; nor will they submit willingly to the rule of their traditional enemies, the Socialists and Communists. The Anarchists have no program of their own, and their opposition to all forms of government makes it impossible to draw them into any permanent coalition.

But while formidable in self-defense and given to parading through the streets with a gun, the average member of the Anarchist groups has shown no particular fondness for fighting. The number of C. N. T. members at the Saragossa front is small in comparison to their preponderance on the streets of Barcelona. It is possible, therefore, that the pending program for transforming the popular militia into a republican army on the basis of willingness to fight will automatically deflate the power of the C. N. T. and put arms in the hands of groups more loyal to the Popular Front. There is also reason to hope that a vigorous government program designed to meet the immediate wants of the working-class population will serve to minimize any opposition from extremists. But it would be rank folly for anyone to hazard the assertion that bloodshed will be averted.

If despite all of these handicaps fascism is suppressed, the credit will rest almost exclusively with the trade unions and radical political parties. Liberals may complain that the radicals have been unduly harsh in their treatment of their political enemies. It is probably true that in Spain as in Russia men have been imprisoned, deprived of their property, and even killed who were not actively involved in counter-revolutionary activity. Yet the events of the last few weeks indicate that the legalistic attitude of the Republicans constitutes a far greater threat to civilization than do the excesses perpetrated by a handful of vengeful radicals. The most impressive fact in present-day Spain is not the terror and cruelty which is naturally associated with class war, but the discipline and restraint of the revolutionary parties. Their moderation and devotion to the republic have unquestionably saved Spain from fascism or utter chaos. Is it too much to expect that they will succeed in solving the even more difficult problems of victory?

Steelmasters: The Big Four

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

WHEN the Committee for Industrial Organization (C. I. O.) set out to unionize the steel industry, it was undertaking a complex as well as a difficult job. At first glance, one steel company looks very much like another when it comes to labor policy. They are practically all open shop and bitterly anti-union. They all pay the same scale of wages. When a major company cuts or raises wages, the whole industry follows at once. They are banded together in the powerful American Iron and Steel Institute. Toward organized labor steel seems to present a monolithic call of united opposition.

Closer inspection, however, reveals some cracks in the wall. Most steel workers, for example, would rather work for Bethlehem or United States Steel than for Republic or National. The two older and bigger companies have a looser control over their workers than Republic and National, both born in 1930, whose labor policies like their commercial policies are tough, vigorous, ruthlessly efficient. Such differences, however minor in times of peace, may become extremely important in the crucial period ahead of the steel industry. They are most readily symbolized in the personalities of the handful of executives who dominate the industry today. Four of them may be selected as at once typical and important in themselves: Grace of Bethlehem, Weir of National, Girdler of Republic, and Taylor of United States Steel. Among them, they represent over 60 per cent of the country's steel production.

Eugene Gifford Grace is president of Bethlehem Steel Corporation, which makes 14 per cent of the nation's steel and is second in size only to the United States Steel Corporation. He is sixty years old, and this year he celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his presidency. Baldish and commonplace looking, he finds his chief interest outside his job in golf, which he plays well enough to have acquired a shelf full of cups. He lives simply in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, where he brought up his three children in the Spartan manner affected by many self-made fathers. He neither drinks nor smokes. His conversational manner is alert, nervous, quick with replies. Urbane and constantly smiling, he is the perfect "spokesman" for the industry. For all his suavity he can be unyielding when something important, such as the open shop, is at stake. As Samuel Untermyer once remarked, "Mr. Grace is so accustomed to having his own way."

Grace was born in Goshen, New Jersey, son of a retired sea captain who ran a grocery store there. At an early age he showed signs of marked business ability. When his father offered twenty-five cents for every rat he trapped in the store, Eugene captured a property rat which he produced every morning for his quarter. Traces of the budding executive also may be discerned: school friends remember that when the ball went into the haymow, Eugene always got someone else to look for it. He worked his way through Lehigh University, distinguishing himself as prize mathematician, valedictorian, and captain of the baseball team, and graduating in 1899 with a degree in electrical engineering. That year he went to work for Bethlehem as electric-crane operator. In three years he was superintendent of the yards. When Schwab went into Bethlehem and began to build it up, he took a fancy to Grace. By 1908 Grace was general manager, and in 1916, at the age of forty, he became president. During the war years he and Schwab drove Bethlehem to unprecedented levels of production. Bethlehem made more munitions than any other company in the world, including Krupp. The war profits went largely into a great expansion and merger program which put Bethlehem far ahead of all its rivals—except, of course, United States Steel. Of late years Schwab has practically retired, leaving Grace in sole command. At sixty, Grace is the only active steelmaster who was a major figure during the 1919 strike. He is president of the American Iron and Steel Institute and without question the most powerful individual in the industry.

Abstemious as he is, Grace has one weakness: a remarkable appetite for cash bonuses. It began innocently enough when, for his services to his country and his stockholders in 1917 and 1918, he received some $3,000,000 in bonuses. But the habit grew until it became impossible to refuse a bonus. Several years ago, through the chances of a lawsuit, his stockholders were shocked and saddened to learn that their president had been indulging in million-dollar bonuses during years when his employers had received no dividends at all. At their urgent request, Grace has been on a strict regimen for several years now. His present salary is a modest $180,000 affair.

Grace has been an expensive employee, but perhaps he is worth it if only for his adroit handling of labor. Without drawing too much attention, he has effectively led the industry's fight on organized labor. In 1919 Samuel Untermyer, then Bethlehem's largest stockholder, tried in vain to get Grace to arbitrate. Two years later Untermyer had his revenge when he cross-examined Grace for the Lockwood committee. Under Untermyer's skilful questioning Grace was forced to admit that Bethlehem's policy was to refuse to sell steel to unionized building firms in Philadelphia and New York City. The heads of the Thompson-Starrett Company and the George A. Fuller Company, two of New York's biggest contractors, testified that Grace had said to them, "Don't you imagine for a moment we are going to let you fellows build up an organization of union men who can refuse to erect our steel, and bring about union conditions in our shops." To this day the erection of structural steel is the one open-shop division of the building trades.

In dealing with his own labor Grace has used "advanced" tactics. His "Bethlehem plan" for employer-employee relationship shares with Mr. Rockefeller's "Colorado plan" the glory of pioneering the company-union idea in steel. Soon after Grace became president of Bethlehem, he began to promote his "plan." His shrewdness was rewarded in the great 1919 steel strike. The Steel Corporation was badly crippled, but the strike never got started at Bethlehem. Not a mill was closed down, and there was no violence—in contrast to the bloody terrorism to which the corporation was reduced. In the following years Grace extended his plan to all his plants, adding pensions, stock offerings, and other up-to-date paternalistic features. "Trouble-makers" point out that in the five years 1925-30 Grace alone got $5,700,000, while in the twelve years 1923-35 his thousands of faithful pensioners received a total of $6,750,000. But the Bethlehem plan was never intended to discriminate against the superior individual.

The plan reaches an annual climax when the horny-handed representatives of the workers sit down for a frank, man-to-man discussion with Eugene Grace himself. "If you men have anything on your minds and don't speak out, it is your own fault," said Grace at one of these meetings. "There is no question that you cannot bring up. . . . If it is something you want and we cannot grant it, we will not hesitate to say so. If our decision is not convincing to you, you have the absolute right to convince us that we are wrong." Nothing could be fairer than that, certainly. No wonder the plan worked so well—in the boom years, at least—that Grace in 1926 declared with satisfaction, "We are actually getting to the point where meetings of workers, under the machinery set up for the adjustment of grievances, are devoted to a discussion of how to eliminate waste and increase production. . . ." It took years for most of Grace's fellow-steelmasters to grasp the significance of his plan. But today the company union is as widely accepted in the steel industry as is the open-hearth furnace.

Ernest Tener Weir is president of the National Steel Corporation, which has the best depression earning record in the steel industry. He is sixty-one years old, has three children, and lives in Pittsburgh. His usual expression is one of calm, candid benevolence. His voice is quiet and gentle. But this mild professorial appearance is deceptive. Weir is a fighter—"a great scrapper," his business associates say with admiration. He is the bad boy of the steel industry, a stubborn, hard-hitting individualist who goes right ahead and damns the torpedoes.

Weir was born in Pittsburgh and got his only education in the public schools there. At sixteen he went into the steel business as a clerk. At twenty-six he was superintendent of a sheet and plate mill in the newly formed United States Steel Corporation. A few years later he got out and went into business for himself, helping to found in 1905 the Phillips Sheet and Tin Plate Company. Later, when his partner, Phillips, died, it became the Weirton Steel Company. For twenty-five years Weirton Steel went along quietly enough, making comfortable profits but attracting little attention. In 1930 Weir engineered a merger with the Great Lakes Steel Company. The resulting National Steel is the only major steel company to show a profit every year from 1930 up to the present.

Weir is an enlightened capitalist. He is the outstanding pioneer in an industry noted for its stagnant conservatism. Weir has the only mill at Detroit, thereby violating a "gentleman's agreement" to keep out of Detroit. Weir is an aggressive price cutter, which is extremely bad form in the steel industry. Weir was considerably the first to put in one of the continuous-strip rolling mills which are currently revolutionizing steel production. All these bolshevik practices have made him at once the most successful and the most unpopular man in the industry. Weir once announced his hobby as "finding out what makes the industrial world tick." He is vice-chairman of the Maurice Falk Foundation, established in memory of one of his deceased partners, which has a $5,000,000 fund it must spend in thirty-one years for "the encouragement, improvement, and betterment of mankind." This foundation financed the studies recently published by the Brookings Institution as "America's Capacity to Produce" and "America's Capacity to Consume." The "Brookings thesis," that free competition and a better distribution of purchasing power offer the only way out for capitalism, has been enthusiastically proclaimed by Weir. He has publicly stated his belief that we can produce an abundant life for all, an unheard-of admission from a steel magnate. He has even declared himself "heartily in favor" of unemployment insurance and old-age pensions. So far, then, we have a liberal business man who preaches as sensible capitalistic doctrine as there is, and who practices what he preaches.

Can this be Weir of Weirton? Weir the "economic royalist" recently accused by Governor Earle of Pennsylvania of blocking adequate relief appropriations? Weir the Liberty Leaguer? Weir the man who fought the industry's bitter fight against Section 7-a of the National Recovery Act?

The fact is that Weir is one of the few surviving specimens of the pure-bred Adam Smith capitalist. Quite sincerely he believes in free competition, for capital as well as for labor. Alone of the executives considered in this article, Weir founded the company he runs. He treats it like a family business—as a proprietor and not as a hired executive—and he has almost $3,000,000 of his personal fortune sunk in it. Several years ago it was widely rumored that Weir had been offered the presidency of United States Steel at a huge salary. He turned it down. Such a personality finds itself badly split between progress and reaction in an age like ours. To the extent that he fights for free competition in a monopolistic industry, Weir is on the side of progress. But the logic of laissez faire also causes him to fight against the monopoly of the closed shop. Since his interests as well as his principles are threatened by the labor monopoly, Weir naturally throws himself with even greater zest into this crusade. And so he found himself, in his two-year battle with the NRA, the champion of a monopolistic steel industry which he was daily outraging with his unorthodox competitive tactics.

A man like Weir is the most dangerous sort of reactionary because he honestly believes he is being progressive. He has the vigor and the moral conviction which the conservative so fatally lacks. In the last two years Weir has become the very spearhead of the reactionary forces in steel. If the discreet and diplomatic Grace is the industry's official keynoter, Weir is the unofficial spokesman. "It is the responsibility of every business man to be articulate," he recently declared. He lives up to his responsibility. His more recent speeches would be described as incendiary if they came from the left. Last year he exhorted the members of the Union Club of Chicago: "It is up to you as business men to take the lead in changing that [the public's] mind and there are a number of very practical things you can do. . . . There has been a lamentable silence on the part of business. . . . We are fast arriving at the point where business leaders will have to fight. . . ."

In his labor policies Weir also exhibits a split personality. His investigations into "what makes the industrial world tick" have led him to the conclusion that high wages are essential to capitalist prosperity. But high wages have no connection with unions—at least Weir refuses to admit any. So he fights the Amalgamated as ardently as he preaches high wages. His labor policies are as notoriously hard-boiled as those of that other prophet of high wages, Henry Ford—whom Weir resembles in more ways than one. The late President Williams of Weirton Steel once said, "I believe in the right to strike, but when they go at it without consulting the management, it is a damnable institution." The better to remove from his men the temptation to strike without consulting the management, Weir has kept them under strict control. The city of Weirton, West Virginia (30,000 population), which has grown up around the mills he laid out in 1909, has for years been the largest unincorporated community in the country. Being unincorporated, it has no elected officials who might prove unreliable in a crisis.

The long fight with the NRA set all Weirton on edge, but it didn't ruffle the lord of the manor. At one critical point, with the future of collective bargaining under the NRA hanging in the balance, reporters learned from Weir that he had been rereading "David Copperfield," for the hundred-and-first time. "It gets better with each reading," he added. "I can open the book any time and soon become as engrossed as if I had just stumbled across it." A remark like that betrays a cynicism of which Weir perhaps was not always capable. As the struggle with labor intensifies, Weir will probably become more and more violently reactionary. His conflict with the NRA hardened his conservative tendencies as it dissolved his liberalism. Today he is less of a split personality than he was in 1933, and he is rapidly developing into a well-integrated rightist. His speeches grow more and more fiery. He steadily looms larger in Republican politics. Perhaps most significant of all, last year his comparatively modest salary of $54,000 a year went up to $160,000. A few years more, and he will regard his liberal statements about high wages and low prices as youthful indiscretions.

Tom Mercer Girdler is president, board chairman, and personal dictator of the Republic Steel Corporation, third biggest in the industry. He was born fifty-nine years ago on a farm near Louisville, Kentucky. He went from high school to Lehigh University, and was graduated in 1901 with an M.E. For many years he knocked around the steel industry as mill superintendent in various companies, ending up in 1914 as assistant to the superintendent of the Aliquippa works of Jones and Laughlin. By 1928 he had climbed to the presidency, which he left the next year to head the big new steel company that Cyrus Eaton was forming around the nucleus of the old Republic Steel Company. When Eaton's grandiose plans collapsed in disaster, Girdler was able to keep the newborn steel company from collapsing, too. Republic common went to 2, but the company somehow survived. It was a brilliant feat of management and finance, and it made Girdler a major power in the industry.

Girdler is a bald, dry little man with a genial manner and a fine command of profanity. His good nature is constant but somehow inhuman, as though it came from a lack of the emotions, scruples, and inhibitions of other men. There is a gnome-like quality to him as he sits behind his big, glass-topped desk, cocking a bright eye at you. Hard, unscrupulous, energetic in the pursuit of the main chance, he belongs to the tough old school of steelmasters that produced Frick and Carnegie. He is the most ambitious empire builder in the industry today. His only non-commercial passion is for horses, and he readily admits that he has a lot more feeling for horses than for men. As one might expect, his social responsibilities sit lightly on his shoulders. There are few enemies of organized labor more implacable than Tom Girdler. His classic pronouncement on labor came at the annual meeting of the Steel Institute in the spring of 1934, when he declared, "I have a little farm with a few apple trees, and before spending the rest of my life dealing with John Lewis I'm going to raise apples and potatoes. We are not going to deal with the Amalgamated or any other professional union even if we have to shut down." This is the frankest declaration on labor yet made by a steel man, and Girdler's assembled peers applauded him vigorously.

There was, naturally, a modicum of hot air in Girdler's speech. In fact, just three months previous he had found it advisable to sign a contract with John Lewis covering Republic's captive coal mines in Pennsylvania. On the other hand, some six weeks later, Republic refused to renew a contract with the Amalgamated which had been in force for twenty years at its Warren, Ohio, plant.

All executives of necessity think of labor as "cost" rather than "men," but few are inhumanly efficient enough to carry this out to its logical conclusion. Girdler is one of those happy few. His workers represent so many man-hours, and his job is to get maximum production with minimum man-hours. The single-mindedness with which he has done this makes his career extraordinary even in the steel business. During the years he was superintendent at Aliquippa, he created one of the tightest-shut company towns in the country. "The Siberia of America," it was called by labor leaders. They tell the story of the organizer who tried to pass out union literature on the streets of Aliquippa and who was speedily committed not to jail but to the insane asylum. Not until the NRA did the American Siberia begin to thaw out after the great Girdler freeze. When Girdler took over Republic, one of his first acts was to weed out the less efficient employees, regardless of length of service or other "sentimental"—that is, human—considerations. Many veteran machinists and other skilled workers lost their jobs. Youngstown still remembers those days with bitterness. Last fall the process was repeated when Republic took over the big Corrigan, McKinney Steel Company of Cleveland. The old Corrigan management had been notoriously easy-going with its working force. Girdler personally led an execution squad through the mills, firing hundreds of superfluous employees—"superfluous," that is, because Girdler knows how to get the most out of his men. One of the many reasons he dislikes the New Deal is because during the NRA period his foremen were forced to ease up on the men and earnings fell off.

The management which Girdler has assembled about him at Republic is young, aggressive, trained in his hard school. But the workers are also young—thirty-nine is the average age in the mills—and they too may become aggressive some day. Last year, led by young Clarence Irwin, now one of Lewis's top organizers, they put on a strike at the big Republic mills in Canton, Ohio, which was an extremely unpleasant bit of industrial warfare. The next time the lid blows off at Republic, Girdler may find that his methods are contagious.

The great bulwark of the open shop in steel is the United States Steel Corporation, which employs almost 200,000 men, makes 40 per cent of the nation's steel, and is bigger than its six biggest competitors put together. Ever since the corporation signalized its founding by sweeping the Amalgamated out of its plants, it has been the backbone of the industry's resistance to unionization. The 1919 strike was aimed mostly at the corporation, and the C. I. O. today knows that no solid organization can be built until the corporation is conquered.

The Steel Corporation dislikes unions as much as ever, but it is no longer the aggressive leader in the crusade. In this as in other fields leadership has passed to independents like National and Republic. The death of Gary took away some of the old fire. Sheer size tells more and more on the corporation, which some economists think is too big to be managed at all. The great hulk drifts along in a general counter-union direction, pushed this way and that by conflicting currents.

The balance of power rests with Myron Taylor, chairman of the board, who more than anyone else has inherited the powers of the late Judge Gary. But the corporation is more unmanageably enormous than ever, and Taylor is distinctly not another Gary. His exercise of power is mostly negative, directed toward maintaining the status quo. With some pride he has stated that the corporation's labor policy in particular is the same today as it was in Gary's time. The fact is that between the social-service work of Vice-President Young, the blood-and-iron philosophy of President Fairless of Carnegie-Illinois, and various other shades of opinion among lesser officers, the corporation can hardly be said to have a labor policy at all. There is a curious lack of purpose and direction about the corporation today. The importance of Taylor is that, as a conservative of conservatives, his policies are at once the cause and the symbol of the corporation's impotence.

Myron Charles Taylor was born sixty-two years ago at Lyons, New York, son of a retired manufacturer. At twenty he was graduated from Cornell Law School, where he was a pupil of Charles Evans Hughes. His active career, between the ages of twenty-five and fifty, was passed in the textile business, where he devoted himself to the legal and financial intricacies of mergers, reorganizations, and recapitalizations. In 1925 the late George F. Baker persuaded him to become a director of the Steel Corporation. After Gary's death in 1927 Taylor, backed by the powerful Morgan-First National interests, became steadily more important in the management. In 1932 he succeeded J. P. Morgan as chairman of the board.

Taylor is one of those heavy-shouldered men whose powerful torsos burst out of the best-tailored clothes. He looks most impressive seated. When he rises, one is surprised to discover that he is not very tall. He has sad, deep-set, handsome eyes, a nose that is stubborn, pugnacious, and earthy as an Irish ditch-digger's, a mouth that is a mailbox slit, pinned down firmly by lines of determination. His face is very long and very large, so that there are considerable areas of it which aren't occupied by the features at all. He invariably wears high stiff collars, blue double-breasted suits, dark ties. He speaks slowly, almost wearily, leaning back heavily in his desk chair, gesturing with a tortoise-shell pince-nez to emphasize his points. His voice is soothingly cadenced, gently authoritative and reassuring, like that of a great psychiatrist who specializes in treating nervous women.

Taylor is a very different sort of steelmaster from Grace, Weir, or Girdler. He has never worked in the mills—steel or any other kind—and he knows little about the actual processes of steelmaking. Finance, not operation, is his forte, and Wall Street, not Pittsburgh, his native habitat. Grace and Weir and Girdler are more at home in shirtsleeves than in the traditional silk hat of the capitalist. But Taylor plays the grand seigneur. Genealogy is his hobby, and from 1930 to 1935 he was president of the New York Genealogical Society. His vanity, which is considerable, centers chiefly on his ancestors and his appearance. The walls of his office are crowded with coats of arms. A wealthy man quite apart from his $180,000 salary, Taylor owns a country house on Long Island, a huge town house, a villa outside Florence where he spends a month or so every year. He shoots grouse in Scotland, winters at Palm Beach, plays golf at Piping Rock, collects pictures and tapestries, and otherwise passes his time as a gentleman should.

Taylor's attitude toward labor is more complicated than that of simple natures like Grace and Girdler. There is more than a touch of the landed proprietor to whom his employees are so many worthy cottagers toward whom he has certain obligations. There is furthermore a good deal of Quaker benevolence. Like his parents, Taylor belongs to that kindly sect. A good deal of his time goes to organized charity. But for all his benevolence he is, after all, a business man. The discrepancy between what he should do as a philanthropist and what he must do as a capitalist has had on Taylor much the same unfortunate effect it produced on Ramsay MacDonald, the victim of a somewhat similar psychic conflict. Like MacDonald, he has developed a pathological aversion to reality which expresses itself in a nebulous prose style: In 1931 he wrote in the Saturday Evening Post: "Out of the depression we have been going through we shall have learned something of high importance. It is too soon to say just what we are learning." The increasing leisure which Taylor accurately foresees for the working classes under capitalism is one of his favorite themes. By its proper use, he told the St. Nicholas Society of New York in 1931, "we may further develop a new type which will find at last the golden key to all the hidden mysteries." This imaginative flight pleased him so much that he repeated it, almost word for word, in an address before the American Institute of Steel Construction two years later. It is, indeed, a beautiful thought, even if it fails to explain how the workers are to keep alive during their leisurely search for the golden key.

Such omissions are characteristic of Taylor's thinking. "What is our duty, we who are recognized as leaders of industry?" he asked the members of the institute in 1930. "We have a duty. It is up to us to adjust man to the machines. It is up to us to make that adjustment at once. The adjustment can be helped along if the work is divided as nearly as possible among those best prepared to do it." Share the work is the best solution Taylor can propose for the unemployment problem. "A really simple expedient," he has termed it, and so indeed it is. But he resolutely ignores the fact that if the work is shared, so is the pay. During the depression Taylor's simple expedient drastically reduced the already inadequate income of the corporation's workers. Furthermore, in 1931 and 1932 it seemed necessary to Taylor, as a business man, to cut wages 25 per cent. The first cut was made over the protests of President Farrell, who resigned shortly after it went into effect. Farrell was no philanthropist, but he had worked his way up from the mills and he knew what a pay cut really meant. It will be a long time before the corporation's employees forget the suffering and demoralization of those years. But Taylor had no trouble forgetting. On April 2, 1934, he assured his stockholders: "I don't believe there is a brighter page in the history of a company than the one which your corporation wrote with respect to the treatment of employees during the entire depression." There was enthusiastic applause.

America Under the Trees

BY RUFUS P. FORD

Kansas City, Missouri, August 10

YOU have no idea how much fun we are getting out of this Landon-for-President campaign, conceived and conducted by our great newspaper, the Kansas City Star. It is more fun than a picnic, even one of those Estes Park picnics. We are rapidly adopting a new motto: "All we know is what we don't see in the newspapers."

We have watched the building up of Governor Landon from the very beginning. Indeed, we are practically fed up on Brother Landon. We have had him at dinner, on the street, on horseback, trying to cook a steak, to catch at least one trout in the Colorado streams; we have had his official life, his home life, his child life, and his adult life. He has become the original Horatio Alger boy of the nation. In the winter we had him in all sorts of poses, always dressed in "the old leather jacket, the out-door jacket, the tight-zipping jacket, that Alf Landon wore." But the Star pulled a boner when it showed us the Governor seated with that delightfully groomed ex-Governor Lowden of Illinois. Governor Landon had on wide collegiate trousers, and his hosiery was falling about his shoe tops. Years ago Jerry Simpson of Kansas shocked a sedate Congress by appearing in Washington with unclad shins. Evidently they have learned how to wear socks in Kansas. They now need a few good garter salesmen and demonstrators.

To return to the propaganda, it goes along nicely, thank you. Governor Landon calls a session of the legislature to provide for some change in the constitution so the state can receive federal money for its social-security plan. And the newspaper accounts would lead us to believe that this was the most remarkable meeting of a state legislature ever held: "Governor Landon's message was typical of the man. It was brief, business-like; it stated concisely the purpose of the extraordinary session and let it go at that, without histrionics." (Apparently the editorial writer was tired of the plain people and couldn't help himself; but we fear that "histrionics" will not get very far with the Kansas cohorts.) In this special session there was some twitting of the Governor by the Democratic members, especially with regard to the hypocritical attitude of the Republicans on prohibition, and the effort to do something about the Kansas civil-service law, which has been on the statute books since 1915 and never enforced. The next day the Star said editorially: "Kansas acted quickly. . . . Kansans have had too much to do in years past, they have too much to do now, to bother about extending a legislative session beyond the barest requirements. And that was as Governor Landon asked and expected." And of course that is what Governor Landon would ask and expect of the wild men of the United States Congress.

In 1932, if Mr. Hoover sneezed, it was the most wonderful sneeze that ever happened. And now if Mr. Landon coughs, it is a most melodious cough. Mr. Landon goes down to Independence to cast his ballot in the primaries, and this gives the Star a chance to spring an editorial on the American Tradition and a front-page news article on "Does Duty as a Citizen. . . . Landon goes home to cast ballot," and thereby sets a shining example of courage and consecration for millions of citizens yet unborn.

The reporters insist on dragging Mrs. Landon into the propaganda. There are long articles about her domesticity, and how she is going to be a President's wife and remain in the background. The climax came when one of the news sisters went into a delirium about the Estes Park picnic:

Governor Landon seized the first place he found at the table with Peggy Anne beside him. Mrs. Landon sat far down toward the end and talked about foods and children to a woman reporter. Beyond that there is nothing to say about the steak fry that couldn't be said about any other occasion of its kind. . . . It was just America under the trees. It wound up with songs around the camp fire.

That line should go down in history—"just America under the trees."

We have two papers in Kansas City, Missouri—the Journal Post and the Kansas City Star (the Kansas City Times is the morning edition of the Star); and both are violently Republican. We have had no Democratic paper for years, and despite this fact Kansas City and Jackson County and the state of Missouri usually are safely Democratic. The people read the Star, but they don't vote it.

This brings us to the recent primary election in Missouri and Kansas. In Missouri the Democrats polled over 700,000 votes in the primary and the Republicans approximately 300,000. Of course that is just a meager difference of 400,000, and the energetic and resourceful J. D. M. Hamilton may be able to overcome this handicap if he has to call out the militia. He has already claimed Missouri by at least 200,000 votes.

In Kansas a political cyclone seems to be brewing. The Democratic vote in the primary showed a surprising total of over 200,000, at least 53,000 more votes than were ever polled by Democrats in any Kansas election. Furthermore a W. B. Trembley of Kansas City, Kansas, who was personally backed to the limit by the Landon forces for the office of state treasurer, was soundly defeated for the nomination by J. J. Rhodes, present incumbent and for some reason persona non grata to Governor Landon.

With the results of the primaries before them our reporters and editors went into a complete tailspin. For two days the newspapers were dull and uninteresting; it was as if nothing exciting had happened or would happen again. Perhaps the shadow of impending events had already cast a gloom over the industrious and clever groups inhabiting our newspaper offices.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

BY ALL odds the best speech which the President has made on the subject of peace was the one that he delivered at Chautauqua on August 15. I found it frank and moving, with a quality of earnestness that I have not always felt in his previous utterances on this subject. There were admissions in it that were quite remarkable, seeming to indicate that he has moved considerably in his thinking on matters of peace, and it was gratifying to have him declare that "we are not isolationists except in so far as we seek to isolate ourselves completely from war." I welcome his statement that "if we must face the choice of profits or peace, the nation will answer—must answer—'We choose peace.'" I acclaim his frank and positive "I hate war."

Now I am well aware that the cynics and doubters will say that all this is mere rhetoric, however appealing, and point out that while the President speaks thus he is going right on preparing for war and putting the United States into that mad and insensate naval-armament race with Japan and Great Britain which will in all likelihood eventually lead to war. As I write these words the morning paper brings the news that he has had an anti-aircraft gun set up on his estate and that he has expressed the wish that we have many more of them and his pleasure that for the first time we are thus showing our teeth to the world. I admit the inconsistency. The President enjoys all things naval and military precisely as Theodore Roosevelt did. It is a part of the boyishness so conspicuous in both their make-ups. None the less, one must welcome so outspoken an anti-war statement as the President made and put it on the credit side of the ledger.

Perhaps the most striking portion of the speech, however, was that which dealt with the question of neutrality. It was right there that I noticed the change. When additional neutrality legislation was first suggested in Congress, Mr. Roosevelt and Secretary Hull were both opposed to tying the President's hands. They felt that Congress could not foresee every emergency and that the President might be helpless in a sudden situation, with Congress, let us say, not in session. Now the President has made the strongest argument possible for the contrary policy, which some of us have been advocating so strenuously. Thus, I have been maintaining for years that Presidents have, and still can, put us into war single-handed. Here is Mr. Roosevelt saying that "the effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today, as in the past, on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State." Precisely. And here is a passage which sounds like a direct reference to the collapse of Woodrow Wilson before the war-makers:

We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide have a sufficiently detailed understanding of international affairs to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war, and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say no to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war [italics mine].

There, I maintain, is the clearest proof of my long-held contention that Woodrow Wilson could have kept us out of war if he had so willed, if he had had the courage to keep the promise he made to me and many others that this country would never go into the war.

Amazingly fine, too, was the President's statement of the pressure that is brought to bear upon the Executive the minute war begins abroad by those who think that America will then be able to capture the trade of the world and put all the unemployed to work. He spoke of the Executive when he said: "To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace." It is pleasant to be able to assure the President that there will be a thousand times more support for the next Chief Executive who wishes to stand up against war than it was possible to give to Woodrow Wilson in 1917. The development of the peace societies and such bodies as the Council of Foreign Relations, the Foreign Policy Association, and the like, and the great expansion of instruction in foreign affairs in all our colleges make it certain that it will not be so easy to deceive the American people another time and that multitudes will have an intelligent opinion about what is going on where there were only handfuls before. They will certainly be ready to do their share in the struggle which will be waged to capture the President. That is the picture which Mr. Roosevelt's remarks visualized—the President being beset on one side by the war profiteers and on the other by peace lovers. Unfortunately, the President himself has done more than any other occupant of the White House to create a third and most dangerous factor, a huge army and navy lobby, a war-boasting machine such as we did not have in 1917. And I have no doubt he will continue to strengthen those forces, part of which would so eagerly support any movement for a totalitarian, all-military state.

Nevertheless, I get a genuine thrill when I read these latest words of the President:

I wish I could keep war from all nations; but that is beyond my power. I can at least make certain that no act of the United States helps to produce or to promote war. I can at least make clear that the conscience of America revolts against war and that any nation which provokes war forfeits the sympathy of the people of the United States.

"WHAT makes more noise than a pig under a gate?" so runs the ancient riddle. But instead of the familiar "Two pigs," the answer now might much better be, "One Hearst under a strike." When William Randolph Hearst was sailing for Europe he was repeatedly questioned by newspapermen as to his attitude toward the guild. The great Mr. Hearst smiled indulgently and replied that he would discuss nothing except "matters of general interest." And now suddenly the guild finds itself all over the first page of all the Hearst papers. It has become "a menace" and "mob rule." The Hearst management is bringing thugs to Seattle and organizing a "Law and Order League." "The freedom of the press" has been called in from the bullpen to go to work once more after only one day's rest. And Editor and Publisher blandly suggests that members of the Newspaper Guild be blacklisted.

Of course, the answer to all this is that the Post-Intelligencer has been shut down. Mr. Hearst would have the public believe that the strike came suddenly and wholly at the behest of David Beck, the able and vigorous vice-president of the teamsters. Daniel Tobin, international president of the union, and David Beck have unquestionably given staunch support to the strike, but Mr. Hearst knows as well as I do that very small concessions on his part would have averted the Seattle strike and settled the one in Milwaukee. Not only has he refused to budge an inch, but he has also refused to give a second of his time to any guild discussion. The guild has asked very little, and it has been ready at times to accept mediation.

The Hearst attitude from the beginning has been, "Nothing to discuss." At least that is what it has amounted to. I know what I am talking about because last April, after repeated telegrams, I finally got a reply from Joe Willecombe, Mr. Hearst's secretary. I had asked for an opportunity to talk to Mr. Hearst, if only for five minutes, about the Milwaukee strike. In order to make this easy for him I added that if he chose he could regard the conference as purely informal and not constituting any recognition of the guild. I offered to fly out to California. Mr. Willecombe replied politely and promptly that Mr. Hearst would be delighted to see me but that he was starting east immediately and the meeting could be held in New York.

Weeks went by before Mr. Hearst came east. When I called up Mr. Willecombe to remind him of the appointment, he told me that Mr. Hearst was very busy but that if I were patient I could surely see him since he planned to be in New York a month. Four days later Hearst sailed for Europe.

During the waiting period I ran by chance into William Randolph Hearst, Jr., who said he did not think that there was any reason why his father should see me. He said that since I did not come with the purpose or the power to suggest an immediate settlement a meeting would be a waste of time. I immediately got in touch with other national officers and with the Milwaukee strikers, and we drew up a one-page memorandum outlining the basis on which the strike on the Wisconsin News could be settled. It was a modest document. Indeed, it was the same as the formula which had been agreed upon by both the management and the Milwaukee strike committee in early April. That agreement would have gone through except for Mr. Hearst's last-minute veto.

To some extent the Lord of San Simeon simply doesn't see the picture. The New York American reprints with relish an article from the Sun which describes the strikers as made up in part of "six office boys, eight cub reporters, and what I would call the small fry of the office." Mr. Hearst is always fond of referring to himself as the most generous employer in the world. But his generosity has never extended to the small fry. The fact that Hearst and a few others have given huge salaries to a small number of specialists merely underlines and accentuates the fact that the craft in general is hideously underpaid.

Perhaps Mr. Hearst's vast indignation at the Seattle situation is understandable. All his life he has been bamboozling and exploiting the small fry, and it is startling to him when they strike back. He has not yet learned what they are learning. Small fry are no longer small when they begin to organize. They take on purpose and power. One office boy may be less than the dust beneath Hearst's chariot, but a thousand office boys can say, "Here is our proposition. Take it or leave it."

If any violence occurs in Seattle, it will be well to look for the source in advance. Mayor Dore has been excoriated in the Hearst press as one who has betrayed law and order. But this outcry seems to be based upon the fact that in a recent speech he said, "As long as I am mayor of this city I shall never permit a member of the police department to throw gas bombs at workers or to beat them over the head." To me that would seem a very orderly remark upon the part of an official intent on keeping Seattle from the bloodshed known in other cities when police have undertaken to break strikes and interfere with union men in peaceful picketing. But this is a peace which passes the understanding of Mr. Hearst, and his henchmen are busy trying to organize a "Law and Order League." Its function undoubtedly would be the same as that of other employer-recruited organizations which mushroom up while strikes are being held. First of all, the law-and-orderites will raise the red scare, and with that thrown into the picture this vigilante group will try to get away with strong-arm methods. A propaganda base is being laid already. When an armed thug attacks a striker, we shall be told that he is a righteous householder driven to desperation by the infringement of the freedom of the press. Almost any day now we shall be hearing that since the Hearst paper suspended, the babies can't get their milk.

HEYWOOD BROWN

"THE FINE THING about 'The People, Yes'* is that it is indubitable speech. Here is a man speaking, a man who knows all sorts and conditions of men, who can be wise and witty, stirring and nonsensical with all of them. Carl Sandburg is a master of his own medium; he can deliver himself with the extraordinary clarity of the comic strip caption, with the punch of the tip-top editorial, with the jingle of the American ballad. If America has a folk singer today he is Carl Sandburg, a singer who comes out of the prairie soil, who has the prairie inheritance, who can hand back to the people a creation that has scraps of their own insight, humor, and imagination, a singer, it should be added, who both says and sings. . . . He has a passion that gives dignity to all that he says. It is a passion for humanity, not merely for the man with depths of personality in him, but for the ordinary man and woman. . . . Sandburg has published many books since he celebrated Chicago as the hog-butcher of the world. 'The People, Yes' is his most mature, his most distinctive, his most appealing volume."

"HAVING FOLLOWED THE career of Dos Passos since the publication of 'Three Soldiers' with a feeling that, with Hemingway, he shares first American honors, it is with considerable satisfaction that we proclaim his most recent novel his most excellent. . . . Never was there more evidence of absolute mastery of facts, or a more complete sympathy for the pampered popinjays who largely populate the space between these covers. . . . WE STILL LOVE HORACE

BY ALVIN JOHNSON

THERE are still people who read Horace. There must be many of them; else the shrewd managers of the Modern Library would hardly have undertaken to bring out a translation of the complete works.* The volume is edited, with competence and good taste, by Professor Caspar J. Kraemer of New York University. The Satires are translated in an informal prose by Hubert Wetmore Wells; for the Epodes, here called Refrains, I do not know why, and for the Odes and Epistles the editor has made an anthology of the better translations in verse from John Dryden and Samuel Johnson down to Austin Dobson and Louis Untermeyer. A Latinist lover of Horace will have frequent moments of anguish over the contrast between the deftest of Latin and the English, inevitably thick-fingered. The Satires, however, come through satisfactorily in prose. After all, Horace himself refused to regard them as anything but metrical prose. The meter could be broken up, the word order changed, and yet these pieces would convey the essential meaning of the author. Not so with real poetry. Dissolve the order and meter, says Horace, and you will find in the heap of separate items also the disjecti membra poetae, the bloody limbs of the dismembered poet. There are plenty of bleeding shreds of the unhappy poet in even the best of these poetic translations of Horace.

Latinists are almost extinct, and most of the readers of the Modern Library will take the translated work as they find it, not often important artistically or philosophically, occasionally trivial and even dull, but on the whole smooth reading and entertaining. Anyone who found the book on a guest-room shelf, wedged in between a stray volume of Proust, a four-year-old revelation of the truth about Russia, and other flotsam and jetsam of the literary backwash, would pick up this Horace with hope, and browse in it with a not too languid interest, pending the victory of sleep. But books do not sell in response to guest-room demands. There must be real Horatians, in this generation ■ in every generation for the last two thousand years.

There is nothing strange in the fact that Horatians survived in the medieval monasteries, where pleasant secular books were rare; through the Renaissance with its cult of classical taste; in Oxford and Cambridge, begotten of the ancients and born old. It is not very strange that Horatians were scattered thinly over the United States in the first three-quarters of the nineteenth century, when higher education was classic and the old graduate could renew his youth by taking down his dog-eared text of Horace, as now he renews his youth by yelling himself hoarse at a football game. Today Horace is not an important part of anyone's college reminiscences. He is no longer in any sense a literary compulsion. And yet there are people who read him, not exactly with enthusiasm perhaps, but with a quiet delight.

Not many lovers of Horace will be found among the youth of today. When young men really knew Latin some of them were carried off their feet by the incredible skill with which Horace molded stiff and unimaginative Latin into the smoothest of light verse. This excitement cannot be experienced by the reader of a translation, even if the translation is attended by a well-meant attack upon the original. If men read Horace today it is for the substance, not the form. And it seems to be agreed among modern critics that the substance of Horace is little or nothing.

Much talk about the golden mean, avoidance of extremes, with telling and often amusing examples. Much talk about the uncertainty and brevity of life; therefore eat, drink, and be merry. The lunacy of heaping up wealth after one already has more than enough. The gnawing misery of ambition. Distorted values: why have an expensive peacock on the table when you can't roast the plumes, while chicken tastes quite as good? Why aim at ■ mistress descended from a great dictator when a slave girl's embraces are as sweet and rewarding, with no chance that the moment of bliss will be broken in upon by the barking of dogs; the confidential maid bursting into the room crying, "We are ruined, ruined, ruined"; the night watch and two fire departments clattering up; drawn swords, search and seizure, screams and protestations heard through the chinks of the linen closet, where one lies doubled up, neck gradually breaking. And yet the lady descendant of the great dictator, if truth must be told, is awfully bony. It just doesn't make sense, according to Horace.

There is of course some concession to the outmoded politics of the time. Augustus, an intellectual Mussolini with a sense of humor, expected a bit of propaganda from his poets. He expected them to impute to him credit for everything done by his valiant generals all around the rim of the empire. He expected them at least to allude to the useful political myth that the Julii were descended straight from Iulus, grandson of Venus herself, strong issue of ■ weak moment. More practically, he had his poets, both Vergil and Horace, reassure the realtors of Rome that there was nothing in the persistent rumor that the house of Caesar meant eventually to transfer the seat of imperial government to the Bosphorus, where it really belonged. That whole region was for poetic-real-estate purposes, Ilion itself, cursed by Juno on account of the fateful apple and the wrong of Paris to her beauty. It is irrelevant to note that when half of the government was moved to Byzantium the empire went to the devil. But the realtors who killed Caesar had cashed in before that.

There is not a scintilla of social sense in Horace, and that ought to bar him in our socially sensible age. He is not a reformer, even in his most unguarded moment. He accepts the existing situation: the immensely powerful and rich children of fortune, the masses of middle station like himself, taking delight in shopping around at the vegetable stands, beating down the price of a mess of green beans or a head of cabbage, drinking home-made wine of no repute and feeling glorious for all that. Horace accepts slavery and finds it beautifully convenient, especially when he wants a shapely fan dancer for a party, with wine and good conversation. He is against crucifixion as a means of disciplining a slave for surreptitiously swallowing goodies. That manifests a lack of proportion. What can you think up more adequate for the slave who murders your mother, or even tries to murder you? But a slave is a man for all that, able to bandy Horatian moralities until the poet, enraged by the success of the counterfeit, cries out, "Get me a stone! Get me a dart." And the slave calmly remarks, "Either you've gone crazy or you are talking poetry."

Nor is there any real lift in the writings of Horace. Even when he handles heroic subjects, there is always a lurking smile. He is politely deferential to great achievements, but it is the deference of a well-bred man to a religion in which he does not believe. "Come, though it's your office hour, and drink with me in the cool shade: what if the Dacians are on the war path beyond the Danube?" True, he seems once to boast. He had erected a monument more enduring than bronze, a monument that would outlast the Pyramids. But what was it? He had made solemn Latin trip gaily to the dancing meters of Greek poetry.

To return to the inquiry, why does anyone today read Horace? Why will they read him two thousand years hence when the total profit of our deepest present-day literature has gone into the scant bellies of thin and jointed library worms? Because life is Horatian and will always be, a thing of small moment and brief duration, of fleeting joys and repeated defeats. For ten who set out in any race but one will win. And since winning one race is only the entrance to the next higher race, where one in ten will win, we are all, practically all, losers. But still the sun shines for us, the waves play, the fountain sings with soft melody, "Today is today, and if you are wise, today is sweet: tomorrow levels all things." Still the flowers bloom and the laughter of girls in the hidden angle of the wall is delicious upon the night air. Still in our real hearts we don't give a hoot for the social sense, but dwell painfully upon our own defeated selves, which may, however, be made victorious by virtue of a mug of Falernian and a ripe morality. Therefore we shall forever love Horace.

But "we" is masculine. No woman ever loved Horace. For they are by nature victorious.

BY GRACE A. TIMMERMAN MILLER

Strong intellect and spirit gave his face
Distinction that defied mulatto skin.
Gay youth and gallantry, with saving grace
Of character and purpose glowed within His deep reflective eyes that almost seemed
A white man's. Notably a look was there
Of conscious power, by reticence redeemed;
His bearing was discreet, though debonair.
So young, so fine, it seemed he might forget
His disadvantage in a world of men
Where barriers mark racial caste—and yet
He did not, for one saw him now and then Draw in a heavy lip, as if to hide
A feature that he could not wear with pride.

Stepping-Stones of Destiny

PACIFIC ADVENTURE. By Willard Price. Reynal and Hitchcock. A John Day Book, $3.

IF HISTORIANS of some future generation are required to list neatly the fables and idiocies serving as prelude to a great Japanese-American war, they will certainly include the 2,550 islands, islets, and coral reefs of Micronesia. They will find the ground, if not the islands, well worked.

Diehard American editors have described them as an encircling ring of yellow peril about to choke the Philippine Islands while the lingering memories of American democracy and altruism grow cold in the ungrateful Filipino breast. Excitable naval lieutenants in Tokyo have strung their still barren rocks into another "life-line for Japan," matching to the south the "national destiny" which drew their army cousins into Manchuria. European statesmen, a little grimly, calendar the alleged fortifications on the islands for annual discussion at meetings of the Mandates Commission and take care to freshen up at intervals the old suspicions.

For most of us Manchuria was a sun-baked plain, beyond which was only the silent wilderness of Mongolia and Siberia. But the South Sea Islands are the gateway to the glamor of the East. They are the world of Joseph Conrad and Robert Louis Stevenson. In Yap, where a cable station caused in 1920 the first round of the shadow boxing about the islands between Japan and the United States, the headline writers have had a gift direct from heaven.

And, finally, there are so many of them. It required four months for Mr. Price, thirty-eight days on board ship, to make the round of the most important of them. The larger ones he saw. His book is an account of what they looked like, of what the Japanese are doing to them, and of the importance they may come to have in the struggle for mastery of the Pacific. He was the first American to set foot on many of the islands, and his earlier acquaintance with Japan had given him two assets indispensable to the kind of quick, not too profound, and useful reporting he has done. The first is an ability to guess shrewdly the possible meanings of anything a Japanese official may say or do. The second is a polite but firm refusal to accept the official's own explanation.

In Tokyo and on Palau, the capital island, for example, he was treated with the same curious mixture of oblique courtesy and suspicious indirection that all reporters working in Japan or Japanese colonies have come to expect. Yet his findings, reported with considerable care, completely check all the credible reports that have been made in recent years by foreigners. He found, Mr. Price says, no evidence of any fortifications, prohibited when the islands, formerly German, were placed under Japanese mandate. He is convinced, on what seem to be ample grounds, that this provision of the mandate has been scrupulously carried out.

Building he saw, commercial ports equipped to load the islands' sugar and copra and tapioca into Japanese ships, tin-roofed houses on stilts to wean the Kanaka from his South Sea charm and his tuberculosis, impressive highways piercing the jungle to settlements which exist only in the plans of the Japanese colonial administrators. And Japanese he saw everywhere, 52,000 of them with health and a high birth-rate to 50,000 natives for whom racial survival outside of a museum is still a nip-and-tuck question.

It is this economic exploitation, according to Mr. Price, and the strategic importance of the islands as an extension of the Japanese screen across the Pacific which begins with the Kurile Islands and stretches through the islands of Japan itself to below the Equator, which justifies calling them the stepping-stones of destiny in the Pacific. As counter to America's new thrust across the Pacific by air, Mr. Price reports, the Japanese are prepared to build a breakwater across the face of Asia as an impregnable defense for their lusty, growing empire.

"Cooperation between airplanes and a battle fleet protected by the harbors and hills of 2,550 islands and islets would give pause to the world's two greatest fleets combined," he writes. Fortifications can be built quickly when they are needed. "In the meantime, Japan, impelled by the surge of her population and the life-and-death necessity of export markets, talks too of 'crisis' and looks southward."

Japanese empire builders have not set too high a standard in recent years for economic foresight. But it may be doubted whether even the most ardent expansionists in Japan have any real hopes of settling their surplus population under the cocoanut trees of Micronesia. Of the 52,000 Japanese now living there, 60 per cent simply moved from the Loochoo Islands, where an earlier emigration project bred mouths faster than it created purchasing power with which to fill them. Saipan, center of the sugar industry, alone accounts for 40,000 of them. In 1935 the increase was only 12,000.

Nor is it probable that the great export houses of Tokyo and Osaka expect to strengthen Japan's trade balance either through the canned sardines and cotton loin cloths which the islanders buy or through any more distant trade for which these romantic islands could serve as shield. The explanation may rather be that there are still quick profits to be made from colonies, not by their governments but by the shrewder traders who operate behind the still serviceable front of an appeal to national destiny and imperial greatness.

Whatever the reasons for it, the issues sharpened by this new development of Japanese expansion in the Pacific remain the same. Patriots of race and nation in the United States have bent flimsier material than this to serve their ends. The Japanese menace will loom larger as facts reported in Mr. Price's story of his trip are repeated and distorted. Nor has the issue changed, as he makes abundantly clear, for the Micronesians. The best future for which the Kanakas can hope, he concludes, is absorption. For many of them, still unhonored by the anthropologists, there will be no record except Mr. Price's book, his excellent photographs, and the big round stones they use for money.

Booby Prize

I AM THE FOX. By Winifred Van Etten. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

TO PREACH sermons with prize novels for their text is not, I confess, very original, but when your moral sense is aroused it is difficult not to preach, and when a book is distinguished for nothing else but winning a prize it is difficult not to dwell on that lone distinction. This 1936 winner of the Atlantic $10,000 award seems to me just facile and plausible enough to be inordinately bad: a really superficial handling of things made worse by symptoms of pretentiousness, an elementary knowledge of story-telling confused by a desire to be fancy. In slickness it falls far short of the best models in its particular field: it reads like Dorothy Thomas on her worst off day or like one of those many novels which Phil Stong, prior to publishing "State Fair," is reported to have torn up.

"I Am the Fox" concerns Selma (I almost wrote Shirley) Temple, an Iowa girl, and certain experiences which befell her and her neighbors; experiences so memorable that when the man she loved proposed to her they reverted to her mind and made her hesitate. The man, in that moment, became a huntsman and she a fox. Many women, I agree, might hesitate at such a moment; many of them might be flooded with memories—so many, in fact, that the point is hardly worth dwelling on. Neither is the half-sentimental, half-hysterical identification with the fox. All that, far from striking us as a psychological revelation, is no more than the merest convention, only worth employing if the past events and emotions are themselves really significant. This novel fails utterly because they aren't, because they are unimpressive, unequivocal, almost ungermane. Proust in Iowa turns out to be some neat little shavings about a trip in a trailer, a repulsive soda-jerker, a middle-aged school teacher rushed off her feet and then dropped, two marital collisions having very little to do with Selma, and two men having not much more. That the vaguely defined but definitely priggish Selma should conceive of herself on such lean pickings as a harried fox, is decidedly grandiose; and Miss Van Etten might have saved the situation by using Selma as a figure for comedy. But Miss Van Etten's conception of Selma was exactly as grandiose, and there can be no question that she meant all this commonplace folklore to be thought of as highly upsetting drama.

How could any such book as this, whose only good point is that it is thoroughly readable, have won a prize? It is indeed a rhetorical question; we all know the answer. This kind of thing wins almost all the prizes: it is so satisfactorily safe. It is never more romantic than when running full-on into a "realistic" situation, it is slick in its very amateurishness, it is bold and modern in the way that the movies have become bold and modern; and for those who have heard tell of Virginia Woolf, there are some passages in italics which signify the Present and which sound about as natural as ventriloquism. As for style, in the midst of a colloquial passage this emerges: "Then spoke up a girl who had hitherto remained silent." As for endings, this closes on a note of tantalizing interrogation.

On second thought I won't preach a sermon, for I am in a mood of aut Savonarola aut nullus. I will only add, speaking of Atlantic $10,000 prizes, that in 1930 "no novel met the standards set by the judges and no award was made." Since then, I gather either new standards have been introduced, or new judges.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Property and the Middle Class

THE RESTORATION OF PROPERTY. By Hilaire Belloc. Sheed and Ward. $1.50.

THE MIDDLE CLASSES THEN AND NOW. By Franklin C. Palm. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

HILAIRE BELLOC'S advocacy of the "proprietary state" (based on widespread ownership of productive property) was always tied up with a great deal of obscurantism, especially with romantic-Catholic glorification of the Middle Ages and wistful yearning for a revival of their values and ideals. The obscurantism in the present book is, however, subordinate to a discussion of concrete proposals for the restoration of property. It is a significant discussion, for it shows the hopelessness of that restoration; and it should be an answer to the small group of American "agrarian" intellectuals who are under Belloc's influence.

Belloc admits the desperation of his position; he admits that it is too late to restore ownership of productive property on any considerable scale, and merely hopes that some restoration may be possible. "It is too late," he declares, "to reinfuse property by design; and our effort must everywhere be particular, local, and, in its origins at least, small." That declaration is amplified by the admission that "no restoration of property could be universal," the only possibility is a limited restoration "sufficient to determine the tone of society." But of what value would that "tone" be to the people, the great majority, who would still be deprived of property?

The first plank in the program for the restoration of property, an increase in the number of small farmers, storekeepers, and artisans, is admitted by Belloc himself to be of limited applicability in the modern world, especially in the case of artisans. The limited character of the proposal appears clearly in the United States. There are today not more than 6,500,000 independent farmers, owners of small enterprises of all types, and self-employed professionals (excluding about 2,000,000 small stockholders who are not owners of independent productive property). The "restoration" of property might add to that number 2,500,000 farmers who are now tenants, 500,000 small storekeepers (assuming the break-up of chain and department stores), and perhaps 500,000 professionals; 100,000 more might be added if manufacturing plants now under combined corporate ownership were segregated and placed under individual ownership; and, to be generous, another 400,000 in other fields of economic enterprise. That "restoration" would be savagely resisted by the vested interests, but assume the resistance broken, what then? Owners of independent productive property would have been increased by 4,000,000, making the total 10,500,000; there are, however, 52,000,000 persons gainfully occupied, most of whom would still be propertyless dependents on the property of a small minority and, consequently, deprived of the liberty which Hilaire Belloc identifies with property.

Since it is impossible to restore property under modern conditions, Belloc desperately includes in his program two proposals that are not a restoration of property; for by property he means individual ownership of the means of production, the ownership of one's own independent means of livelihood. One proposal is to multiply small stockholders "in enterprises necessarily large." But those stockholders would not be individual owners of productive property; they would still be dependent on jobs, and experience shows that it is futile to expect any great diffusion of corporate ownership. (There were never, in the pre-1929 American prosperity, more than 5,000,000 stockholders out of 48,000,000 persons gainfully occupied.) The other proposal is that large enterprises should be owned by guilds or the state, preferably the former. But that, again, is not independent individual ownership of means of production and of livelihood; it is collective ownership, a revival of the petty-bourgeois socialism urged repeatedly—and unsuccessfully—by middle-class radicals for one hundred years. Futility piled on desperation!

Nor is Hilaire Belloc consistent. He rejects socialism and communism because they would mean bureaucracy, yet he admits that his own proposals cannot "be undertaken or continued without the use of state power . . . we shall have to extend, for the moment, bureaucratic action."

All Belloc hopes for is some slight increase of the middle class, "the spokesman for property." But that class has been waging a losing struggle for survival, as appears in Franklin C. Palm's "The Middle Classes." The facts and conclusion of that struggle are not driven home, but they are there in the material. This material is of the utmost factual interest, and some of it is not elsewhere easily available. The book starts with a brief sketch of the ancient "bourgeoisie"—without, however, sufficiently differentiating it from the modern capitalist variety—and traces the development of the new bourgeoisie, which arose in the twilight of European feudalism, from the early struggles in Italy and Holland through the English and French revolutions, up to the present. But while the factual material is always interesting, it is informed with no real historical or theoretical understanding of the forces involved. At times Palm uses the term "middle class" to designate the whole bourgeoisie, at other times to designate only that "certain section" which is the petty bourgeoisie or middle class. Hence, while the material makes clear the antagonism between the big bourgeoisie and the middle class, the importance of that antagonism is not indicated in terms of the middle-class struggle for survival. Nor is it indicated in terms of political theory and ideology; as, for example, in the difference between the liberalism of the big bourgeoisie and the democracy of the middle class. In addition, unfortunately, there are many historical errors and slipshod generalizations, some of them contradicted by facts in the book itself.

More important, however, is the confusion about the "new" middle class. Palm says that Karl Marx showed that the Industrial Revolution had created a new middle class, the petty bourgeoisie, which is nonsense, as Marx recognized the much earlier existence of a petty bourgeoisie. The new middle class is confused with the old, for Palm's definition of the former makes it include owners of independent enterprises, salaried employees, and professionals. Then Palm completes the circle of confusion by denying there is any new middle class, because, he argues, salaried employees and professionals have been "one of the mainstays of the middle classes for centuries." But they were formerly a small minority in the middle class, whose majority was composed of owners of independent enterprises; the increase in their numbers (they are now three times more numerous than those engaged on their own enterprises) and the changes in their social-economic status entitle salaried employees and professionals to be called a new middle class. Most important—and there is no recognition of this in Mr. Palm's book—is the fact that the masses of lower-salaried employees and professionals are economically a new proletariat, their interests identified with those of the working class. Whether or not that condition is recognized and the political and organizational conclusions are implemented in action may prove crucial in the struggle for democracy and socialism against the menace of fascism.

LEWIS COREY

Perverse Romanticism

NO LETTERS FOR THE DEAD. By Gale Wilhelm. Random House. $2.

THE best and worst qualities of Miss Wilhelm's first novel are present in about equal proportions in the second. She feels and communicates emotion, but the emotion is imputed to the tenuously realized creatures of a perverse modern romanticism. Miss Wilhelm derived so many thrills from positing the most exquisite woman she was able to conceive as a prostitute that she neglected to make the titillating story credible. A cultivated sensitive woman might conceivably support herself by frequenting low drinking places to entice two-dollar-a-night customers, but the story of just how she could bring herself to such a step would be a story in itself, and Miss Wilhelm fails to tell it.

Koni and Paula are unmarried lovers living in New York, and Koni journeys to California to beg his wife to divorce him. On the same day that Paula sees her three-year-old son die, she learns that Koni's wife has killed herself, with Koni the only witness. Koni is sentenced to San Quentin for a number of years on the vague ground that he might have prevented Georgia from killing herself. To be near him, to breathe the same air and look at the same sunsets, Paula goes out to San Francisco, traveling in a private compartment purchased for her by Ralph, a devoted friend of hers and Koni's. She is a pianist with excellent recommendations, but fails to find any kind of work and exhausts her savings in the search. Therefore she lives by offering her body to chance buyers. That this solution of the problem of food was not the only possible one, particularly in view of Ralph, neither Paula nor her creator seems to have considered. Why let dry things like logic and reason interfere with a step so exquisitely harrowing to a sensitive soul? In alternate paragraphs we follow Paula's nightly essays in disgust and read her love letters to Koni in prison, until a wealthy purchaser buys her with the sinister words, "A man who can pay for what he wants can ask for anything in the world." And behold, the sinister man of wealth sets her up in a beautiful apartment with a beautiful view, a perfect servant, and so much money that she can make a little nest egg to take Koni on a voyage when at last he shall be released. She lives in poignant expectation of that event, constantly striving for identification with Koni, who is killed a few days before his release in a scrimmage attendant on a jail break.

Miss Wilhelm knows love and suffering. She has been deeply moved by beauty and can paint quick glimpses of lovely things she has seen. "San Francisco grew steep and gray out of thin lavender haze. Gradually the water was

IT comes as a startling fact to many couples who THINK they are well-informed, that they ARE in REALITY, AMAZINGLY IGNORANT OF THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE. "When no trouble is taken to learn how to make sexual intercourse harmonious and happy, a variety of complications arise. Very often wives remain sexually unawakened, and therefore inclined to dislike sexual intercourse. When that happens, husbands do not experience what they long for, and are apt to be sexually starved. Neither husbands nor wives on these terms attain to harmony, and the result is nervous ill-health. . . The cause of all this is not want of love. It is want of knowledge."—A. H. Gray, M.A., D.D.

"FROM a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly." Many men feel bitter, in a resigned sort of way, about their "frigid wives." As a matter of fact this problem, which too often is one of the "bungling husband," frequently vanishes completely when both husband and wife know exactly what to do for each other. In THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE, Dr. Hutton describes the sexual act in such detail that no one need any longer remain in ignorance of exactly how it should be performed. In the foreword to this work Dr. Ira S. Wile declares: "A knowledge of the science of mating offers greater assurance of successful marriage."

WHILE completely frank, Dr. Hutton handles the subject with excellent taste, and, as the American Medical Association says, "with good judgment as to what constitutes general medical opinion."

The Sex Technique in Marriage is a book for husbands and wives to read together, if they wish to remain together!

patched with moving sunlight and gulls hung white and motionless in the air like painted birds." This is delightful, but several hundred other young writers can do as well. Miss Wilhelm has pushed her way out of the struggling mass solely because of the nature of the themes she has treated in her two books. Her selection of the first might be imputed either to an eye on the box-office or to brave candor. The second is completely meretricious.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Amateurs of Jazz

HOT JAZZ: THE GUIDE TO SWING MUSIC. By Hugues Panassié. Translated by Lyle and Eleanor Dowling. M. Witmark and Sons. $5.

THE scene is never without its subject of confused conversation and ignorant journalism; and at the moment the subject is the hot jazz that was discussed in a recent Records column of this magazine (hot jazz is, among other things, the jazz with "swing"; and "swing," it turns out, is not to be defined, but only to be recognized). To the present fad we owe the American publication of Panassié's book—and its exorbitant price; but the book itself we owe to the author's understanding and love of the music.

At present the record companies are not only issuing anything and everything as "swing classics" but ransacking their files for records of the genuine classics; not so long ago, however, these old records were being cut from the catalogues and the masters destroyed for lack of sufficient sales. In that period they were bought and cherished only by a small number of people here and abroad—the people now organized in Hot Clubs, whose interest in this music is fanatical and whose reactions to it are astonishing. They can recognize every player by subtle characteristics of his playing style; from such characteristics they can tell when a record was made: he played this way early in 1931, before he had heard another player for the first time, and that way a few months later, under the influence of the other player; they listen with an intensity, a visible sensitiveness to the player's slightest inflection, that one does not observe in Carnegie Hall.

Their reaction, in fact, is excessive for what they are reacting to; and excess characterizes their entire attitude toward the music. W. J. Turner says of the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" that "to hear it is as though one had been present at a miracle and had seen a mountain of matter blown into a transparent bubble and float vanishing into the sky"; and later he observes that the Overture to "The Magic Flute" is a greater work only because "more matter has been involved in the operation; it was a bigger and more difficult bubble to blow." But even the best-equipped of the commentators on hot jazz—and I am thinking now of those who are sensitive to Mozart as well as to Louis Armstrong, of a man like Panassié—fail to realize that the best jazz player blows exquisite bubbles which are considerably smaller than Mozart's. Not only do they react visibly to jazz as no one reacts to Mozart, but they indulge in critical extravagance—like crediting Szigeti with qualities approximating those of the best Negro jazz players, or saying, as Panassié does, that "Louis Armstrong is not only a genius in his own art, but is one of the most extraordinary creative geniuses that all music has ever known."

Only occasionally, however, does Panassié disturb one with this sort of thing. Most of the time one is impressed not only by his authority and taste, but by sobriety, dignity, and unpretentiousness that are exceptional in this field of criticism. He discusses the characteristics of the hot style, describes the styles of the best players, devotes a chapter to the principal orchestras, another to the men who create arrangements of tunes for the orchestras, and one to the unique relation between the creative talent of Duke Ellington and the playing styles of the members of his orchestra. He illustrates constantly with references to records; at the end he gives a list of records on which the best performances of the players can be heard. And he does all this in a way that convinces one of the worth and importance of the music he is writing about, and makes one eager to hear it—which is what such a book should do.

B. H. HAGGIN

From the Underground in Germany

FIRES UNDERGROUND. By Heinz Liepmann. Translated by R. T. Clark. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

HEINZ LIEPMANN is not a member of the great guild of successful writers who dig into the past in order to escape the present—those men of skill without convictions but with royalties and pleasant country places who write biographies of queens and kings, of medieval popes and reformers. Heinz Liepmann, on the day when Hitler came into power, had neither name nor real success. Until that day he had been primarily interested in the human soul. He knew nothing about social forces, about the masses, about the sources of contradictions in modern society. Even a few months ago when I saw him last, in a small room of a little hotel on Broadway (he was in this country to lecture against fascism and to collect money for the underground movement in Germany), he was full of reservations. He was fighting a political fight, but he did not want to be a politician. He is no Communist, no Socialist, no democrat. He is just a human being, and by this frequently misused term I mean a moral personality. And so on the day Hitler came to power he left his poet's garret in Hamburg to become an active member of the underground movement. He endured all the hardships an underground worker has to endure under a dictatorship. He was caught, beaten, and seriously injured, but he escaped, was taken on an American oil tanker, and managed to reach France. Now he is living in exile in England.

Of his personal sufferings you will find no word in this book. "Fires Underground" describes the organization of the underground movement of the Communists and Socialists in Hamburg from the very beginning. Liepmann does not invent. He gives a detailed account of the ways and means by which the anti-fascists built up an organization despite a cruel terror, treachery, lack of funds, and the weaknesses only too likely to be betrayed by human beings living constantly on the threshold of death. His story is true; he does not dramatize it. There is no romantic red-flag waving; there is only reality. As the hero Otto, the leader of the movement, says to an American journalist:

You and your friend aren't Communists; you are correspondents of bourgeois papers, but you try to be objective. Publicly and privately you hear only what your opponents think. I won't try to convince you and convert you to communism. But we want decent opponents. What I want is to show the English and the Americans that we aren't "organized banditry" but ordinary decent people like yourselves. We've got wives and families; we are poor or not so poor; we have colds just like you, and some of us wear spectacles and some don't. We aren't superhuman; we aren't subhuman. We are men with a belief. What I would like is to see the Americans and the English treat us not as bogies to scare the bourgeois, but as people who represent a new revelation. We do differ from you in that we dream of a definite happier future for our children. We'll never attain it, but our children will, and so will the children of our enemies. That's why we are ready to suffer. Fight us if you will, but respect us, really respect us.

There are in the first part of the book chapters which are too sparse for the average reader, who always looks for the unexpected and for more than there is. But his patience will be rewarded later on. The betrayal of the underground leader by his own wife, who loves him dearly, and his capture make great copy. The description of the first May Day under Hitler is the best description I know of in the whole literature.

This book is by no means a work of art. Its composition is hasty. The background of the leading characters is sketchy. But it is an honest attempt to write contemporary history. It is more, for all its shortcomings do not count against the great moral passion which animates it.

After eleven months in a concentration camp a friend of mine escaped abroad. After he had been eight days in freedom he shot himself. He left a note for us to say he had not realized that the outside world was so indifferent—that ministers, men of honor, human beings shake hands with bloody murderers.

I recommend this book, especially to all those editors of the daily press who are responsible for the presentation of the news from Germany, Italy, and Spain.

FRANZ HÖLLERING

A Topical Novel

GREEN GATES. By R. C. Sherriff. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

THE value of Mr. Sherriff's novel is an incidental value and one removed, properly, from the sphere to which literary criticism is restricted. It is that of subject matter: the predicament arising at a man's retirement from business on a small pension. Thomas Baldwin, retired at fifty-eight after forty-one years' service in a London insurance house, thinks he can remain active and interested where others have failed; the first hundred pages present a circumstantial account of the way in which he fails also, variously and miserably, disrupting as well the orderly, long-accustomed lives of his wife, Edith, and their old servant. The problem is, as usual, briefly stated ("A brain that has been hungrily aware of life for sixty years is stored to its capacity: a man . . . cannot clear it out and fill it with new stock of a different shape and size. The old fittings are simply not made to take them . . ."), but in its conscientious chronicling, incident by incident, it attains a disturbing fulness and significance. Here again is a form of ritual, contemporary stultifying specialization, transforming the modes of action beyond the power of animal will to alter or to renew. These early pages may be read with profit for substance alone, much as a newspaper account is read, as a document of despair.

The rest of the book is sentimental and tedious elaboration. There are no characters—Mr. Sherriff is apparently interested here only in typical action and response—and no "fundamental values of human happiness," as the publishers hope; there are only careless, incorrect writing and banal optimism. Some appalling rhetoric at the point when the Baldwins leave their old house for the varnished dream "Greengates" is particularly surprising from the author of the concise, unsentimental "Journey's End."

IN THE SHADOW OF TOMORROW

by J. Huizinga

In this bold and searching analysis of the cultural temper of our times the distinguished Professor of History at Leyden University presents the evidence to prove that in no other period have the changes in the political structure been as fundamental as those occurring since 1914. He compares the crises of our times with the great disturbances of other times and indicates what may lie in the shadow of tomorrow. $2.50.

IS all serene in Germany? Has Hitler really won over the country to his views? Is his persecution of the Jews lessening?

Here is a true narrative (with real names concealed, of course) of the struggle to the death that is even now going on between the Socialist and Communist parties and the Nazis. Here is a tale of terror, of spying and counter spying, of dungeons crawling with humanity, of secret and sudden death that has slipped through the barrier of strict censorship to refute Hitler's claim of a united Germany.

Carleton Beals says: "I do not know of any book that tells the intimate story of the Hitler terror so simply and dramatically and movingly as Fires Underground. It deserves a wide audience."

THE SOUTH LOOKS AT ITS PAST. By B. B. Kendrick and A. M. Arnett. University of North Carolina Press. $2.

THE later portions of this book, dealing with the recent South, are objective and illuminating, with much to contribute even to the most acquainted reader. The earlier part often sounds like an apology for the South. The authors strongly tend to discountenance the designation "poor whites" as applying to a very numerous class in the Old South, and try to build up a case for the presence and influence of "yeomen." This is familiar allegation, but, as often before, the proof is rather lacking. Indeed, Professors Kendrick and Arnett go on, in later portions of the book, to take for granted huge masses of poor whites whose existence they earlier denied. Thus: "The labor supply for the textile mills [post-bellum, of course] was drawn almost entirely from the poorest class of whites; mainly the landless, drifting 'croppers' and hangers-on, with a few of the marginal and submarginal proprietor-farmer type." They proceed, not very convincingly, to qualify this admission, but at other times they speak of the large class of "farm tenants and croppers, little better than peons in 'normal' times, hard-hit by the depression, . . ." and they reflect, with reference to recent governmental policy, that "subsistence farmers . . . would be better off than millions of croppers have been for two generations." How should there be fewer poor whites under slavery than since?

The Negroes, as such, are strangely omitted from discussion. When these authors speak of "the Southern way of life" they are thinking only of the white way of life, and at that of the planter-class way of life. The book tends to lead away from the truth that the fundamental fact in the Old South (and in the new!) is chattel slavery. Nothing is said of the recently invented cotton picker, or of the likelihood that this machine constitutes truly "the impending crisis of the South."

BROADUS MITCHELL

Queen Victoria

VICTORIA OF ENGLAND. By Edith Sitwell. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $3.50.

MISS SITWELL disarms criticism by announcing that she is deeply indebted to practically everyone who has written on Queen Victoria and her times; and so indeed she is. She is indebted to Messrs. Strachey, Benson, Housman, Fulford, Hardie, to the Letters and Journals of the Queen, to numerous other Memoirs and Letters, to Friedrich Engels's "Condition of the Working Class in England in 1844," and to a whole library of biographies, social histories, and the like. Industiously she has culled what is best and sometimes what is worst in each, so that her book cannot fail to be interesting, and somewhat astonishing in its anthological brilliance and its lack of constructive unity. The Stracheyan style is dominant and certain Stracheyan indulgences are in evidence, such as an intimate knowledge of the Queen's thoughts on crucial occasions, and her vision of her girlhood on her last drive, which is strikingly similar to the famous backward glance on the Stracheyan deathbed. But Miss Sitwell's idiosyncrasies of style and mood also pervade the volume, and are concentrated in a striking technique in the chapter, March Past, in which she dramatizes the woes of England's working classes as Engels portrayed them, marshaling a terrifying pageant of industrial exploitation, disease, and death with that virtuosity formerly expended on England's Eccentrics and the quaint and queer superficialities of a bygone day. In another chapter, Fashionable Intelligence, we have the technique applied to the more usual type of material: long lists of diaphanous textiles, pages of enchanting names of cosmetics, a lyric intermezzo of wistful frivolity. Compare these two chapters and you will see why this is a panorama rather than a book, a series of sharply posed and fascinating scenes, chosen for their effectiveness, a remarkable synthesis that is not a blend. The subjects are without any special coherence, the technique's the thing. There are no new insights; there are elaboration and arrangement, the special idiom, and the skilful producer's gift of arresting presentation.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

Shorter Notices

FIFTY-FIVE MEN. By Fred Rodell. The Telegraph Press. $2.50.

This little book, the story of the making of the American Constitution for "school children and politicians" is the best popular account of the work of the Founding Fathers which has yet been written. It has all the refreshing charm and deceptive simplicity which characterize the work of the Russian Ilin. The book could hardly be more timely. The Liberty Leaguers have been attempting to revive the Constitution worship of the past for campaign purposes. But Rodell, who is himself a scholar, basing himself upon the work of such pioneers as J. Allen Smith and Charles Beard retells the old story in such a way as to make it beautifully clear that the Founding Fathers were no divinely inspired agents but all too human business men and politicians whose object was to curb the revolutionary excesses of their own time and to fashion a frame of government which should make democratic government impossible while at the same time maintaining its external forms. The very atmosphere in which the Founding Fathers did their work is reproduced with remarkable intimacy from the pages of James Madison's journal of the Constitutional Conventions. It is to be regretted, however, that the realism with which the patristic period itself is treated is not preserved in the sequel. Surprisingly enough Mr. Rodell ends his story by attempting to show how the Constitution in recent decades has been brought "closer and closer to democracy."

WILLIAM SEAGLE

FINLAND: THE NEW NATION. By Agnes Rothery. The Viking Press. $3.

Finland is old, but it did not become a nation until 1919, when the Finns won their freedom after a bloody struggle with Russia and with the "reds" inside their borders. The response of the Finns to their world status is the theme of Agnes Rothery's book. She emphasizes the effect of nationalism on the development of industry, agriculture, forestry, the arts, and all phases of social life. This growth of a national spirit has resulted in remarkable achievements, especially in music, architecture, and athletics by such figures as Sibelius, Saarinen, and Nurmi. That Finland has paid her war debt shows the soundness of her economy. The cooperative movement has curbed the capitalists and prevented monopolies. But nationalism is not all clover, as Miss Rothery might have easily shown by citing the suppression of Communists, and the discrimination against the half-million Swedes living on the south and west coast. The book is full of general information, it is illustrated, and has an index and complete bibliography; yet when we finish reading it, we wonder how much

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES A SERIES BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH ON How Dead Is Liberalism?

Two years ago Joseph Wood Krutch, an editor of The Nation, wrote a series of articles entitled "Was Europe a Success?" which achieved wide popularity. Since then Mr. Krutch's contributions to The Nation have been limited by the pressure of his other activities to dramatic criticism and single articles concerned chiefly with the arts.

Beginning in September, however, Mr. Krutch will write another series of three, possibly four, articles which we believe Nation readers will find even more stimulating than his last.

While traveling in Europe this summer Mr. Krutch visited many distinguished French and English intellectuals, including André Malraux, Ralph Fox, T. S. Eliot, Rebecca West, and Bertrand Russell. Bearing in mind the fact that nearly all of Europe is either communist or fascist, to each of his hosts Mr. Krutch proposed a specific question: "Precisely what do you understand by the statement 'Liberalism is dead?' How much is dead and just how dead is it?"

The series will synthesize the replies and present a composite view of what representative thinkers believe about the present status of the various elements which make up the liberal philosophy.

"Innocent Merriment"

ORDINARILY I think of myself as one more than commonly fond of those works which Mr. Sullivan composed in resentful collaboration with Mr. Gilbert. Long ago convinced that they were the best comic operas in the world, I seldom miss an opportunity to see any one of them performed, and I can whistle most of the tunes with reasonable accuracy. If you add that I have read most of the books about the pair and that I can quote as many apt phrases from the libretti as I can from "Hamlet," is it, I ask, any wonder that I should think of myself as a member of the inner circle? But there are moments when I realize that I am, on the contrary, a rank outsider, that there is "a transcendentalism of delirium —an acute accentuation of a supremest ecstasy" to which I am a stranger.

One such moment occurred on Thursday evening, September 20, when the D'Oyly Carte company of London began with "The Mikado" a season at the Martin Beck. To those who heard the troupe two years ago I need hardly remark that the performance was very nearly perfect, but I am sure that others beside myself were even more struck by the fact that the audience was absolutely so. It was composed in almost equal proportions of what is commonly called, even at this season of the year, "the ermine-coat trade" and what might with equal propriety be denominated "the feather-boas contingent"—by which I mean those who have not been to the theater except to see Gilbert and Sullivan since 1880. And this audience sat in a rapt attention while plainly manifesting precisely that "transcendentalism of delirium" which "the earthy might easily mistake for indigestion" but which "is not indigestion —it is aesthetic transfiguration." The overture passed in a silence which the Metropolitan Opera House has never known during the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" or the Good Friday Spell, and the first notes of every renowned passage were greeted with all the eager recognition of a perfect Wagnerite signifying his awareness of a leitmotif.

It would take too long to indicate all the qualifications which are requisite to those who aspire to the title of Real Savoyard, but there are two to which I must briefly allude.
One must, first of all, possess an absolute familiarity with every note, while, by a power temporarily to suspend familiarity corresponding to the more famous "temporary suspension of unbelief," one must be surprised at any aptness; so that, to take an example, one must be able to gasp with delight when "imperfect ablutioner" rhymes with "Lord High Executioner" exactly as though one did not know that the thing was inevitable. In the second place, one must greet any slight deviation from sacred convention with judiciously reserved approval. Thus when the Mikado asks the whereabouts of his missing son and Ko-Ko, instead of saying "Knightsbridge," as the text provides, says "Jones Beach," one must reserve decision. Gilbert did occasionally permit the modernization of topical allusions, but he was chary of them, and I am sure that the discussion of the point went well into the night. Indeed, I should not wonder if a few lifelong friendships were wrecked upon irreconcilable differences of opinion.

But to return to the performance. I can only say that I shall attend as often as the manager sends me tickets.

Letters to the Editors

"GONE WITH THE WIND"

Dear Sirs: Having looked through the Margaret Mitchell novel, "Gone with the Wind," I turned back to Miss Evelyn Scott's review of it, in your issue of July 4. Her verdict is not entirely favorable, to be sure; but the bad writing and unreal characters are touched on by her in a manner to suggest that they are merely casual blemishes. On the contrary, I think that many Nation readers will find that "Gone with the Wind," as a literary performance, is far below the standard usually maintained by your reviewers. In my opinion, plot, characters, and situations are all heavily imbued with cliché, and the writing is correspondingly dull and grubby.

As for content and implications, Miss Scott writes: "The verifiable happenings described eloquently justify [Southern] prejudice." I do not agree. To justify such a piece of roaring Ku Klux Klanism, historically untrue and insulting to the Negroes, an artistic miracle would be necessary. And artistic miracles do not occur in connection with such unholy ideologies. "Gone with the Wind" is already a best-seller and probably no human agency can now keep it from becoming a national calamity. But The Nation, in its editorial columns, might well make an effort against it.

OUR COCK-EYED PREJUDICE

Dear Sirs: Regarding your animadversions concerning Dr. Frederic S. Fleming and his proposed moratorium on preaching (it was a kind of back-handed compliment you handed out to him and all parsons), it has always puzzled me why you folks on our radical journals have such a cock-eyed prejudice against organized religion and churches. Those of us who take your paper and relish it wonder why this is. Most of the real support for the forward movement in this country comes from ministers and their followers. These ministers may give vent on Sundays to more or less perfervid oratory—though that is dying out rapidly—but most of them write their sermons first and so are really in the same class with you fellows on The Nation—with this exception: if you had to read aloud to an audience what some of you write, sometimes you might have to think a little more before you came to your readings.

Dear Sirs: The Nation indorses a recommendation for a two-year moratorium on sermons. I wish it could see its way clear to indorse a recommendation for a moratorium on editorials in The Nation during Presidential years. . . .

CHALLENGE TO DR. MOULTON

Dear Sirs: Very likely Dr. Moulton flivvered his study, "The Distribution of Wealth," as badly as Mr. Corey says he did, in your issue of August 1. But at least his idea is to get some remedial action that can be carried out within five years instead of the century Mr. Corey would take to "move beyond capitalism." So, before we are all dead, why not give Dr. Moulton a few constructive suggestions and ask him to go about one-third the way back and run through his exercises again?

1. Tell us how large a slice of the 1929 income must be transferred from the wealthy over-savers and whether it is not much less than the depression losses of these same people. Such detailed examination may find the human problem of selfishness and inertia—much more basic than economic technique—to be less formidable than generally feared.

2. Once the scope of the job is thus defined, give some real study to taxation and wage increases as methods of making the transfer. The normal tax bill—federal, state, and municipal—probably exceeds the amount Dr. Moulton wants to transfer—no new spending projects are necessary. And as to wages: conceding, with mental reservations, that only organized workers can get increases, consider whether such spendings on consumers' goods will not rapidly permeate the entire community, assuming that taxation and wage increases prevent excess saving from prematurely drying up the circulation of money. Add a little study of production costs and wage systems to test the effectiveness of Dr. Moulton's own suggestion that wage increases be paid as a quarterly or annual bonus from the fund now used exclusively for profits, thus leaving competitive costs undisturbed.

3. Instead of trying to start mass production and low prices before balancing income by tax and wage reforms, study the possibility that a balanced income will set up a consumers' demand that will make mass production possible and automatic. And check over the probability that a mass-production boom with excessive profits and over-saving will, unless maldistribution of income is first corrected, head us into a worse depression than this.

It strikes me that after a long and careful statistical analysis of our economic disease Dr. Moulton gave his remedies only a few thoughtful guesses. With a real study of his remedies he looks pretty close to a compensating adjustment that may restore much of what Salter called "the miraculous self-adjusting quality of our economic system."

PAGING FATHER COUGHLIN

Dear Sirs: The Nation is to be congratulated in that Anita Brenner's article on Spain cuts through all the hypocrisy which characterizes the news dispatches to our papers, where everything is done to put the Vatican and the Catholic church in the position of innocent sufferers instead of cold-blooded aggressors who would restore all the old tyranny of church over state and set up an oligarchy reducing the Spanish workers and peasants to the level of peons.

Why does not The Nation ask Father Coughlin, who has escaped all discipline from Rome because he is supposed to stand for the papal labor encyclicals, why he urges the encyclicals as the rule of action for the United States when it is plain that no Catholic country in Europe bothers its head about them? . . .

SOUTHERN REBELLION

Dear Sirs: In your issue of July 25 Louis Adamic proposed for your 1936 Honor Roll the writer of an editorial on the Negro's rights as a citizen which appeared in the Richmond Times Dispatch. The writer was Virginius Dabney.

Mr. Dabney is civilized, liberal, and courageous. He deserves to be on any number of honor rolls. But I doubt whether that particular editorial required the tremendous courage Mr. Adamic thinks it did. Actually, believe it or not, Mr. Dabney is not the only Virginian who is anxious to have the Negro "improve his business, educational, economic, and political status"; and there must be thousands of us who were disgusted by Senator Smith's preposterous behavior at the Democratic National Convention. I certainly have heard no one approve it. No, there was not the slightest danger of Mr. Dabney's being lynched or even ostracized after writing that editorial. . . .

Why don't you and Mr. Adamic spend a vacation in Virginia sometime, so that you needn't continue to think of Mr. Dabney as a voice crying in the wilderness?

LOOKING TO 1940

Dear Sirs: The question of a 1940 third party has perplexed me. Louis Adamic wrote two articles on the La Follettes and mentioned the possibilities of the Progressives. John Strachey and Carmen Haider say Phil is a potential fascist. . . .

I do not believe in violence. I think Phil La Follette would be a good third-party President. Do you? The way the Communists fling "fascism" around, one doesn't know what the word means. I define it as government by violence. Therefore I think Strachey and Haider are mistaken. What do you think?

HOW TO ABOLISH CRIME

Dear Sirs: Letters published in The Nation concerning crime and parole have suggested to me a solution for the crime problem, so simple and scientific that the mind of a high official or police officer should be able to comprehend it. It is to apprehend the criminal and place him in confinement a few days before he commits the crime instead of some time afterward. This plan would not only prevent most crimes, but it would greatly lessen the expense attached to this branch of justice. The prospective criminal could be more easily caught before the act, as he pursued his unsuspecting path of peace, than after, when he would be on his guard. And court costs would be eliminated.

C.W.H.

P. S. Since getting this inspiration I learn that the plan is meeting with great success in Germany and Italy.

BIRTH CONTROL BY PREVENTION

Dear Sirs: . . . The very prevalence of the practice of abortion indicates the determination of the modern wife and mother to regulate child-bearing in accordance with the demands of her health and economic circumstances. It seems grossly unfair that her personal physician should so often refuse the responsibility of teaching her how to avoid conception until it is desired. "Practicing Physician" has dismissed the subject of effective contraception with a nonchalance quite characteristic of his profession. . . .

Dear Sirs: If there were a Pulitzer prize for the best magazine coverage of world and national events, The Nation would win hands down. You are rendering an invaluable service to the progress of American political thought.

DR. HJALMAR SCHACHT'S VISIT TO PARIS IS closely in line with the implication behind Thomas Lamont's statement of a week ago—that France and Germany are about to settle their differences at the expense of the Soviet Union. It is evident that Hitler is making a desperate and not wholly unsuccessful effort to offset anti-Nazi sentiment by launching a vigorous drive to "save Europe from communism." The situation in Spain, where the Communist and Socialist parties are supporting the government in a valiant struggle against reaction, gives timeliness to the attack. Schacht had nothing very tangible to offer France in the way of trade concessions, but his pointed assurance that the latest rearmament measures were directed not against France but against the Soviet Union could not fail to make an impression in French conservative circles. If we could have assurance that the Popular Front would retain office for another year, this development need give little concern. But the situation in France is by no means as auspicious as it was a few months ago. Recent reports indicate that the middle-class supporters of the Radical Socialists are becoming increasingly apprehensive over the rising costs imposed by the government's reform program. Barring immediate devaluation, a number of small businesses are likely to be driven to the wall in the coming months, creating an atmosphere not unlike that which existed in Germany in 1932. Whether the Blum government, paralyzed by legalistic and parliamentary scruples, will rouse itself in face of danger is an open question. It will have to act soon if it is to act at all.

WHEN PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT SET OUT ON his non-political tour of the drought areas he left his political fences in thoroughly competent hands. He had scarcely reached the Dakotas when the doughty Ickes, speaking over the radio in Washington, took the hide off Landon, tacked it up to dry, and scrawled William Randolph Hearst across it. Specifically, Mr. Ickes produced a memorandum from Mr. Hearst to George F. Harding, newly elected Republican National Committeeman for Illinois, in which Mr. Hearst made all too clear his intimate relationship with the Republican candidate at least in the last days of June. Since then, to be sure, Mr. Landon has come out against the teachers' oath which is one of Mr. Hearst's favorite patriotic playthings. On the other hand, Mr. Landon's Buffalo speech was mainly a denunciation of the tax on corporation surpluses, a piece of legislation which Mr. Hearst particularly detested and which no doubt looms larger in his mind than oaths for mere teachers. In this speech Mr. Landon again identified himself with the pure and simple school of economics immortalized by Calvin Coolidge.

THE FISCAL POLICY OF ROOSEVELT LEAVES much to be desired, but from what we hear of the Kansas schools we fervently hope that the sphere of operations of the Kansas Koolidge will never be enlarged. The indications are that it will not be. At this writing Roosevelt seems stronger than at any time since the election season opened. His trip into the West will undoubtedly have a great political effect, largely because his assertion that it is non-political is at least half true. The decline of the Townsend influence is definitely indicated in the recent California results. Moreover, the overwhelming victories of Senators Harrison and Byrnes in their respective states—Byrnes polled more than 200,000 votes after campaigning on his record as a New Dealer as against 32,000 for the two opposing candidates—are significant even though the South's support of Roosevelt was not doubted. Another straw in the wind is the fact that the Baltimore Sun has swung to Roosevelt and even the New York Times is manifesting an unwonted editorial glow for the Democratic candidate. In general the newspapers seem to have decided that the die is cast. We hope, however, that what looks like certain victory will not prevent further forays by Mr. Ickes. His characterization of Mr. Landon as the "strong silenced man" is worthy of companion pieces.

THE APPOINTMENT OF WILLIAM BULLITT TO succeed Jesse Isidor Straus as American Ambassador to France does not get our undiluted praise. At the present moment the Paris post is probably the most important in the whole diplomatic service. Policies are being evolved in France today which will ultimately affect the future of world democracy. With a left government in power America's ambassador should be a man who can work in reasonably close harmony with the leaders of French political life. He should be a man who by experience and temperament has shown indisputably that he can handle men of all political persuasions. Mr. Straus, although far from a Socialist, appears to have adjusted himself to the situation admirably. His embassy staff is reported to have been one of the most efficient in Europe. Mr. Bullitt, on the other hand, is unlikely to be acceptable either to the left or the extreme right. As the New York Herald Tribune accurately points out, his former pro-Soviet sympathies make him distrusted by the conservatives while his present violent antipathy to communism ill fits him for a post in a country in which friendship for the Soviet Union is the cornerstone of its foreign policy. Responsible observers have reported that the American embassy in Moscow is practically isolated from the main currents of Soviet political life. The American people cannot afford to have the same thing happen in Paris.

THE FAR EAST, ITS TROUBLES, CONFLICTS, hopes, and fears received a thorough scientific airing at the sixth conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations. A meeting of the institute is never a mere good-will get-together of official representatives who, with one eye on home consumption, indulge in badinage about international brotherhood. It is rather a discussion by scholars and statesmen, in the hard, cold light of realism, based on several years of research along a program laid down in advance. It is only such talk as this that can uncover the basic causes of friction. At the Yosemite conference Dr. Hu Shih, China's leading philosopher and political thinker, stated bluntly why Japan could never hope for that "cooperation" it wants from China while it still plans further aggression. The Japanese delegation, led by the former Foreign Minister and possible future Prime Minister, Kenkichi Yoshizawa, said openly that Japan contemplated the use of force in its relations with China and the U.S.S.R. James G. MacDonald of the United States, former head of the Foreign Policy Association and League High Commissioner, told the conference a hard truth when he said that no realistic settlement of Far Eastern difficulties could ever be reached without recognition of what Japan calls its "special position" in China. General Sir Kenneth Wigram of Great Britain gave no uncertain warning to Japan that his country was prepared to maintain its imperial responsibilities in the Pacific to the full. These may be unpleasant realities to face. But here, and not in idealistic platitudes, is the stuff, if it is anywhere, that makes for international understanding.

MR. HEARST'S DRUG WORLD, WHICH HAS been conducting a campaign against "Facts and Frauds in Feminine Hygiene" (referred to in The Nation of August 1), published in its issue of July 31 two interesting letters, with an editorial exegesis. The first was signed by a Katherine S. Bixler, who asked to be entered as a subscriber to Drug World. The second was on its face considerably less harmless. It read:

If you were to investigate the personnel division of the Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., you would probably find that the coauthor of a recent book on feminine hygiene, which you lambasted a few weeks ago, is drawing pay from Uncle Sam. Better look up another person in the same division, named B——, who probably got her the job.

A READER

Striking facts about the communications which were pointed out by the editor of Drug World are that they both were written on penny postcards and both were postmarked Easton, Pennsylvania. What Drug World did not add is also interesting. The "coauthor of a recent book on feminine hygiene" can be none other than Rachel Lynn Palmer, coauthor of "Facts and Frauds in Feminine Hygiene"; Mrs. Palmer is the wife of Dewey H. Palmer, who left the staff of Consumers' Research to join the strikers in their battle with that organization. More interesting still, however, is the fact that the secretary of F. J. Schlink, who still heads Consumers' Research and presumably continues to maintain the labor policy which cost him ■ large percentage of his working force last winter, is (unless she has been lately fired) a young lady named Katherine S. Bixler. Can you imagine ■ more interesting coincidence than that?

"REALISTIC" IS THE WORD MOST OFTEN USED to describe the French people, and with reason. We hardly expect them to be much impressed by Il Duce's warning that nations with empty cribs can't expect to win or hold empires. For a realistic way of looking at things is one way of finding out that full cribs, in a capitalist world, often mean empty larders. Besides, the French are notoriously a home-loving folk, rather fond on the whole of minding their own business. Their empire building, such as it is, has been a sort of left-handed affair, without the British zeal for carrying the light of civilization (made in Manchester) to those who dwell in darkness, without Hitler's messianic Aryanism (German model), and without that Ducean magniloquence that gives Italian Fascist imperialism a touch of Verdi gone mad. An ambitious dictator might win or bludgeon them away from their thrifty addiction to birth-control, but we hope not. We like children, and therefore we are not fond of seeing whole flocks of hungry little ragamuffins out in the streets with their parents begging for pennies, as in Il Duce's happy land. Italy's overpopulation of children may one day be useful to its dictator as food for cannon and tropical diseases, but the children have no very bright prospect of getting anything out of life for themselves. That is one reason why we never look at the face of Il Duce without thinking how much it looks like a cartoonist's nightmare of Moloch, the god who devours the young.

THE NEW DEAL HAS BEEN RICH IN paradoxes. One of the most striking is its recklessness, since it is basically a device for preserving the status quo, in giving scope to the impulses toward socialization which run strongly in a society long before it is able to throw off its capitalistic bonds. The TVA is one example of this recklessness. The Federal Art Project is another—on a much smaller scale. On later pages of this issue the reader will find ■ brief introduction to the activities of the project along with a limited number of samples of the work being done in the graphic-arts division. (A really adequate representation will be found in the first national exhibition of the project to be held at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City beginning September 16 and shown thereafter in various cities.) As Miss Marshall points out in her article, the problem of the artist is not solved by putting him on relief. The Federal Art Project has contributed to a solution by conserving the talent and morale of a group that has always been hard hit, in and out of prosperity; its directors are avowedly concerned with demonstrating the function of art as a social instrument. Meanwhile there is no doubt that the launching of the project coincided with a new popular interest in the arts. The Metropolitan Museum of Art reports, for instance, that in 1933-34 its first series of Neighborhood Circulating Exhibitions was attended by 82,332 persons in a six months' season. In 1935 the attendance, also for a six months' season, rose to 299,020; and during the first seven months of the third season now in progress 352,409 people have visited the neighborhood exhibitions, which are held in library branches, settlement houses, schools, and other available buildings.

THIS IS THE TIME WHEN CITIZENS ARE supposed to pant for advance information on how the country will go in November. In an article on another page Paul Ward analyzes the Maine prospects and subjects the myth "As Maine goes, so goes the nation" to a thorough examination. On September 3 the Baltimore Sun starts a poll of every registered voter in Maryland, a state which has been a better reflector of political trends than Maine. Beginning with the first Cleveland race in 1884, Maryland voters have returned a plurality for the winning Presidential candidate in every campaign save that of 1888, when Harrison beat Cleveland. Even then it came close, giving Cleveland less than ■ 7,000-vote lead. Herbert Hoover carried the state by 77,853 votes in 1928; Roosevelt carried it by 130,130 in 1932. All six of its Congressmen and both its Senators are Democrats. Its Governor is a Republican. There is no Senatorial or gubernatorial contest in the state this year, and all parties will be represented on the Sun's ballot except the Union Party, which does not appear on the official ballot either. All honor to the Sun, and may it succeed in starting another slogan: "As Maryland goes——."

ELEVEN NATIONS HAVE BEEN INVITED TO discuss plans for "humanizing" the Spanish civil war. In general the question of "humanizing" war has always absorbed us. With a good deal of logical acumen—not to be too modest about it—we have worked the whole thing out. In order to experience war in its most humane aspect, ■ soldier must get killed. This makes him a hero to his country, provides his family with a pension from a grateful government, and renders it unnecessary for him to earn ■ living in a post-war world. Obviously the alternative of being seriously wounded and probably crippled is not so agreeable; to be slightly wounded is not so agreeable either, because it may mean reentrance into the trenches and later on the difficulty, referred to above, of going on living. But once this principle is established, it is plainly absurd for governments to go to the large expense of having soldiers killed in battle. It would be infinitely less costly and more humane—since to be humane is our objective—for the number of civilians that the next war may be expected to kill to be chosen by lot to commit suicide at home in some painless and inexpensive manner. The War Department chemists could doubtless invent the proper pill; the national economy could continue almost uninterrupted except for ■ grand state funeral en masse; and the poets would find the epitaph already to hand: Dulce et decorum est pro patria suicedere.

It's a Pipe Dream, Mr. President

MR. ROOSEVELT'S proposal to grasp history by the forelock and haul it into a super-conference room has about it a breath-taking directness. Of course, to have the plan break now has obvious vote-getting possibilities: one of the weakest points in Mr. Landon's none too sturdy armor is his lack of interest in international affairs and his incapacity to think on a world scale; this is the time for Mr. Roosevelt, whose economic nationalism had begun to worry people, to emphasize his own map-vaulting stature. Of course, also, in the face of American isolationist sentiment, the plan had to be denied officially. But we can be certain that it wasn't spun out of Arthur Krock's mind. It hangs together too well with the President's known temper and mental habits.

Think of it. You bring the dictators and the potentates of Europe into a conference room, much as you might bring Jesse Jones and Harold Ickes and Harry Hopkins and Carter Glass. You seat them around a table, face to face and man to man, and let them iron their differences out. Stalin, Hitler, King Edward, Mussolini—they are the key men today in world affairs, and Mr. Roosevelt's technique has always been to get at the key men, let them talk, keep them good-humored, and effect a compromise. It is just the sort of situation where he can bring into play his enormous talent for personal persuasion.

Actually, of course, this is a new Europe that we are facing. Its dictators believe, even more than does Mr. Roosevelt, in direct and resolute action. They are even more ready than he to brush aside the cobwebs of an exhausted social order. Like him they dare to be daring.

The real difficulty with Mr. Roosevelt's plan is not that it is too daring but that it is too disembodied. Its premise—that the causes and the solutions of international strife are personal—is only a half truth and the lesser half. It gets nowhere at the sources of war—the collision of expanding nationalisms, the vendetta of the hungry and the sated nations in a world of unequal imperialisms, the desperate need when the masses do not have bread of giving them war as circuses, the deepening clash between fascist and democratic nations. These things don't get ironed out at a conference table, no matter how impressive are the eminences gathered at it.

No, Mr. President, this plan of yours is a pipe dream. And a dangerous one. For it can only raise hopes that cannot be fulfilled. The armies are massing in Europe. Such a plan may draw off the peace energies of the democratic peoples from the channels where they may be most effective. By dramatizing a vast talk-feast it will blind the eyes of our own people to the positive efforts America must make for peace on concrete issues. We do not need new peace machinery. We need to throw the American energies and the vast American resources into the old. We missed our chance with Ethiopia; other chances will not be slow in coming.

A Program for Conservatives

DURING the past week the country has heard two organizations which typify American conservatism express themselves on the immediate problems of the times. These are the American Bar Association, which has just held its annual convention in Boston, and the United States Chamber of Commerce, which has issued a statement of principles indorsed by its nation-wide membership. What they said did not represent a social philosophy or even a well-considered program. It was rather a series of unthinking pronouncements generated by fear and designed only for the moment.

Of the elders of the Bar Association one is tempted to say, Whatever it is, they're against it. They were against ratification of the child-labor amendment, against investigating the abuses of civil liberty in strikes, the activities of the Black Legion, or the conduct of the prosecution in the Mooney case, against a constitutional amendment to give Congress wider powers to legislate for the national welfare, against the WPA, against the Social Security Act, against the Public Utility Holding Company Act, and against a curb on the Supreme Court's right of judicial review of acts of Congress.

Echoing the bar on most of its dislikes, the Chamber of Commerce added some new ones of its own. It was also against a curb on the court or a constitutional amendment, against interference with individual enterprise, against the federal government making grants-in-aid to states for public works, doing anything about relief, using the tax power to legislate for the general welfare, participating in the business of power generation, doing anything about crop control, providing for social security, or arbitrating between capital and labor. In that delicate phrase of the Steel Institute and the Republican platform, that employees should be free from coercion "from any source," it declared itself opposed to collective bargaining.

Here is the doctrine of the conservatives on those issues that rack the body politic today. In its essence it is motivated by the determination to fight free of any restriction which would limit the pursuit of individual gain, regardless of whether that gain is made at the expense of the general welfare. From this follows the conviction that the hand of government laid on private enterprise, no matter how lightly, is bad. The Constitution, "the traditional guaranties of human rights," "the preservation of the old institutions" are the banner round which the conservatives rally their defense of this doctrine. Judge Ransom, in his opening speech to the Bar Association, expressed perfectly the conservative attitude when he said that we cannot allow government "to make a hodge-podge of human rights in order to serve supposed social ends." There would seem to be some confusion here, for "human rights" and "social ends" are hardly incompatible. But Judge Ransom did not mean human rights; he meant property rights. What the conservatives dare not face is the fact that, under the pressure of modern circumstance, they can no longer retain these rights intact. Clinging to the past, they lay waste their powers trying to beat off the new demands arising on every side.

Generally it is radicalism that is thought of as running wild. But today, as the statements of the Bar Association and the Chamber of Commerce show, conservatism is running wild—backward. Yet conservatism, if it would preserve what is good in American life, dare not be reactionary, dare not be negative. Two weeks ago we published a program for progressives. Now we suggest a program for conservatives—not for conservatism in the role in which it sees itself today, but for a conservatism that is honest, intelligent, and awake. First, it must discard its desperate fear of change, a fear so blind it cannot discriminate between good changes and bad but hates change for its own sake. Secondly, it must realize that hanging on to the status quo is not only unintelligent but unavailing; that there are certain changes which are inevitable; that these should be met, recognized, and adopted now and not opposed to the last ditch, until they are brought about by force. Lastly, instead of instinctively crying "Stop!" every time something new is tried, conservatives should begin to act rationally and make intelligent concessions where necessary. They might take a cue from British conservatism, which by a relatively enlightened policy in domestic affairs has kept well up with the times. If American conservatism followed suit, it would be helping to preserve instead of by its present actions helping to overthrow that which conservatives and progressives alike want to maintain—the democratic system.

Cuban Amnesty

THE political amnesty recently proclaimed in Cuba by President Mariano Gomez is being hailed in conservative circles as proof that that troubled island is returning to orderly constitutionalism. Actually the amnesty is as much of a farce as the Hitler amnesty which merely released Nazi criminals. Out of the 4,000 political prisoners in Cuban jails, only 80, and these the least important, are affected by the decree. The terms of the amnesty, for example, specifically exempt "terrorists," and it happens that "terrorist" is an all-embracing word used to refer to all enemies of the Batista dictatorship, particularly those who have been convicted by the "special" courts, from which there is no appeal. A suggestion of the power behind the throne in Cuba is found in a second exception, which excludes all prisoners convicted of speaking disrespectfully of a "foreign diplomat."

It is true that ex-President Grau San Martín—whom Welles and Caffery succeeded in ousting at the end of 1933—and several of his associates in exile have been "pardoned." But as an indication of the sincerity of the gesture, several of Grau's followers were jailed by Batista's military police on the very day the pardons were issued. Acts of terrorism are perhaps not as frequent as they were a year ago, but they have by no means ceased. A few months ago one of Grau's most intimate friends, Octavio Seigle, who was in Cuba collecting documents and newspaper clippings for the American press, was seized because of a suspicion that he was learning too much of terrorist activities. He was taken, screaming at the top of his voice, through the streets of Havana, tortured, and beaten, and later was found dead on a country road, his body burned beyond recognition. A month or so later the head of the Havana fingerprint bureau found fingerprints which definitely linked the crime to the aides of Pedraza, Batista's chief of police. When this evidence was disclosed, the fingerprint expert was forced to flee for his life.

Unfortunately, the truth about conditions in Cuba is very little known in this country, and it is not improbable that the amnesty may lead many Americans to believe that the Batista dictatorship is a thing of the past. This, of course, is the primary objective of the decree. For years the State Department, under the influence of Welles and Caffery, has been seeking to establish a "safe and sane" constitutional regime in Havana. The wave of assassinations and terrorism which followed the overthrow of Grau has doubtless proved extremely embarrassing to the men who argued that his overthrow was necessary in order to maintain law and order. It was hoped that after the "election" of Gomez, something might be done to reestablish respectability by checking army terrorism. Gomez was selected to carry out this task.

The new President promised to curb extra-legal abuses. But this is as far as he dared go. Though he may have been perfectly sincere in making the promise, at least to the point of desiring to cooperate with Caffery and, incidentally, strengthening his own position, the fact remains that he cannot act without Batista, and Batista cannot maintain power without terror. Signs of a definite estrangement between the President and Batista have already appeared. Attempts by Gomez to create a popular sentiment in favor of the civil as against the military government have been deeply resented by Batista's followers, who are threatening to bring impeachment proceedings.

If Gomez were to carry on an effective struggle against Batista, he would have to build up a rival political machine. This would necessitate patronage, and Batista has already seen to it that all available government posts are filled with army men. Even the grammar schools have been brought within the army spoils system. Under Mendieta, Cabinet ministers were so terrorized that they rarely dared appoint their own subordinates. Gomez's sole strength would appear to lie in Caffery's desire for a constitutional front for Cuban militarism. In a crisis, however, this factor is likely to prove unimportant, for Caffery is known to have the highest admiration for Batista.

Thus the aces are all in Batista's hand. Gomez can make a gesture of restoring civil authority, but the bluff is certain to be called. Warning bullets have already spattered around the new President's doorstep. If they choose, Batista's henchmen could undoubtedly force through impeachment proceedings. Being a good politician, Gomez is not likely to try the dictator's wrath. Cuba will remain safe for American capital, but unsafe for any Cuban who desires the most elementary of political or civil rights.

Who's Winning in Spain?

MORE than six weeks have passed since the outbreak of the fascist rebellion in Spain. During this period hundreds of columns have appeared in our newspapers reporting "decisive battles," "important advances," and the imminent capture of dozens of cities. Papers have differed in their reporting, but the impression of the average newspaper reader appears to be that the rebels are winning and that it is only a matter of time until the whole of Spain will fall into fascist hands.

To a certain extent this impression has been deliberately fostered by such reactionary papers as the Hearst chain and the New York Herald Tribune. Both Hearst and the Tribune have featured reports from special correspondents who have been only in rebel territory. As a result these papers have created the impression (1) that the rebels are fighting for civilization against a Communist government in Madrid, (2) that the "reds" have been guilty of appalling atrocities, and (3) that Madrid has been about to fall on any number of occasions. But irrespective of these deliberate falsifications, it is extremely difficult for the average man to follow the varying fortunes of the contestants. The ordinary American is bewildered by the claims and counterclaims of the two sides and handicapped by a lack of knowledge of Spanish geography.

Taking all factors into consideration, the changes in the military situation during the past six weeks have been surprisingly slight. The rebels have won but one important victory—the capture of Badajoz and Merida. This victory has not only permitted the establishment of communications between Generals Franco and Mola but enabled Franco to threaten Toledo and Madrid from the southwest. Recently, however, the Merida-Caceres railway is reported to have been cut again, thus offsetting one of the important gains. Moreover, the insurgents advancing from Badajoz have apparently been checked outside of Talavera and are yet far from Toledo, with its munition factories, and farther from Madrid itself. In the Guadarrama Mountains, forty miles to the northeast of Madrid, the deadlock appears unbroken. The rebels claim to have made a slight gain recently at Cerro Nevero, where they threaten to cut off part of Madrid's water supply, but the government has apparently made some progress in an encircling movement which, if successful, would obviate the need for storming the rebel intrenchments.

The two most important government victories have been won at Irun and Cordoba. Possession of the Irun and San Sebastian area has been particularly useful to the government because it has blocked communication between France and the main rebel headquarters at Burgos, as well as denied the insurgents access to the sea. Here a handful of trade unionists and government supporters, cut off from any possible assistance from Barcelona or Madrid, have held their own for nearly three weeks against a strong rebel attack. While it is inconceivable that they can hold out indefinitely, their stubborn defense has proved a constant thorn in the rebels' side. In the south the loyalist forces have worked up to within striking distance of the important city of Cordoba. Capture of this city would give the government control of the railway line to Malaga and Gibraltar and probably force the rebels to evacuate Granada, their last stronghold in southeastern Spain. A Catalan expeditionary force has captured three of the Balearic Islands—Menorca, Ibiza, and Formentera—but appears to have been checked in its drive on the most important—Mallorca. The Catalan troops attacking Saragossa are within ten miles of the city, but have made little or no progress in the past three weeks.

In immediate military strength the rebels may possibly have a slight advantage. Although the government has many more men under arms than the insurgents could possibly obtain, the fascists are undoubtedly better equipped and more highly disciplined. As an example of confusion on the government side, it is known that some of the Anarchist troops from Barcelona have insisted on fighting without officers. While this is not general, the organization of the loyalist forces is known to be poor. On the other hand, possession of Madrid and Barcelona means that the government has infinitely better resources for manufacturing munitions and other war supplies. It also has a great advantage in that it has been able to open and keep open railway communication between the outside world and Barcelona, Murcia, Valencia, and Madrid. The rebels' means of transportation are comparatively inferior. Their only north-south rail connection is said to be broken, and they have virtually no outlet to the outside world except by Cadiz. The entire Mediterranean coast from Portbou to Malaga is in government hands, as is the Atlantic coast from Irun to Gijon. The navy has remained loyal. Train service to Portugal is suspended. This means that the rebels have relatively little chance of obtaining a substantial amount of assistance from abroad, despite Mussolini and Hitler. When one considers the added factor of morale and popular support, it is evident that the government has a tremendous advantage, only providing it is able to hang on until the rebels' munitions begin to run short. It is conceivable that the struggle, like the American Civil War, may last for years. But there is no reason to despair—for the cause of Spanish democracy.

BY PAUL W. WARD

Will Maine Go Democratic?

Washington, August 31

YOUR daily papers from now until September 15 are going to be spotted with "as Maine goes, so goes the nation" stories, but on and after the fifteenth they are likely to be filled with statements, letters, and editorials belittling that forty-eight-year-old political chant. For there is good reason to believe that on the night of September 14, when the ballots Maine voters have cast that day for state and Congressional candidates are counted, the results will bode ill for Republican fortunes throughout the nation in November, and the predominantly Republican or anti-New Deal press of the country will do its best to soften the blow.

It will be spurred on in that endeavor by its knowledge that if the impression gets abroad that the Maine returns presage another Roosevelt landslide, the G. O. P.'s army of ward-heelers will be completely demoralized, and the fat cats will start making deposits on family-entrance passes to the White House for the 1936-40 season by canceling their earlier commitments to the Republican machine and plunking the dough, instead, into Farley's war chest. Furthermore, the pro-Landon press will be aided in glossing over the results by the complexity of the political situation in the Pine Tree State. That complexity arises from two factors. One is that victory for the Democratic candidates in Maine—a thing that even Republican leaders privately concede is far from impossible—will be a victory in name only for the New Deal, for the Democratic standard bearer, Governor Louis J. Brann, seeking election to the Senate, is an anti-New Dealer. The other is that the blow to Landon's chances nationally may be hidden in returns accurately reporting victory for the Republican candidates in Maine.

Properly to interpret the returns from the standpoint of their traditional significance, however, the wary reader need bear in mind only the figure "25,000" and know a little something of the tradition's origin. First, he must know that the tradition has been carefully and deliberately nurtured. It has been fostered nationally by the G. O. P. because Maine has always been one of the most reliably Republican states and has been helpful in corraling the band-wagon vote throughout the nation for Republican Presidential candidates ever since 1888, when the tradition was born in the slogan: "Maine went hell-bent for Governor Kent and Tippecanoe and Tyler, too." The tradition has been cultivated locally by both Republican and Democratic politicians because it makes both groups proprietors of one of the juiciest political rackets in the country, a racket that results in the national committees of both major parties pouring funds into Maine in September and paying the bills of the local candidates solely for the sake of the psychological effect of the September returns on the national election two months later. National-committee outlays by the major parties are expected to top $1 a vote per side this year in the state whose total major-party vote in 1932 was 295,538. In fact, it is this racketeering aspect of the situation that quadrennially has endowed Maine with political spoils out of all proportion to its five electoral votes and kept it unique among the states in holding its Congressional elections in advance of the Presidential election. There were many states that followed the same system until 1846, when Congress passed an act requiring that Congressional elections be held simultaneously in November in all states save those whose constitutions prescribed otherwise. There were only three states that had such constitutional provisions—Oregon, Arkansas, and Maine—and the first two quickly brought their constitutions into line by amendment.

Where the figure "25,000" comes into the picture is in the easily demonstrable fact that a simple Republican victory in Maine in September is an insufficient augury of a national victory for the G. O. P. two months later. The record shows that in every campaign since 1892—with one exception—when the Republican margin of victory in Maine in September has failed to exceed 25,000, the Democrats have captured the White House in November. The exception came in 1908 when the G. O. P. September lead in Maine was only 7,000 but Taft carried the nation two months later. In 1892 the Republicans' September edge in Maine was only 12,000 and Cleveland was elected President. In 1912 the Republican margin dropped to 3,000 and Wilson won the Presidency. He was reelected in 1916, although the Republican margin of victory in the September elections in Maine had climbed to 14,000. In 1928 the Republicans carried the state by 83,000 votes in September and the Hoover landslide followed. Four years later, Brann, running for Governor, put Maine in the Democratic column by a margin of 3,000 votes in September and the Roosevelt landslide followed in November, although Maine had by that time swung back into the Republican column to become one of the six states Hoover carried. His margin of victory in Maine was 37,724.

The "25,000" figure takes on special significance in the present situation owing to the unwillingness of Republican leaders in Maine to predict—privately—that the G. O. P. standard bearers will carry the state by more than 20,000 votes at best, and it is only the more sanguine among them who are willing to go that far along the road of prophecy. The most realistic among them incline to the belief that their candidates will be doing well if they manage to pile up as much as a 5,000-vote edge over the opposition, and they are counting almost entirely on public revulsion against the New Deal to produce that result. Their candidates admittedly are weak compared with those the Democrats have put up. Farley has outsmarted the Republican high command in prevailing upon Brann to run for the Senate, despite his anti-New Deal bent.

Brann, frequently described as Maine's Jimmy Walker, was elected Governor in 1932 by 3,000 votes and re-elected in 1934 by 24,000. He has been anything but sympathetic with the New Deal's avowed purposes or actual attainments. His most notable betrayal of the New Deal has been his double-crossing of the Administration on the Passamaquoddy tidal-power project. After promising to call upon the Maine legislature to set up a state authority to take title to the project and thus bulwark it against the power trust's court attacks, Brann backed down on his promise; by that time the project had been started on the strength of his pledge. Despite Brann's many and obvious infidelities to the Roosevelt Administration, Farley literally begged Brann to enter the Senate race solely because Brann is the best vote-getter the Democrats have in Maine, an attribute he owes to his talent for making alliances among the bankers and power boys who control the state.

In his campaign Brann is stressing local issues and keeping the New Deal as far out of the picture as possible. His Republican opponent, Senator White, on the other hand, is trying his damndest to make Roosevelt the issue. He is more than a little hampered in his task by the Republican National Committee's insistence on holding up the Quoddy project as a prime example of the Roosevelt Administration's outrageous extravagance. Both White and his Republican colleague, Senator Hale, were and are staunch proponents of the project, which is so popular in at least certain sections of Maine that it has produced a 5,000-vote turnover in Washington County, converting the Republican registration margin there of 4,000 votes into a Democratic edge of 1,000. White's reputation as a Quoddy champion is further threatened in the present instance by the fact that stupid parliamentary tactics by the Republican Senators at the last session of Congress caused the Senate to turn thumbs down on the project. They had insisted on separating the Quoddy project from the Florida ship-canal project and voting on them individually; the canal won and the Maine project lost. White's other deficiencies include a sluggish mind, a weak-sister voice, and a reputation of being, next to Copeland, the shipping lobby's chief representative in Congress.

Good as the Democratic chances seem in the Senatorial race, they appear even better in the governorship fight, and there a Democratic victory would be more of a triumph for the New Deal than is possible in the Senatorial fight, for the Democratic nominee for Governor, F. Harold Dubord, is stressing something as least describable as New Deal issues. He is making social security the basis of his campaign, emphasizing old-age pensions and unemployment insurance. Dubord had expected to run for the Senate until Farley pushed Brann up to that starting line. Hale had beaten him for the Senate in 1934 by only 1,200 votes. Even his Republican foes admit his superiority as a campaigner over their gubernatorial nominee, Lewis O. Barrows. Dubord, who although a Democrat has been five times elected mayor of the Republican town of Waterville, is a French Canadian, and in Maine the French Canadians cast 100,000 votes. His Republican opponent, a Newport druggist, shares Dubord's talents as a backslapper but fails dismally to equal him as a speaker. Barrows, at present Secretary of State, is reported to have been an active member of the Ku Klux Klan in its heyday; published dispatches from Maine report that the Democrats have a picture of him in full Klan regalia which they plan to use against him if he or his supporters raise the issue of Dubord's Catholicism. If the issue is raised, it is more likely to come from the third camp involved in the governorship fight. That is the camp of the Reverend Benjamin C. Bubar, a Baptist fundamentalist seeking the governorship as a Townsendite. Bubar is expected to take what few votes he gets away from Druggist Barrows rather than from Lawyer Dubord.

To retain their 1932 and 1934 strength in Maine, the Democrats must keep not only the governorship but also two of Maine's three seats in the House of Representatives. Their chances of accomplishing the latter are admittedly good. In fact, the only Republican candidate conceded reelection on all sides is Representative Ralph O. Brewster. It appears that the news of Brewster's disgraceful performance in connection with the holding-company bill has not been permitted to seep through the consciousness of the electorate in Maine's Third Congressional District. It was an intricate story at best and the stalwart Republican press of Maine showed no appetite for it; its Washington correspondents found their accounts of the affair tossed into the wastebaskets by their editors.

The most stalwart New Dealer among all the Democratic candidates in Maine is Representative Hamlin. Because he is seeking reelection as a Roosevelt supporter the outcome of his contest in the First Congressional District of Maine will be watched as closely as the Senatorial and gubernatorial returns. His Republican opponent, James C. Oliver, is running as a Townsendite, a fact that is expected to switch conservative Republican votes to Hamlin and give him the edge in the race. There has been a break in the Democratic forces in the Second District of Maine following the refusal of Representative Moran, a Democrat, to seek reelection. Moran had a highly creditable record in Congress, especially on shipping legislation. There are two stories about why he is not seeking reelection. One is that he quit in a huff because Farley sided with Brann and against him. The other is that he gagged at seeing the New Deal choose such a critter as Brann to be its standard bearer in Maine. In Moran's place the Democrats have nominated an unknown, Ernest MacLean, who is involved in a four-cornered race. The Republicans have put up Clyde L. Smith of Skowhegan; Raymond Rogers, who lost out to Smith in the G. O. P. primary, has put himself up as a Coughlinite, or Union Party, candidate; and J. C. Leckemby, whom Smith also beat in the Republican primary, is running as an independent with Townsendite backing. The Democrats are counting on Leckemby and Rogers taking enough Republican votes away from Smith to let MacLean squeeze through and keep the Second District's seat in the House on the Democratic side of the aisle.

Where Inflation Threatens

BY ALVIN JOHNSON

EVERY possessor of fixed income fears inflation. Every person whose income is relatively inflexible has reason to fear inflation. Such persons include the entire salaried and wage-earning class, because it is a notorious fact that wages, and especially small salaries, lag far behind a general price rise. Every investor in a capital enterprise whose rates are controlled by law, or in an enterprise producing goods whose price has become customary, will be damaged by inflation. Certainly there are enough of these people who would be anti-inflationists, if they knew their interest, to turn the coming Presidential election. But which way would they turn it, if they knew their interest?

What is baffling about the present menace of inflation is that it will come, if it comes at all, disguised as super-prosperity. It will not come through any overt act of government. Roosevelt has proved himself adamant against the issue of pure fiat money. That is the grievance of Lenke and Father Coughlin. Landon can be counted on to be equally adamant in this relation, however yielding his tissues otherwise. The inflation that threatens us is a credit inflation, and it will make its presence known only through an appearance that to all producers seems fair and lovely—rising prices.

Prices are already rising, at a modest rate. Business is expanding in expectation of good profits. There are such enormous arrears to be met in construction and equipment that something like a business boom is inevitable, whoever may be elected President. In dwellings alone we are short accommodations for ten million families, now living doubled up or camping in quarters they would never tolerate if satisfactorily employed. This amounts to a suspended demand for five billion dollars' worth of labor and material. At least ten billions would be required to make good the wear and tear and obsolescence of our industrial and transportation plant. The more wideawake business men are aware of this situation and are expanding operations judiciously. Soon the sleepy-headed majority will awaken to the fact that money is again to be made. They will work their existing plant overtime, they will borrow from the banks to carry their increasing bills for material and goods in process, they will raise loans for reequipment and extensions. The banks will joyously report week by week an expanding volume of loans and rising interest rates. Once again they will begin to prosper. Excess reserves will drop from their present volume of $1,900,000,000, hundred million by hundred million, and the volume of deposits—our real currency—will increase correspondingly, but in the ratio of something like eight to one. The depositors will be buying more and more excitedly; the prices of commodities will soar. Producers will be happy, until they remember that they are also consumers. But there is a great lag here. And anyway, the producer will rejoice over his own high prices, while raging against the other fellow's.

That is how inflation will come to the United States, if it comes. Not otherwise. Under whom is it more likely to come, Roosevelt or Landon?

The federal government is formally in a position to curb inflation. Through the Federal Reserve Board it can change the prescribed ratio of reserves to deposits—a New Deal measure. It has already raised the requirement, thus cutting the volume of excess reserves, upon which inflation is predicated. This action can have no immediate effect, since under the new calculation the banks are still packed with excess reserves. It was not intended to have any immediate effect. No one would wish to check the present moderate rise in prices. The raising of the reserve requirement does have a bearing on the possibility of runaway prices in the future, and the precedent is important. The government can prescribe still higher reserves, if necessary, and if the government is resolute enough to withstand the demands of business, which, when prices really start upward, will clamor deafeningly for easier credit and relaxed reserve requirements. Who will be the more likely to withstand this clamor, Roosevelt, whom the business men would like to destroy, or Landon, their hand-picked pet?

The forces making for inflation are indeed too powerful to be controlled by a single measure. Add to control of bank reserves a resolute policy of taxation, and any ordinary boom can be kept within limits. Taxation is essentially deflationary. It takes away resources that would have gone immediately into the market for commodities or capital values and returns these resources to the market only slowly, in salary payments and retirement of debt, or accumulates them in the Treasury, thus not returning them to the market at all.

Who is the more likely to follow a resolute policy of taxation, Roosevelt or Landon?

Every good citizen admits, in a general way, that as soon as we really begin to prosper we should set to work to cut our burden of debt. We can do this only by economy in expenditures and by securing increased tax revenues. As for economy in expenditures, apart from getting rid of the relief load, we need not expect very substantial results. We cannot cut interest on the public debt or war pensions. The latter are fairly certain to increase. We should, but will not, cut army and navy expenditures. We could get rid of some of our bureau personnel, but we should find small pickings here. If we really want to pay off our debt we will wisely center our efforts on taxation.

With returning prosperity every source of tax revenue will yield more abundantly. Under our present taxation set-up we shall probably be covering all current expenditures within two years, and a surplus for debt payment will emerge. Can anyone doubt that an army of taxpayers will besiege Washington with a demand for a reduction in tax rates? They will argue that a remission of taxes will stimulate prosperity and thus increase taxpaying capacity; that the yield from lower rates will exceed the yield from the higher rates. So indeed it might. We tried this out in the post-war period and found that the lower rates were very productive—under a mushrooming boom. But it is just that kind of boom we fear when we fear inflation.

Who will yield most promptly to the clamor of the taxpayers for lower rates, Roosevelt or Landon? The question answers itself.

Most of the people who are panicky over inflation are in the Landon camp. It is a kind of hypnosis not uncommon in social history. The Russian conservatives fought Kerensky until they got Lenin. The French fought the pacific German republic until they got Hitler. American conservatives fight against the homeopathic readjustment of our political and economic system to contemporary social forces that is represented by the New Deal. Eventually they are likely to get something else if they have their way. They are now fighting for sound Republican finance. If they have their way they will get inflation.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Buffalo, New York, August 27

STOPPING only to wave his right arm in the Rotarian, rather stagy gesture with which he greets every audience, to acknowledge the far from overpowering greeting the audience gave him, Governor Landon stepped into the pulpit at the Buffalo Ball Park last evening and got right down to work. There were no impromptu words of greeting, no gracious or kindly references to the people who had turned out to hear him, or to their city, or the occasion. Mr. Landon plunged into his set speech like a schoolboy bent on getting through his stint as soon as possible. It is said that he has been receiving elocution lessons; if so, the inoculation has not taken. Most of the time his head was down in his manuscript; even with the loud speaker some of those in front missed some of his words.

Oratorical effects there were none, except when Mr. Landon twice raised his fist and shook it to emphasize his bitter denunciation of "the most cockeyed piece of tax legislation ever imposed in a modern country," namely, the surplus-tax law. The audience responded readily with almost the only real cheer of the entire half-hour; when applause came at other times, it was faint and limited to a part of the crowd. Once there was an undercurrent of laughter, but there was no humor, no lightness, no charm whatsoever in the address. It was earnest and sincere, and it is evident that as the campaign goes on and Mr. Landon more and more considers the iniquities of the Roosevelt Administration, he is getting hotter and hotter about it. Only when he referred to the Administration did he communicate any emotion to the audience, which listened as it might have to the address of a second-rate Kansas clergyman—that was what he suggested to me throughout the talk. The applause lasted precisely twenty seconds, and then, waving his Chautauqua arm, he was gone from the stand, and the audience followed suit as rapidly as possible. No baseball crowd ever melted away faster.

Somehow I cannot recall a tamer speech or tamer setting for a Presidential candidate. Some Republicans may really believe that this country is in a dire crisis, that our republican institutions are in jeopardy and are rapidly being remodeled after some hateful foreign bolshevist or fascist model. But there was no evidence of this at this meeting or at the dinner of 3,000 persons in the magnificent Field Artillery Armory which preceded the march to the ball field. In the armory Mr. Landon's reception was no more than what would have been given to Governor Lehman or any well-known guest of honor, and he fell over himself pitifully in his effort to say a few words without referring to politics, politics being forbidden by reason of the fact that the dinner was being served in a state military building. Never was there anything more hopeless than his effort to be genial. He clasped his two hands over his head to indicate that he was metaphorically shaking hands with everybody present, and again and again he said how grateful he was for the reception given him and how fine the Republican organization of Erie County is. And nothing else.

Indeed, the three speeches which Mr. Landon has made on this trip to the East have developed very clearly the strategy and tactics of his campaign. He is going to be one of our real village folks to the end, the home-town boy who made good. He is going to contrast himself with utmost deliberation to the President. There will be no charm stops pulled out, no oratorical flourishes, no pictures of the America that he hopes to bring to pass. It is just going to be quiet, restrained, business-like talking, in the hope that he will float into office on the wave of dislike and resentment of the other fellow. Just as Roosevelt was voted in by those who hated Hoover and thought him as inept as he was, so the Republicans are chiefly concerned to avoid any breaks, to make it clear to the business world that Alf is safe, sound, and above all else faithful to the business world, and that they can pour their money into the campaign funds without the slightest fear that the candidate will turn out to be afflicted by "isms," or fantastic ideas about labor or a fair sharing of the profits of industry or any such stuff and nonsense as more social justice. They will admit, as the campaign progresses, that Landon is nothing on the stump, no great shakes anyway, just a man like Cal Coolidge, who will let business recover and prosper during the next four years—if he is elected.

It is a fact that the Governor is not drawing well on the stump. Local newspapermen agree that Buffalo gave him just the regulation party turnout. The crowd at Chautauqua was less than that which came to hear President Roosevelt. His rear-platform audiences have been disappointingly small, just as his rear-platform speeches have been hopelessly poor. He is small, and seems insignificant from the back of the crowd; for these occasions he has not a single attribute of the vote-getter and impresses nobody. It is not until you come into closer contact with him that you begin to sense his personality. He is likable and attractive, modest, simple, unassuming, with no desire to be other than he is. I am impressed by the fact that the New York correspondents who have been living with him since the nomination have a growing respect and liking for him. They think he is a fine chap, and some of them believe, like others who meet him, that he is a much better chap than he makes himself out to be. This was the reaction of members of the peace delegation that called upon him here. They admired his kindness and pleasant serenity when they were injected for ten minutes into a day horribly overburdened by incessant appointments with one politician after another. They came away with the belief that there is a good deal of sincerity in this man, sincerity not yet spoiled by too much high-office holding. Yet the fact remains that he is not appealing to the imagination or to the enthusiasm of the crowds. The American people may have suffered during the last seven years, but this suffering does not seem yet to have rendered them acutely politically minded.

As for the Governor's speeches, they are deliberately phrased with the greatest simplicity. This is partly because they reflect his own mind—they are all written by him down to the last word—and partly because the high command feels that this is the proper policy in the effort to win the workers and the plain people away from the radio charmer. With the exception of the Chautauqua speech, the Governor's utterances are certainly worthy of a kindergarten. That at Chautauqua was by all odds his best utterance, for he made it with his eyes open to the fact that he was taking a position that would render him unpopular not only with Hearst but with some of the leading Republican politicians of this state, who are all for teachers taking a special oath to uphold and defend the Constitution. For this bit of courage and independence the Governor deserves all credit, and there are those who have been with him from the beginning who feel that this is much more characteristic of the man than most of the things he is saying on the stump; that if he is elected he will listen but in the last resort go his own way whether he pleases the politicians or not. The only trouble about this is that his vision is so completely that of the self-satisfied, prosperous, Middle Western citizen. He is exactly what the bankers and big business men want, even if he has flashes of independence. They are perfectly willing that he should be outspoken about freedom of speech and freedom for our schools and against teachers' oaths and other restrictions on education as long as he takes their view as to the necessity of a business moratorium from reform and regulation.

As for the simplicity of those speeches we have been listening to, I really think they ought to go a little bit farther in the direction of simplicity. I think, to be absolutely perfect and make the widest possible appeal, they should be printed in the style of the First Reader—then they would certainly reach the child mind. Here, for example, is the way I would print the rear-end platform speech the Governor made at Omaha:

AS A-MER-I-CAN CIT-I-ZENS, WE ARE RE-SPON-SI-BLE FOR THE KIND OF GOV-ERN-MENT WE HAVE IN OUR COM-MUN-I-TY, OUR STATE, AND AT WASH-ING-TON. WE CAN-NOT ES-CAPE BE-ING GOV-ERNED. WE HAVE THE CHO-ICE OF GOV-ERN-ING OUR-SELVES OR OF
BE-ING GOV-ERNED. UN-DER THE AD-MIN-IS-TRA-TIVE SYS-TEM, THE PEO-PLE ARE THE
GOV-ERN-MENT WHEN THEY TAKE A LIVE-LY IN-TER-EST IN THE SE-LEC-TION OF THOSE WHO REP-RE-SENT THEM IN THE STATE AND IN THE NA-TION. WE CAN BE CER-TAIN THAT WE SHALL BE WELL GOV-ERNED WHEN THE PEO-PLE TAKE SUCH AN IN-TER-EST. IF WE DO NOT BE-LIEVE THIS TO BE TRUE, THEN WE
A-BAN-DON OUR FAITH IN A-MER-I-CAN IN-STI-TU-TIONS.

If we apply this style of printing to the four points of Governor Landon's financial address of last night, it becomes very easy because so many of his words are of one syllable. Here they are:

THE GOV-ERN-MENT MUST GUARD AND PRE-SERVE ITS SOURCE OF IN-COME.

THE GOV-ERN-MENT MUST MAKE SURE THAT IT GETS A DOL-LAR'S WORTH FOR EV-ERY DOL-LAR IT SPENDS.

THE GOV-ERN-MENT MUST NOT GET IN THE HAB-IT OF SPEND-ING MORE THAN IT RE-CEIVES.

FIN-AL-LY THE GOV-ERN-MENT MUST PRE-PARE FOR THE RAIN-Y DAY.

I think my most captious reader must admit that this is reducing public finance to the simplest possible terms, which even he who runs may read. I honestly believe that the Governor has taken the primary-school vote away from F. D. R. and has it safely in the bag.

Whether he will convert anybody else is very much open to question. The theory is plainly that everybody in America has already made up his mind how he is going to vote, that is, against whom he is going to cast his ballot, and that the only thing now to do is to offend nobody and go through the motions. This is not the time for a Theodore Roosevelt to stir an audience to its depth by pounding the reading-desk and waving the Big Stick. This is not the time for the eloquence of a William Jennings Bryan or the magnetism of a James G. Blaine. We are out to save the Republic, my friends, so let us say nothing, think nothing, and plan nothing while we are about it!

Armies over Europe

BY FRANK C. HANIGHEN

NO one denies that a world conflict is impending—least of all the statesmen involved. On August 24 Hitler lengthened the German military service a year. Naturally this caused Russia to look again to its defenses. On August 30 Mussolini boasted that Italy could mobilize 8,000,000 men in a few hours. Poland speeded up its military mission to France. And there are reports from Vienna that Hitler, as the next move in his sequence of surprises, will incorporate the Storm Troops into the regular army, thus making certain that Germany will have the largest army in the world. There will soon be marching men all over the face of Europe. What is the military strength of each of the great powers?

Hitler's move represents a stage in the conflict between two military theories which have influenced not only the German staff but all the staffs in Europe. These two theories are:

1. The best army is a comparatively small standing army composed of highly trained infantry, mechanized and motorized units, and air force, capable of striking a sudden blow on short notice.

2. A large conscript army is the best method of coping with the great losses of modern war and of overcoming neighboring countries with smaller man power.

Hitler's decree extending the military service to two years, thus keeping the past year's trained conscripts instead of placing them in reserve, recognizes the first theory, in so far as it holds under arms a body of highly trained men. At the same time it upholds the essence of the second by continuing the policy of large-scale conscription.

Germany has advanced far along the road to mechanization and motorization. (Motorization covers only the carrying of military personnel in trucks and kindred vehicles, while mechanization utilizes the motor-driven vehicle as a weapon in itself—tanks, armored cars, etc.) Germany possesses three tank divisions numbering some 1,000 tanks and one motorized division with anti-tank equipment. In furtherance of the motorization policy, the government has accelerated the building of large numbers of trucks and passenger cars. Also, work has been pushed on the construction of a 7,200-kilometer network of motor highways. These roads, routed around cities, paralleling frontiers, designed on the multiple-lane system, with cloverleaf crossings, obviously will speed up movement of armed forces for the execution of the much-discussed "quick thrust" which has so obsessed military tacticians.

Such an attack would necessarily lean heavily on aviation. Great secrecy surrounds the German air force, but sparing bits of intelligence suggest that it is the most formidable in Europe. Hitler in March, 1935, told Sir John Simon that the air force possessed 800 to 850 first-line planes. "First-line" planes are those which go into action immediately on outbreak of war. Behind this line stands a vast and undetermined number of reserve planes. Finally, the third line of the air force occupies perhaps the most important place. A French Air Minister said, "One never makes war with the planes one has; one makes war with the planes one manufactures." The development and expansion of airplane plant in Germany has been one of the marked features of its rearmament. In case of war, the Germans expect that this highly organized industry will turn out abundant replacements of the most up-to-date type for the inevitable losses among planes.

Such preparations for sudden attack by highly trained forces run along the lines advocated by General von Seeckt, who remains more or less the éminence grise of the German army. His theories of the quick blow and the small army of experts, however, have only partially shaped German military policy. While the Reichswehr (Von Seeckt's model of what the army ought to be) has entered the mass conscript army as its energizer and trained nucleus (professionals in the army are estimated at 260,000), regular conscription carries on the tradition of the last war. Latest figures summarize German effectives available for immediate action on the day of war: land army of from 630,000 to 650,000 men; air force of from 80,000 to 100,000; a "replacement" army under eight weeks' training, about 50,000; the labor-service army of between 200,000 and 250,000 men in which the class next up for military duty serves six months; from 30,000 to 35,000 men in the navy—a total of more than 1,000,000 men in conscript formations. The addition to this of a new class of 200,000 conscripts entering training in October will make the German army the largest in Europe. It is estimated that Germany has at present to back this up about 1,000,000 reserves composed of recent conscripts placed in reserve, militarized police, the S. S. corps, old Reichswehr members, and various semi-military organizations.

Since all these forces have been subjected to continuous propaganda from Nazi organizations, it may be assumed that the morale at the outbreak of war will be excellent. The idea that Germany was not defeated "in the field" in the last war but by a treacherous monarchy and subversive elements has been so thoroughly drilled into German minds that the army should march into battle with as good if not better esprit de corps than in 1914. Only when great masses of conscripts, presumably including numerous former Communists and Socialists, are thrown in as replacements in a long struggle will a possibility of weaker morale appear.

Italy, the next largest of the European fascist states, can claim to be the originator of the attaque brusquée. General Giulio Douhet first worked out the theory that a strong air force, striking quickly, could overcome the strong defensive power of modern warfare, and thus win a quick decision. This idea has profoundly influenced all of the European staffs as well as the Italian. Consequently Italy has an air force, organized independently of the army and navy (not as an auxiliary to them as in the last war), which was menacing enough to cause the British some apprehension in the past year. Last official figures (1935) give the Italians 1,861 planes in first line and reserve. Present forces are reported to be greatly increased over last year's figure.

Difficulties of terrain have prevented mechanization on a large scale, for tanks have a limited power in the mountain fighting which Italy would face in the Alps. This situation has also produced decentralized command, platoons and even squads operating on their own. However, motorization has been developed considerably and the quick thrust figures largely in Italian tactics. A mass-conscripted infantry will play the principal role in future wars. The League of Nations in 1935 estimated Italian forces as approximately 500,000 men, but today observers place the figure at 650,000. Reserves were estimated at 5,000,000 until Mussolini's recent boast of 8,000,000.

Of course, Fascist propaganda has efficiently prepared a morale for M-day which may have even more brio than that of the Germans. However, since the well-knit organization of the Germans might quickly suppress symptoms of unrest, the decentralized characteristics of the Italian army in the field might conceivably provide more chance for dissolution. Besides, the Italians (witness Caporetto) seem temperamentally somewhat less capable of supporting reverses.

The best tribute the Soviet army has earned came from the lips of General Loiseau, vice-chief of the French staff, when he spoke of "the colossal advantage of the Red Army over Western European forces." This rates as high praise, since the French staff has been politically one of the most reactionary in Europe. To Marshal Tukachevski, Vice-Commissar of Defense, is attributed the greatest influence in mechanizing and motorizing Soviet forces. He has made the statement, "The Red Army literally works night and day on the preparation of the country's defense, and to the assimilation of the formidable technique which the country has given it."

Two divisions are completely mechanized with light and heavy tank brigades, and ten divisions of the army are motorized. Last year in a Moscow parade 400 tanks were counted, undoubtedly only a small fraction of the tank forces. Tukachevski claims that tank production has risen 800 per cent between 1930 and 1934.

The Soviet air force, according to some observers, numerically exceeds that of any other European power, with from 3,000 to 5,000 planes. However, it is conceded that this figure includes many obsolete machines. Pierre Cot, French Air Minister, who made a tour of inspection in Russia, announced that Russian pursuit planes attain a speed of 380 miles per hour and bombers 300 miles per hour. Germany displays much concern about the strength of the Russian air force, and not without cause. For Russia can bomb enemy centers without fear of enemy planes bombing its own.

The size of the army has been variously estimated at from 1,100,000 to 1,300,000 men. While conscription feeds this force, the bulk of the recruits serve five years, which makes the army virtually a professional body. These figures include the Far Eastern army, of approximately 200,000 men. Distance of course would prevent this force from offering substantial assistance to the west in case of a general war. Thus the Red Army in Europe falls below the strength which the German army will soon have. A great weakness lies in the scarcity of railroads. In case Russia should be forced back from her first line of defense in the west, grave handicaps in this respect would arise.

In morale Russia ranks easily above the other powers. The Commissariat of Defense lays great stress on propaganda in the army. Soldiers undergo a vigorous political training, and the recently stimulated nationalistic propaganda has undoubtedly had considerable effect on the morale. Also, the Commissariat has been careful to see that Communist and Young Communist party members number 49 per cent of the army, and that the majority of peasants in the army come from collectivized farms. In case of war it is certain that the Russian army will display the extraordinary spirit of the French revolutionary army of 1793.

The first line of France's military machine is the extraordinary system of fortifications along the Rhine frontier called the Maginot line. A complicated network of steel and concrete emplacements, with elaborate communications, gas-defense equipment, electric power, light, telephone, radio, and fire control, these fortifications constitute a strong barrier against attack. Germans trying to breach it would be faced with an enflading fire of all sorts of explosives and missiles from arms so stationed that all areas exposed to fire are covered. An alarm signal can set this in motion within two minutes. Manning this line, 24,000 crack troops including various bodies of experts were to have taken up their duties permanently last March.

The establishment of this permanent force marked the culmination of a great reorganization of the French army. After the war the permanent army of 106,000 was largely concerned with training the one-year conscripts. This arrangement met with so much criticism that reorganization began. The expert force in the Maginot line was one fruit, the creation of mechanized and motorized forces another. Within a few hours now, a large body of mechanized and motorized troops can be mobilized. This comprises seven motorized infantry divisions with tractor-drawn artillery and light-armored carriers and one mechanized cavalry division. While this does much to answer the demands of French partisans of Von Seeckt, France's military fate still remains in the hands of the conscript army. Last year the Chamber of Deputies gave approval to raising the military-service period to two years. Today France has an army ready to start a war of approximately 400,000 men (exclusive of forces in the colonies). Reserves are estimated at over 6,000,000.

The air force, similarly, has been renovated and expanded since 1933. Indeed, the French air force exists as perhaps the best answer to Douhet's dream. Organized independently of the army and navy, it appears capable of delivering a sudden blow at vital enemy centers. Numerically the French air force rivals that of Russia—3,000 to 5,000 machines; most of them, however, are considered out of date. According to the new conception of emphasizing quality rather than quantity, first-line planes have been reduced from 1,600 to 1,010. By the spring of 1936 two-thirds of the air force was expected to be furnished with new planes from a renovated airplane industry geared for large-scale production.

The question of morale in the French army is most important, for at the present time France is undergoing social revolution. The rank and file of the army represent so well the recent radical trend of the electorate that the mass of the army may be labeled "left." At a recent army parade near Paris troops overstepped discipline so far as to give the clenched-fist salute. This may have been by way of defiance to many of the officers, who are anti-republican, fascist, and royalist. Blum talks of the "souffle républicain" which must blow through the army, and left-wing leaders have been clamoring for a purging of the anti-republican elements in the army. Such a house-cleaning, however, might interfere with army efficiency and it is a grave question whether it can be accomplished. Only war can show whether the old union sacrée of the last war can be renewed, or whether anti-republican elements would sabotage an army carried on the uprush of social-revolutionary feeling.

Great Britain can hardly be classified as one of the great European military powers. The regular army (exclusive of the Indian forces) amounts to only 147,502 officers and men. The 176,945 officers and men in the Territorials (militia) really constitute a reserve force and would require some time to mobilize. Other reserves are estimated at approximately 140,000 men. It should not be assumed that 147,502 men would be ready for immediate service on the Continent, for disturbances on the border of the empire forced the government in the past year to send from 30,000 to 40,000 men to Egypt and Palestine. Indeed, during the Franco-British military conversations last spring, the French were said to have discounted any material aid from the British army in France and even to regard British military forces as quite inadequate to stem another German invasion of Belgium.

However, Britain's land forces, small as they are, have been thoroughly modernized recently, with mechanized regiments and motorized troops. Britain's air force, since Baldwin's famous remark about Britain's frontier being on the Rhine, has been considerably increased. Production of planes has proceeded on a vast scale and new inventions have been a prominent feature. The air force is estimated at 1,700 first-line planes, including squadrons in the colonies.

Profound doubt exists about the morale of any large army which Britain might seek to throw into a conflict on the Continent. The English tradition is opposed to both standing and conscript armies. Indicative of this is the fact that today the standing army is only made legal by the passage annually of a special Act of Parliament which suspends the operation of an older militia act; moreover, government ministers show great hesitancy about proposing conscription. At present the War Office expresses real concern because, in spite of a vast recruiting campaign, Englishmen have not responded to the call of the colors. Christian pacifism à la Lansbury, which has affected considerable portions of the populace, accounts for some of this; a persistent hangover from the last war and isolationism—almost as strong as in the United States—for the rest. In another war it seems probable that Englishmen will hardly spring to arms as enthusiastically as they did in 1914.

The navy, of course, constitutes Britain's real strength. In spite of much criticism at home and abroad, the British navy still prevails as the strongest in the world. It is significant that when the High Seas Fleet arrived in the Mediterranean in the fall of 1935, Mussolini suddenly adopted a conciliatory tone. It may be true that the menace of Italian bombers caused real apprehension in Admiralty quarters. But it is arguable that British diplomacy rather than any weakness in naval forces caused the British retreat on the Ethiopian question. In capital ships and indeed in almost all classes of naval vessels, except submarines, the British navy far outclasses any Continental power or any conceivable combination of Continental powers.

Thus if the military machines of the various European powers are set in motion, the struggle will involve highly mechanized shock divisions backed up by more or less well-trained conscript armies. The mechanized forces will not necessarily deliver an early fatal blow, not by a long shot. For so widely has the mechanization wave spread—Tukachevski's methods as an answer to Von Seeckt's, for example—that the new techniques are likely to cancel each other out. The same applies, in the opinion of many, to the techniques of chemical warfare. Opposing mechanized machines, in the opinion of many, may lock wheels in a stalemate from the start.

In such a case the conflict would settle down to the position warfare which military men ever since the war have been exerting themselves to find means to prevent. Some military authorities predict that economic exhaustion would then develop so quickly that breakdown of one side or the other would quickly follow. However rapid this tempo might be, it seems certain that mass conscript armies would certainly have to telescope the small armies of their own technicians. At that point morale would become more important than mechanization. It would hardly seem possible that armies could march on propaganda alone, and war can reach a stage where a nation in arms must show its guts. Perhaps the organizations of Goebbels and his like will turn out to have extraordinary success. But experience in the last war demonstrated that so far as morale is concerned, democracies have a better chance to stand adversity than autocracies.

[Mr. Hanighen's article will be followed next week by a study by Maxwell S. Stewart of the economic resources of the various European powers.]

Art on Relief

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

ART, for the average American, is a framed reproduction, hung too high and slightly askew, of a Maxfield Parrish heroine swinging in a blue-green-pink landscape which it is to be hoped nature will never be forced to emulate. On the walls of nondescript classrooms in grade and high school he may have seen, through glass darkly, conventional dusty photographs of sections of the frieze of the Parthenon, which in the sunny air of the Grecian day seemed alive and moving to passersby whose experience and faith it so richly expressed. The clear colors of the maps in the history department or in a test tube over a Bunsen burner in the chemistry lab are about as close to art as the average school child comes.

If our average American had a grandmother's house to visit he may have seen a chromo or two which had the merit at least of not being emasculated shadows of a remote culture. And if by good fortune he had the right great-grandmother still living in the right original home he might have found out that the average American has not always lived in an artistic vacuum either of taste or of participation. Our ancestors not only lived in finely proportioned houses, however simple, and surrounded themselves with furniture of extraordinarily good design and quality—again however simple; they also had portraits on their parlor walls which were often not mere likenesses but art in the best sense, and murals in their front halls painted with fresh colors and bold designs that so-called moderns might justly envy.

Between the early flowering of the decorative arts (its extent is only now being discovered) and our present relative poverty a capitalist industrial age has intervened. It has spread much of that "intellectual desolation" which goes with automatic labor; by its overwhelming force it also upset all values and spread a colossal bewilderment which neither taste, talent, nor tradition could for the time surmount. All three were kept alive, to be sure, but mainly in the hothouse of the art gallery, where art rapidly became the privilege of the rich. The general public was cut off from its heritage; the artist, through being forced to compete in a narrow market on the hunt for sensations, was denied his natural growth. For all social purposes art went underground while mass production spread a film of "standardization" over the face of the land. But just as there is ample evidence that beneath the standardization of bathtubs and motion-picture magazines there still exists a rich regional diversity of extraordinary vitality, so it becomes increasingly apparent that artistic taste, talent, and tradition are still live forces in ordinary American life. It was perhaps to be expected that in a period when one industrial drive had spent itself—and its profits—and a new one had not yet begun, this artistic impulse should assert itself both as a search for compensation and as an autonomous social impulse. The gratifying thing is that it is gathering great impetus in the form of a popular response.

The evidence to prove these statements is to be found in the record of the Federal Art Project, which has released and stirred up an amount of interest and activity in art entirely out of proportion to the brief months of its existence. There has been much loose talk about the folly of covering innocent plaster walls with amateur murals. There is red tape, of course, and some boondoggling* in all colors. But the fact remains that the Works Progress Administration in the name of relief has had an amazing return of good art on its investment in the artistic resources of the American people. This is not to assume, of course, that the whole problem of the artist in society has been solved by putting him on relief which may be withdrawn at will; the Federal Art Project does serve as a blueprint to indicate the function that art might and should perform in a civilized society.

The range of the Federal Art Project, whose national director is Holger Cahill, can only be suggested in this brief commentary. It is working in all three fields of taste, talent, and tradition: it has put artists to work in every state in the union; it is barnstorming the outer regions with traveling exhibits which are proving a great success; one of its most ambitious and important undertakings is the Index of American Design, which will bring together in portfolios a complete file of designs, past and present, used or created by Americans in the decorative arts. (Most governments in Europe have already performed this important and fruitful task.) The drawings which appear on these pages are samples of the work being done in the graphic-arts division. The black-and-white is the most democratic of all art forms because it is inexpensive to produce, and prints can be easily and widely distributed at relatively small cost. It is particularly ironical that dealers should have created for prints an artificial snob sale, so that individuals with but few dollars to spend on art have been deprived of its least costly form, while the artist has been deprived of a wide sale and therefore of that full use of his powers which is a condition for the highest development of any talent.

* This long-suffering word is used in its historic, not its diehard Republican sense. It was Maury Maverick who first recalled that in pioneer days to "toggle" was to contrive something useful out of almost nothing. Daniel Boone once invented a device which enabled him to carry his rifle on his head when swimming a river. It was called a "Boontoggle."

The Federal Art Project is helping to release the black-and-white from its artificial bonds. In order to avoid the charge as well as the fact of competition with artists not enrolled, the etchings, engravings, lithographs, and wood-cuts are not for sale. They are distributed to public institutions which have no budget for buying art. Portfolios or single prints are allocated to primary schools, high schools, colleges, libraries, hospitals, government buildings and departments, including federal, state, and municipal departments, and to various institutions supported in whole or in part by taxes. (A like procedure is followed in distributing murals and easel paintings.)

The subject and technique of artists working on the project are not regimented. They are, however, held to a high standard of quality by competent supervisors drawn from artists on relief or in some cases recruited from craftsmen who may be self-supporting or not close enough to the edge to qualify for relief. In order to insure high standards, up to 25 per cent of this supervising personnel may be drawn from non-relief groups. This has led, incidentally, to a new association among artists and craftsmen in which inexperienced artists or even pupils are associated with more or less outstanding men and women. In the large cities modern graphic studios have been set up; and here supervisors and assistants work together, exchanging skills and ideas, and achieving for the first time in this country a group activity among artists that is both stimulating and productive.

The project, being federal in its set-up and allowing for much local autonomy, is forwarding the literal decentralization of art. By creating a widespread interest in art it is expanding a market which has been hitherto concentrated in large centers, mainly New York. By the same token it is drastically changing the character of that market from snob to popular. In still another sense it is helping to make art and the artist an integral part of society. With the market organized as it has been, the artist who was merely a good craftsman could not exercise his talent. Given the opportunity to teach younger and more talented artists at a living wage, he is enabled to perform in his own bailiwick a socially useful function and at the same time follow his individual bent.

Women's House of Detention by Nan Lurie, New York

It remains to be said that the demand for the prints of the graphic-arts division, as well as for the output of the other sections of the Federal Art Project, far exceeds the supply. In hundreds of institutions the average American is now having a taste of art, of indigenous American art, and he is obviously liking it. The accompanying prints bear out the claim of the project both as to the quality of its products and the lack of censorship of subject matter. They represent a wide geographical distribution as well as a broad range of techniques. Certainly such drawings will tend to bring to life the dead walls and dull hours of many a classroom. They will also further the primary aim of the Federal Art Project—to destroy the false concept of art as a luxury and put it in its natural place as a free and democratic expression of the life of a society.

Rendezvous With a Dream

BY BARBARA WERTHEIM

News item: Roosevelt, if reelected, may call kings, dictators, and presidents to great-power peace conference. To include King Edward VIII, Joseph Stalin, Benito Mussolini, Adolf Hitler, President Lebrun.

MR. ROOSEVELT: My friends, I am deeply moved as I welcome you here on this historic occasion. We are not met by chance, but each of us, designated by fate to strive to lead his country toward the larger life, is conscious as he stands here that he individually and all of us collectively have a rendezvous with destiny. That rendezvous we must keep. Out of it must spring a nobler future for all mankind. We can—

MUSSOLINI (interrupting): Words, words. I came here to talk business.

ROOSEVELT: All right, Duce, I'm with you. It's so soon after election, sometimes I forget that it's all over and I get started on one of those speeches automatically. By the way, how do you fellows keep it up, anyway? They tell me I've been pretty good lately, but that's just campaign foolery. We have a regular season for it—opens around the middle of August and—

KING EDWARD: I say, do you really? A season for orat'ry, what? I say, that's when the grouse-shooting season starts at home—August 12. Parliament adjourns and we all go to Scotland. Do come over, old boy, when you're not having a Presidential year. Put you up at Balmoral.

ROOSEVELT: Thanks so much, sir, I should be delighted. But as I was saying to the Duce, I couldn't stand up at any time in any year and wring tears and huzzahs from the crowd the way he can. What's the trick?

MUSSOLINI: What you need is a balcony. Always stand on a balcony and talk down to them. Your smile is all right, Mr. President, but it doesn't compare with my frown. Look fierce. That's what they want. Like this—[he strikes the famous Duce pose—hands on hips, chin jutting out, head thrown back, eyes glaring. There is a round of applause]. The Führer here has a pretty good system too, don't you, Adolf?

HITLER: Heil Hitler! Ja, sure. You have to get in the mood. First I get Putzi Hanfständel to play me some Wagner—the ride of the Valkyrie. I close my eyes and think about the Vaterland. Then I read a chapter from "Mein Kampf." Then I am ready. I am inspired. The crowd goes wild. They worship me. Heil Hitler!

ROOSEVELT: Not bad, not bad at all. What's your method, Joe? You seem to go over with your people as big as the best of us.

STALIN: Very simple. I don't say anything. I call in Pravda and Izvestia and I say, "Write this down. 'Our great and beloved Stalin has made the greatest speech of his great career. So great was the crowd, it formed a procession seven miles long and marched around the Red Square for eighteen hours. Comrade Stalin is the greatest man in the world.' " Then they put up another picture of me, a hundred feet high and fifty feet wide, and the people read the papers and see the picture, and that is all they need.

ROOSEVELT: That's quite an idea, but I'm afraid I couldn't do that here. You know, sometimes I think America isn't the land of opportunity after all. But we were here to talk about something else. Now, let's see, what was it? Er—fishing? yachting? the navy?—something like that.

MUSSOLINI: It was colonies.

HITLER: It was the Ukraine, und maybe Austria. Maybe it was Czecho-Slovakia.

STALIN: No, it was Japan.

LEBRUN (humbly): Pardon, messieurs, it was what you call the peace, no?

ROOSEVELT: Yes, Papa Lebrun is right. Now I remember. Well, what do you suggest, Papa?

LEBRUN: Tiens, monsieur, moi? I do not know about these grandes affaires. I am an old man. I live in the Elysée, quite happy. When I go out they salute me and sometimes I go to the races in a silk hat. But the peace, I know nothing of her.

ROOSEVELT (to King Edward): And you, sir?

EDWARD: Ah, rather. Jolly good thing, peace. Now, we English, Mr. er—[aside, to Lebrun] I say, what's the fellow's name, old man?

LEBRUN: I think it is M. Woodrow Wilson, no?

(Just then a White House usher comes in with a telegram which he gives to Hitler while they all crowd around excitedly.)

HITLER: It's from Goebbels. It says "Lieber Adolf: Hermann and I have arranged a nice surprise for you. We have taken over the government so you can stay in America and have a long vacation. Don't bother to come back. Putzi sends his love. He is going to sing Parsifal at the opening of Hermann's new opera house."

MUSSOLINI: } Sapristi! Why did I leave my country?

STALIN: } Zyxcvzcxb! Think of Trotsky in the (simultaneously) } Kremlin!

(They both rush out as fast as they can go. There is a moment of silence and then a knock on the door, and Arthur Krock pokes his head in.)

KROCK: The boys from the press are outside, Mr. President. Can we have a statement?

ROOSEVELT (flashing that smile): Hello, Arthur. Why, yes, you can say that we have discussed the problem in detail from every point of view. No decision has been reached, but we are making progress.

SOME of the striplings around the office occasionally ask me, "What was New York like back in the old days?" At such times I eye them coldly, but if a hat chances to drop I can be induced to talk. And while a single one remains to listen I like to reminisce about the old, old Morning Telegraph. The office was on Fiftieth Street and Eighth Avenue in what had been the stable of the adjacent street-car railway, which was electrified before my time. I refer to the summer of 1908. But the paper remained a publication devoted chiefly to horses and vaudeville actors.

The first item which I ever wrote for print was a contribution to the first-page column of the paper which was signed Beau Broadway. It was accepted and run at the top of the column. It was something about Francis Wilson as a golfer. As I remember it was very comical. I took home six copies of the paper and felt that I was Beau Broadway. They started me on space and the first week I made $40, but of course that couldn't last. After that I was on a salary of $20, and it took me ten years to get back to the standard which I had originally set for myself.

Still, money wasn't everything because each night we played poker across the copy desk. We had two copy readers and they both sat in and read copy between pots. A story had to be very hot to get any attention after midnight. Even when I wanted to go home early I couldn't because Shep Friedman, the night editor, used to say, "I'm assigning you to the game, Broun." The reasons for this developed early in my ten months on the Telegraph. Shep was a good newspaperman but a terrible poker player. Most of the players in the game were printers, and when he tried to borrow money from them they would laugh at him. But I was a cub reporter. We played with money, and Shep would reach over to my pile and say, "I'll raise you fifty cents." If I raised him he'd take another of my dollars and say, "I'll raise you again." Pretty soon I realized that even if I won I'd only get my money back.

But he was nice to me, and the second day I was on the paper he gave me an assignment to do an interview. I was to have a by-line on it, but the thing didn't pan out. My assignment was to go to Hammerstein's Victoria and interview Valeska Suratt. Irving Lewis, the managing editor, heard the instructions and he said, "I guess I'll walk down with you." On the way down Broadway he gave me a good deal of advice about newspaper work and suggested that I should imitate his style. As we got near the stage door of the theater he said, "I think I'll do this interview myself." Then he added, "You better wait outside. You know she always kisses me."

I doubt whether any newspaper in New York ever had quite the intimate atmosphere of the old Telegraph. It was like a tough Emporia Gazette. The city room was always cluttered up with all sorts of people who didn't seem to have any business there. Very often you couldn't get to your desk because there would be a couple of chorus girls sitting there waiting for a friend who was finishing an editorial. I used to write editorials myself and it made me feel very lonely. Everybody wrote editorials. Generally at the last minute somebody would remember that we didn't have any editorials. Then Bide Dudley and I would each write one. The editorials were not regarded as very important because the Telegraph had no policy about anything except that it was against reformers. Vaudeville reviews were very important because the actors advertised.

The Morning Telegraph was a very hard place to get any sleep because even when the poker game broke up it was not my custom to go home. Charlie and I used to go over to the Eldorado, which was a dance hall covering several acres. I was young then and a basketball player. I'd hate to have to dance once around that floor now. Charlie was the assistant foreman of the composing room, and he and I were both somewhat smitten with the exhibition dancer at the Eldorado. She had a partner but she didn't care anything about him. She would sit with us until it came time to do her turn and then she would hand one or the other of us a silver dollar. This was not for keeps. It was the coin which was supposed to start the silver shower at the end of the act.

She would lock her arms around the neck of her partner, a man named Oscar, and he would move faster and faster until she was whirling around horizontally like one of those captive airplanes at Coney Island. There was a good deal of art to it. I mean on our part. Whichever one had the silver dollar had to pick precisely the right psychological moment to toss the coin out to the middle of the floor. If you picked the right time and made it land with a clang, quarters and nickels and dimes would follow.

I drifted apart from Elaine—I think her name was Elaine—after I began to go to Sweeney's. Sweeney's was a good deal tougher than the Eldorado. It was on the corner where Macy's now stands. Sweeney is gone too. They say he stabbed a man in the place one night. That's why I was so proud of having a fight with him. We quarreled about a girl. I was her escort and she was a stranger to him. He asked her to dance without first requesting my permission. I declined for her. When he asked a second time I punched him in the nose. They say we made a pretty picture rolling around on the floor together and that I was wise to keep on rolling. A waiter stood close by intent upon hitting me over the head with a bottle, but he couldn't tell which head was which.

But I see that the last listener has fled. You must pardon the garrulity of an old man. The melodies linger on. Here in my forty-eighth year sometimes I grow a little homesick for the old, old Morning Telegraph as I sit down to write a page about federal finances. And even now I can't say that I am sorry that I went to a car barn instead of a school of journalism.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOVELISTS KNOW WHAT PHILOSOPHERS DON'T

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN THE issue of the Commonweal for August 21 there is an article called Philosophy into Fiction by Francis X. Connolly of Fordham University. I dare say that Professor Connolly and I would disagree about a number of things, including, perhaps, the ultimate implications of this very article, but I find here in an unexpected quarter a point of view which I should be glad to find more often in persons whose general convictions I am more inclined to share.

To begin with, Professor Connolly believes that today even the average "intellectual" has been more pervasively influenced by art than by philosophy, that his intellect (I should prefer to say his intellectual temper) has been molded more by Proust than by Bergson, by James Joyce than by William James, or, as he might have added even more strikingly, by T. S. Eliot than by Jacques Maritain. Even those who read stiffer and more formal works probably owe more to "Point Counter Point" and "Brave New World" than they do to the works of utilitarian or anti-utopian philosophers, and in most cases at least the admirers of Karl Marx read him—if at all—long after they had read various of the realistic novelists from Tolstoy to James Farrell. Nor is it really necessary for Professor Connolly to limit himself to "today." The chances are that in so far as the average Greek was imbued with the Greek Spirit he owed the fact more to Aeschylus and Sophocles than to Plato and Aristotle.

Professor Connolly is pleased that all he says should be so, and he finds it evidence of something more than a mere childish desire on the part of the public to have its pill of philosophy sugar-coated by fiction. He sees that the concreteness which art requires holds the artist close to observed fact, while the philosopher can readily escape into a world of concepts much easier to manipulate. But I am not sure that he would follow me all the way into a paradox which I am tempted to risk—namely, that art is more convincing than philosophy because it is, quite literally, truer; that, to take cases, Proust is truer than Bergson and Mr. Farrell truer than Marx.

The novelists are, to be sure, less clear and less precise. But for that very reason they are truer. Every philosophy and every "ideology" must sacrifice truth to clarity and precision just because we demand of a philosophy or an "ideology" greater clarity and precision and completeness than is compatible with human knowledge or wisdom. What is most true and most valuable in any philosophy is not the tight and inclusive system which it presents but those glimpses and divinations and aperçus which the philosopher later formalized into his philosophical system. Most of us are not Platonists or Spinozans or Nietzscheans. We have accepted insight from each while rejecting the whole which each pretends to present. And it is just the philosophical superiority of art, not only that it suggests the complexity of life and human character, but also that it is everywhere closer to the most genuine and the most justifiable portions of man's thinking about life.

The realm of science on the one hand and the realms of logic and metaphysics on the other are separate from the realm of literature. The first deals with a physical world relatively so simple that systematic conclusions and usable laws may, temporarily at least, be formulated precisely. Logic and metaphysics, on the other hand, deal not with facts but with concepts, and their precision is analogous to the precision of geometry, where one is dealing not with complex and incompletely known nature but with premises of which one is sure because they are merely postulated. But philosophy in the more popular sense of the term, philosophy which consists in conclusions about human life in general, is often merely an inferior kind of art; art, that is to say, which has assumed a definiteness of statement which nothing can justify while it has lost the warmth, the vitality, and the eagerness of genuine art. Proust, one might contend, is truer than Bergson because Proust is communicating an experience to the meaning of which Bergson had attributed a specious definiteness and completeness. Mr. Farrell, one might go on, is truer than Marx because he is sharing with us those observations concerning the influence of economic factors on life which Marx attempted to reduce to laws and which his investigations of economic processes were, at bottom, merely efforts to justify. And the larger part of the intellectual public is more familiar with Proust than with Bergson, more familiar with novelists like Farrell than with Marx, because, even when unaware of its reasons for doing so, it rebels against the ambitious falsity of philosophy while accepting the human persuasiveness as well as the human elusiveness of art.

I shall press the paradox no farther. Already it has carried me a bit farther than in sober earnest I should care to go, but the element of truth that is in it ought at least to make plain the error of those who insist that a novel or a play should have not only a meaning but a doctrine as well. The best as well as the most effective works of art may sometimes be those in which the author is in pursuit of a truth, but the only reason for composing a novel or a play instead of a treatise is that the author is unwilling to reduce to a formula an insight which he can present without violation only through a concrete situation whose implications he can sense but only sense. Once the meaning of a work of art can be adequately stated in abstract terms it ceases to have any raison d'être. It has ceased to be truer than philosophy and has become at best only the sugar-coated pill.

If those are right who maintain that the field of what we positively know and can state with precision is constantly growing, that even the uncertainties and ambiguities which still surround every insight into moral and psychological situations are destined to disappear in the light of clear and positive knowledge until there is nothing important about man which we do not know with scientific precision, then the field and the utility of art are shrinking, and the time will come when it will cease to have any function at all. But art will continue to exist and to be truer than philosophy just so long as—but no longer than—there are truths which elude formulation into laws.

BOOKS

Anthropologist

AFTER ALL. By Clarence Day. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

CLARENCE DAY was essentially an anthropologist and the essence of his work is in "This Simian World." His "Life with Father," a large excursus on the manners of a particular family, has perhaps temporarily obscured his first book. But "This Simian World" remains his masterpiece, his outline of human behavior, and his revelation of his own original, profound, and humorous character. I do not know any other book of its length which says as much as this about the race of mankind, or any book ten times as long which says more. If "Life with Father" were not so delightful, admirers of "This Simian World" might wish that it were Day's only book and could be referred to merely as Day, as the histories of Gargantua and Pantagruel are sufficiently known as Rabelais.

But in an age of journalism Clarence Day was naturally called upon to write more than his masterpiece, and besides the domestic sketches which have been collected as "God and My Father" and "Life with Father" he leaves a variety of charming odds and ends now brought together in "After All," which is a revised edition of "The Crow's Nest," his second book, with about as much again of later dates. Here are The Three Tigers, which in five hundred laughing words practically exhausts the subject of romance and realism; the masterly note On Cows; and Objections to Reading, a subject barely hinted at in Day's general survey of simian traits. Here is Buffoon Fate, on being aware—and on what good it does to be aware—of the plight of "a fragile yet aspiring species on a stormy old star." Here are little pungent studies of Coventry Patmore and Artzibashef and Hardy and Shaw and Fabre and Maeterlinck and Hamlet and Hume and Epictetus; surprising shrewd biographies of Thackeray and Charles Dilke and Parnell and George Washington; and random comments, not as random as they may seem, on fashions in love, grammarians, nursery and nonsense rhymes, animals to take the place of machines, fear in rabbits and by analogy in men, elections by jury, life in the Arctic, business, time as god, immigration, knighthood, prophets, Lyman Abbott, Perneb, Socrates, and the wife of Prometheus. Some of Day's observations are slight, not all of equal merit or point, and his verse is plainly inferior to his prose. But he never wrote more than a few lines without saying something that startles and pleases. "After all," his wife in her preface quotes him as saying, "it's just my way of looking at these problems and people." He always had a way. Most of his readers will never have reflected on the passion of architects for flights of steps. Day, crippled by arthritis, saw the world as full of steps, and his Legs vs. Architects will make everybody suddenly see, and feel, them.

His wife in her preface tells how he revised "The Crow's Nest." "Some of the essays he discarded; others he pruned carefully to get rid of the personal animosities, overweighted sarcasm, and long-winded philosophizing. Most of all, however, he wished to get rid of the creaking mechanics of humor, such as parentheses, semi-comic explanations, and jocular asides." To compare the two versions is to see that his editing was as skilful as his writing had been.

This is a good occasion to point out, I believe for the first time in print, that Day ten years ago did an earlier piece of editing which would be classic if it had not been overlooked. The Harpers asked him to edit in two volumes the essays of Frank Moore Colby. He put in most of a year in reading and rereading all of Colby's writings, as when a boy he had read, he told me, "Robinson Crusoe" and "Pilgrim's Progress" and "Gulliver's Travels" over and over. When he was saturated with these essays, and had the feel of them and of their author, he undertook to do what Colby might have done if he had lived, revising and rearranging until what had been a scattered chaos, full of topical matters, took on a lively and lasting form. Apparently nobody noticed what Day had done until I was collating some of the Colby essays eight years later, perceived the changes, and wrote to ask him about them. He said he had always wondered how he dared take so many liberties and whether he would be blessed or cursed if an investigation ever came. "Yes," he wrote, "the 'credit' belongs to me if it is one, but I think of it as a responsibility which I took without asking permission."

I suppose no editor ever took such a responsibility and carried it out with less recognition and more success. But now it ought to be told that "The Colby Essays" owes as much to Day as any book ever owed to a friendly editor.

CARL VAN DOREN

A Program for Socialists

AFTER THE NEW DEAL, WHAT? By Norman Thomas. The Macmillan Company. $2.

IF THIS book is a campaign document, it is one of a new sort, for it fixes the reader's attention quite as much upon the problems of 1940 and 1944 as upon the issues of next November. Indeed, it is the projection of present forces into the future which makes the discussion arresting. The thesis is that the next catastrophe of capitalist society in America, whether war or depression, threatens fascism. This Mr. Thomas finds in the advanced and irreparable decay of capitalism, in the willingness of Americans to follow such a promising fascist leader as the late Huey Long, and in the unrepented denials of civil liberties currently widespread in this country. Within half a generation or less, Mr. Thomas implies, the stage will be set for the crushing of freedom, but we need not reconcile ourselves to seeing the play acted out.

A farmer-labor party, of which he seems to entertain some hope by 1940, may put us immensely forward in preventing the devolution into an imperialist totalitarian state. The backbone of such a party would be the progressive labor groups now under the sway of Messrs. Lewis and Hillman. Into it would go the Socialists, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the Wisconsin Progressive Party, the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party, and the Communist Party, if this last "can persuade its allies of the sincerity and reasonable permanence of its new line." Each of these groups, pledged to one national platform, would retain its identity, keep and strive to extend its own membership. "The Socialist Party's most useful future may be as an educational force in the vanguard of a real farmer-labor party."

The Socialist Party must not permit the conciliatory inclinations and immediate, often opportunist, demands of other groups to water down insistence upon the essential prerequisites of an economy of abundance. These essentials are the common ownership and democratic management of the great means of production, which must be employed in production for use, not profit. Mr. Thomas is quite prepared to accept the responsibility of the leftmost leader in the American economic struggle, a position in which he finds himself as a result of the recent emasculation of Communist professions. Adjustments within capitalism, hope placed in a "clarifying amendment" of the Constitution, merely waste "with prodigal hands time and energy already perilously limited. The issue is revolutionary . . . Capitalism cannot be rejuvenated. . . . Its loyalties are daily more anti-social and unlovely. Its institutions grow steadily weaker save as they acquire the feverish strength of fascism." If we do not use power machinery to conquer poverty, it will destroy us. "Here, there is no middle way."

Though this is an eloquent book, the author does not fall victim to self-deception. He is realistic, solemnly so, about the difficulties which lie in the path of a social revolution in America. The unreadiness of the majority in the labor movement, the inert condition of the farmers, the pathetic eagerness of liberals to vest their hopes in messiahs, the growing contentment with mere distributors' cooperatives, and most of all the necessity of realizing socialism on an international scale are all passed in candid review. This is anything but a book of dogma. It reveals the wise and experienced public man, readier with charity than with compromise, devoid of personal ambition, and mindful of conflicts of thought and action the whole world over.

In the earlier part of the volume Mr. Thomas reviews the premises, practice, and results of the New Deal, placing it in perspective. Many critics of President Roosevelt's program have regarded his policies as directed at recovery more than at reform. Mr. Thomas is at once more accurate and more destructive of the President's title to prophecy by acknowledging and analyzing the belief of the Administration that the New Deal would produce permanent prosperity. Here Thomas and Roosevelt are on different levels of knowledge, with Thomas possessing the advantage. He points out that the New Deal not only did not but could not succeed.

In some sections the book becomes a family conference with Socialists. Many will welcome Thomas's discussion of the recent withdrawal of the Old Guard centering in New York. "Unquestionably," he says, "it had on many occasions served the party loyally and well. It had, however, grown old in spirit and, consciously or subconsciously, suspicious of younger members. It had carried on a great fight to save the party from communism, it was tired and it reacted more quickly and more aggressively to a threat of communism . . . than to a threat from the old familiar capitalism. . . ." It really stood less upon principle than upon the determination to possess the party leadership. Despite the Old Guard's sabotage of the national party, Mr. Thomas will welcome back members of this group when reflection and time have freshened their ideals.

Mr. Thomas rightly shows that Socialist adherence is far greater than reflects itself in party membership. He might have pushed his claims farther. Any observant person must have been struck with the growth of Socialist contention from bitter analysis in the time of Marx, to lonely theoretical insistence a generation ago, to impressive contribution in our present crisis. In this achievement of formulating socialism for America without losing sight of universal and ultimate objectives, Mr. Thomas in the last decade has played the most important part.

Statement Without Passion

THE MEDITERRANEAN AND OTHER POEMS. By Allen Tate. The Alcestis Press. $7.50.

THERE is today a kind of sterility in much of the poetry by our recognized poets. We may blame the age or the poets, but it is there. Several of these poets, like Allen Tate, are better known for their critical essays than for their rather sparse poetic output. The reason is clear. This is a period of redefinition to include or oppose new ideas concerning art and its place in society, an age in which the poet works with statements which he may or may not be able to clothe in feelings. "Poetry," writes Tate in his essay "Three Types of Poetry," "finds its true usefulness in its perfect inutility, a focus of repose for the will-driven intellect that constantly shakes the equilibrium of persons and societies with its unrelieved imposition of partial formulas upon the world. When the will and its formulas are put back into an implicit relation with the whole of our experience, we get the true knowledge which is poetry."

But for all his definition of inutility in poetry, Allen Tate's own verse proves him to be in much the same predicament as the proletarian poets who use ideas in poetry—with the difference that he is working to reaffirm old and dying values. Critically, Tate is against propaganda in art, but he writes propaganda. He desires a wholeness of culture, preferably agrarian, but he knows that today there is no whole culture furnishing to the artist significant and familiar symbols. Tate dwells, therefore, upon the lost past. This past, for him, may be the classical age or it may be pre-Civil War Southern society.

Tate's poetry, despite its carefully wrought lines, its intellectuality, its occasionally striking images, is without that emotional impact upon the reader which true poetry provides. And if it is not poetry of "the revolt against the domination of science," of "the will trying to do the work of the imagination," which Tate, taking Yeats's definition of rhetoric, declares to be the root of romantic poetry and of its frustration, it escapes these precise categories only because Tate, being a modern intellectual, cannot give way to any sensation. He is incapable of poetry expressive of the whole creative experience and is unable to rely, even for the length of a lyric, upon a purely sensuous experience. His poetry and critical essays present one picture—that of the dialectician involved in a play with definitions. He is not a poet of wit, for he lacks a group of values generally accepted by a society which may be scoffed at genially. He must define his values and then scoff, and he does neither with a light touch. Nor is Tate a satirist, for satire is written best when the values of a social group are so well known, so nearly outworn, as to be hated. Tate lacks hatred and, for the most part, any real passion. He is ponderous, rhetorical; his oratory is forced, as if a scholar took the soap box and spoke not so much to move his audience as to prove himself clever with words.

The two most impressive poems in this book are The Mediterranean and To the Lacedaemonians, both poems of intellectual frustration. The first poem is on the lost classical age of man's greatness—a theme that has been better handled by other poets. The second poem is concerned with the tragedy of the Civil War, a favorite subject of Tate's. The heavy satire The Ivory Tower criticizes the sociological approach to poetry and to life; The Meaning of Death attempts to define modern man's mental predicament. Here, as often in Tate's work, the images are artificial:

Although at evening clouds infest the sky
 Broken at base from which the lemon sun
 Pours acid of winter on a useful view
 Four water towers, two churches, and a river.

The ending of the poem, "We are the eyelids of defeated caves," is a very forced image of defeat. And how can a really good poet write such a line as

Like a young harlot's false depriving pap, or work out such a silly image as the following?

Yet in a year, at thirty, one shall see
 The wisdom of history, how she takes
 Each epoch by the neck and, growling, shakes
 It like a rat while she faintly mews.

No, there is something wrong here. Tate is abstract and confused; he lacks feeling, music, grace. Some of his slight poems, metaphysical in manner, are not bad. But on the whole he pays the penalty of the artist espousing a special, narrow cause, of the logician who would argue for past greatness and complain of present tendencies.

EDA LOU WALTON

A Monument to Medicine

AN AMERICAN DOCTOR'S ODYSSEY. By Victor Heiser.
 W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

HERE in New York City or Yonkers (which periodically boasts the lowest death rate in the country or state, I forget which) we accept general good health as a matter of course. Fifty or a hundred cases of infantile paralysis become news of front-page importance, and Hollywood stars are advised to stay out of their swimming pools. Even physicians, nurses, and social workers trained in health matters will find it difficult to visualize a smallpox epidemic in a town of 1,000 people in which 500 die; they will find it difficult to grasp the actual significance, in human suffering and pain, of life in a land where half the children die before they reach the age of one year; where plague, cholera, dysentery sweep down to kill thousands; where leprosy, tuberculosis, malaria, typhoid fever are constant scourges; where practically every adult is infested with one or more parasites. It was a land such as this that Dr. Heiser found when he was given the job of supervising the health problems of the Philippine Islands after they were taken over by the United States; this book gives us the story of his career.

Dr. Heiser began his work in the Marine Hospital Service, where he was active in formulating an effective policy of health control of immigrants into the United States. When this country took over the Philippines he became first the Chief Quarantine Officer and then the Commissioner of Health. In 1914 he became Director for the East of the International Health Board of the Rockefeller Foundation, a position which afforded him the opportunity of carrying out vast public-health programs throughout Asia and Africa.

In the Philippines Dr. Heiser carried out a policy of health education, sanitation, mass vaccination, and quarantine control so great in scope and so momentous in effect that the simple description of his career becomes at once a work of major importance, even a monument to the author and the profession of medicine. The straightforward story of the conquest of one disease after another, the accounts of sacrifice and actual heroism need no literary embellishments to make an absorbing and fascinating book.

There are chapters of intense drama, the more effective because so simply told. The matter of teaching whole peoples, numbering millions, to use latrines instead of scattering their excreta over fields and alleys may appear trivial but represents a greater victory for mankind in its fight for health than perhaps even the discovery of insulin.

As a representative of the Rockefeller Foundation, Dr. Heiser traveled around the world sixteen times, winning the confidence of critical, often unfriendly officials, organizing health campaigns, advising on the establishment of hospitals, medical schools, health departments, and health ministries. His greatest efforts were exerted for the control of hookworm infestation, a disease of almost universal incidence in the tropics. The results have been brilliant.

Dr. Heiser resigned from the Rockefeller Foundation in 1935. His was in all ways a career of success, achievement, and honors, and it is set forth in a lively if not too modest a manner in this book. For the story of his accomplishments one can feel no hesitation in giving the author unstinted praise. But in another respect the book is a deep disappointment. Perhaps it is not fair to expect a man whose work was so integral a part of American imperialism—a word that curiously does not once appear in the book—to see the significance of the force which motivates all the foundations and institutes scattered among the "backward" peoples of Asia, Africa, and South America. But there is certainly no excuse for repeating in 1936 the drivel that McKinley gave the world as justification for the annexation of the Philippine Islands.

Other doubts also arrive as one reads this book, and Dr. Heiser does not put them to rest. He tells us proudly of the enormous increase of wealth in the Philippines under the Americans, of the increased production of sugar, tobacco, copra, hemp, gold. But he also tells us that "the average Filipino cannot even afford the two and a half pesos for 250 grains of quinine, an average treatment."

Dr. Heiser is surprised that "the Filipino had a difficult time comprehending that anybody should want to do anything for him without expecting something in return; he was always looking for a concealed motive. Service without expectation of reward, in the Anglo-Saxon sense, was outside his cosmogony, and he regarded giving for the sake of giving as absurd." Will Dr. Heiser forgive us if we too find it a little difficult to comprehend all this altruism? What especially confuses us are the figures of increasing American investments and increasing profits from these investments in the Philippine Islands, Asia, and everywhere else that American imperialism and American philanthropy appear side by side.

Tough Talk

STEPS GOING DOWN. By John T. McIntyre. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THE merit of this novel is that it sees life steadily through a peep-hole exactly fitted to its author's eye. The room of the world into which it conducts us is not necessarily an existing room. The city seems to be Philadelphia, and the moment is certainly contemporary; but the atmosphere, the furniture, and the fauna of the place had been created before Mr. McIntyre came along, and they were, as they remain, works rather of art than of nature. The naturalistic novel, the hard-boiled romance, the detective story, and the low-life movie had built the vulgar universe which here we see. The only new thing about it is its extraordinary clarity, its unannounced, undiscussed, and in the end quite fascinating completeness. It obeys its own crude laws with a perfect complacency; the existence of any other world is never noted; so that Mr. McIntyre's reward is our willingness to go with him wherever he goes—down whatever mean street, into whatever odorous boarding-house or tavern—because it cannot occur to us to doubt that these places are there for us to enter. And the number of them is very great, just as the population of Mr. McIntyre's fabulous city is beyond count; scarcely a chapter fails to bring forth some new creature consistent with the prevailing human pattern, and as likely as not his family or his friends will pile into sight before the author is through with him.

It is perhaps less accurate to say that we see this Philadelphia than to say that we hear it, and hear it talking. Mr. McIntyre's conversation is the bulk of his book, and it is most remarkable. He can do something with dialogue which is rarely done—build up not merely the mind, if any, that is expressing itself but the body also. The talk of these people is all meat, all human meat. The sarcasm of Pete, the bright helpfulness of Thelma, the hard-bitten loyalty of Sadie, the corruption of Hugo, the motherly wisdom of Dora, the rottenness of Cork are somehow there in the flesh, making themselves heard amid the din of cheapness for which in fact they supply with their various voices the true pitch, the keynote. Lowness here becomes lyrical, as for example when each of two street-walkers within Pete's hearing curses the other in the conviction that she has failed to keep the code. There is always a code, of course, as apparently there must be among the unrespectable, at least in fiction; and Mr. McIntyre nowhere suggests that there is any other kind of honor among his people than the kind with which fiction has made us familiar. His originality is of another sort, making itself known by the very special rankness with which Klegg and Spig and Toumey become real as soon as we overhear them murdering the English.

The failure of another class of persons in the book to be as convincing as these are is the sign of Mr. McIntyre's only limitation—a serious one, it seems to me. The class is represented by Gill, who has run away from a rich and educated family to live in back rooms of boarding-houses and drink the time away with fine fellows like Pete. It would appear that Mr. McIntyre had invented Gill as a sort of frame for his picture, a man bearing enough marks of the world outside to serve as a line drawn around this one of thieves and pimps and crooked lawyers. But Gill is entirely fantastic; for either he lapses into the lingo of Pete and Dora, and so becomes useless for his purpose, or else he soars off into occult nonsense concerning souls and their envelopes, and concerning the sins of modern science. Together with his uncle and several other men who lug a lot of curious learning into the book he is too mad to be interesting. I am not sure how seriously Mr. McIntyre takes these metaphysicians who so often stop the story; I do not know, for instance, whether to suspect him of a desire to reveal the respectable world as by and large a less wholesome one than Thelma's; but anyhow I must set the fellows down as phonies, and make a note of my failure to believe that Pete could have tolerated their big talk for ten minutes.

It is as if Mr. McIntyre had lacked after all the courage of his talent, and had tried to soften what was otherwise so perfectly and so uniquely hard. He could have confined himself to tough talk and still reminded us that there are other realms of discourse. The desire of any ambitious novelist is to suggest that the world he gives us, no matter how large it may be, is part of the still larger one which no single mind will ever master. How the thing is done only a great novelist knows; though anyone may know that it is not done with clouds of words. The cheapness of Mr. McIntyre's device, matching as it does the essential cheapness of his story, makes it impossible to call his novel very valuable. When it keeps within its limits, however, and sets its people sassing one another over their whiskey, it is quite literally priceless. It could have had no serious competitor for the honor it recently won as American contender in the All-Nations Prize-Novel Competition. If it goes on and wins over its European rivals it may be diverting to hear what the wide world thinks about the City of Brotherly Love.

Trotsky on World Trends

THE THIRD INTERNATIONAL AFTER LENIN. By Léon Trotsky. With an Introduction and Explanatory Notes by Max Schachtman. Pioneer Publishers. $3.

WHITHER FRANCE? By Léon Trotsky. Translated by John G. Wright and Harold R. Isaacs. Pioneer Publishers. 50 cents paper and $1 cloth bound.

A BOOK by Léon Trotsky is always an aesthetic and intellectual event, whatever attitude one may take toward his political credo. "The Third International" and "Whither France?" are representative Trotsky works, with all the author's strength and weaknesses. I doubt whether any political writer of the last decades has achieved anything approaching that clarity of style, that pregnancy of phrase, and that lucidity in the expression of thought. Unfortunately, however, his works have become in an increasing measure polemic attacks on the domestic and foreign policy of the Soviet Union.

In the "Third International After Lenin" the caustic quality is less apparent, though this, the earlier of the two works, presents Trotsky's side of the Stalin-Trotsky controversy. Written in 1928 in Alma Ata during the first period of Trotsky's banishment, the volume includes two major essays the larger of which—"The Draft Program of the Communist International. A Criticism of Fundamentals"—was written for the Sixth Congress of the Communist International as an appeal against the author's expulsion from the Russian Communist Party. Few of the delegates to this July, 1928, Congress were given an opportunity to see that important document, and even those few saw only the garbled and much abbreviated version that survived translation.

In his critical analysis of the program as presented to the Sixth Comintern Congress by Bucharin and Stalin, Trotsky investigates economic and political conditions in the countries of Europe and the United States, and arrives at the conclusion—which he later qualified—that the Socialist revolution is “immeasurably closer” in Europe than in America. At the height of an unprecedented prosperity, in June, 1928, he foresaw that “the very next crisis [in the United States] will attain extremely great depth and sharpness.” True, this prediction was in line with the accepted position of the Communist International and the American Communist Party. He differed from the official view in this, however, that he did not, as did the Comintern and its followers, see in this coming crisis the beginning of the end of American capitalism. The Communist Party of America paid dearly for its failure to recognize this obvious truth.

This investigation of American economic development is merely incidental to a general examination of world trends undertaken to demonstrate the Trotsky theory of the world revolution. It was Trotsky's contention that no country can carry on independently of the rest and that, consequently, socialism in one country is a dangerous delusion. From this to a general condemnation of Stalinist policies is the next logical step. Trotsky takes it in his stride. With characteristic foresight he outlines the inevitable consequence of Comintern practice—that it must lead along opportunist paths to compromise with bourgeois groups and governments. That it would ultimately result in Russia's entry into the League of Nations not even Trotsky would have believed possible eight years ago.

As one follows the clear line of Trotsky's reasoning, one is impressed and fascinated by the force of his arguments and the irresistible logic of his theoretical presentation. But it is the tragedy of this truly great mind that it so completely fails to grasp realities, that it cannot see things as they are when they contradict preconceived opinions and contravene accepted standards of action. The way of Trotsky and his followers has been an Odyssey of tragic mistakes and inconsistencies. Brought face to face with harsh reality, Trotskyite intransigence gives way in the most unexpected places.

One need only read “Whither France?” with a mind attuned to recent developments to realize how completely Trotsky has failed to evaluate the forces at work in present-day France. In the five articles—written between February, 1934, and June, 1936—which make up this book (the last of the series, The French Revolution Has Begun, appeared in The Nation) Trotsky pleads for a united front of labor but denounces a people's front which would include the petty-bourgeois Radical Socialist Party, which, in his eyes, is synonymous with counter-revolution. Without deceiving oneself as to the true character of the party of Herriot and Daladier, one must admit, in all fairness, that its representatives in the Chamber of Deputies gave an unexpected demonstration of loyalty to the Popular Front in their support of Blum's far-reaching legislative program and in their attitude during the strike period.

When the 1936 elections, contrary to Trotsky's predictions, gave a sweeping majority to the democratic group in Parliament, the People's Front had no alternative but to shoulder the responsibility it had incurred when it challenged the forces of reaction at the ballot box. Fascism was the only other choice. It behooved the labor parties to gain the respect and confidence of those workers and small farmers who form so large a part of the Radical Socialist Party by an honest fight against the common foe. Trotsky would have sacrificed this chance to win their support by brusquely refusing to cooperate with them on any terms.

Pioneer Publishers, in offering these translations to the American public, have made an important contribution to current political discussion.

DRAMA

FOR reasons best known to himself the skilful and popular playwright Philip Barry has chosen to revise for Broadway production a college comedy called "Spring Dance" (Empire Theater) which was written by two young ladies while they were students at Smith and performed there on some academic occasion. Even in its original form the piece must have been quite a remarkable achievement for young undergraduates, but the trouble is that Mr. Barry has not been able to dispel completely the class-day atmosphere. By moments the play is amusing enough in a rather guileless fashion, but the machinery creaks, and the dialogue is full of intramural humor which, like the family joke, is a trifle embarrassing in public.

The story concerns itself with a beautiful senior in love with a young man who fancies himself singular in feeling that marriage is a handicap to the ambitious male. He is about to be off on a vague exploration of Russia and its wonders, but when he seems to have some difficulty in making any goodby final, the classmates of the heroine form a plot to bring him to his senses—if that is what it is. Now any play which turns upon the question of whether or not a determined woman will get the man she has picked out for herself is necessarily devoid of suspense. Hence "Spring Dance" is compelled to rely for such interest as it has upon a picture of college life which wavers between realism and satire, and upon humor which consists rather too largely in jocose professorial sesquipedalianisms or in flip citations from the more celebrated literary classics. One is seldom sure whether one is supposed to be laughing with or at the adolescent wit and wisdom, and the defect is fatal. Most of the student talk is rather too stenographic to be either very amusing in itself or very pointed as satire. Mr. Barry, in other words, has failed to provide the perspective which was hardly to be expected of the young authors themselves.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

VICTOR has followed Sibelius's Violin Concerto with the remainder of the Sibelius Society Volume 4: the symphonic poems "Night Ride and Sunrise" and "The Oceanides," played—with occasional wavering of pitch at the ends of records—by the B. B. C. Symphony under Boult (three records, $5). These are works that I would expect a record company to issue only by subscription for the Sibelius-cultists, since I cannot imagine anyone else believing with Sibelius that his skill in construction and orchestration has succeeded in converting nothing into Something. And while I am on the subject, let me add a word about the Violin Concerto. It is, I said, mature Sibelius; but what is matured is the whole of Sibelius—the weak with the strong. Constant Lambert has observed, in defense of things like "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste," that it is better for the commonplace to be definitely segregated into a separate genre than for it to be an all-pervading aroma as it is in the music of Richard Strauss. But the commonplace, in Sibelius, is not segregated in "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste"; and one finds it in the second and third movements of the Violin Concerto, and even in passages of the first movement, which is the one movement of impressive consequence in substance and structure—that is, in the principal theme and its development in the form of cadenza for the solo violin.

If I survive this I shall have to dodge the bombs of the Brahms-cultists for my opinion of Brahms's Sextet Opus 18, recorded for the first time by the Pro Arte Quartet with assisting artists (Victor, four records, $8). With the first theme one is aware of the earnest young composer desirous of improving his moral nature; from then on one is aware of his desire to improve his technique of composition; and the result, to me, is a bore. The performance is adequate, the recording imperfect in balance.

Superb, on the other hand, in their richness of substance, vitality, spontaneity, and color is a group of Dvorak's Slavonic Dances, brilliantly played by the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra under Vaclav Talich (Victor, four records, $6.50). On a single disc, moreover, Victor has issued a charming Entr'acte from Johann Strauss's "Thousand and One Nights," beautifully played by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Blech, and coupled, for some strange reason, with the Overture to Reznicek's "Donna Diana" ($1.50). Another strange coupling is the Furiant from Act Two of "The Bartered Bride," and Leo Sowerby's "Irish Washerwoman," played by the Minneapolis Symphony under Ormandy ($1.50). And there is "O del mio dolce ardor" from Gluck's "Paride ed Elena," with beautiful singing by Gigli, and the Flower Song from "Carmen" on the other side ($2).

My discussion of hot jazz a few weeks ago ended with a reference to the performance of "Some Day, Sweetheart" by the Benny Goodman Trio, which will serve as an excellent introduction to another outstanding player, the clarinetist Benny Goodman, and to the brilliant drummer, Krupa. Wilson, Goodman, and Krupa play marvelously together; in some of their recent records there is, unfortunately, little but this brilliance of mere style. "Lady Be Good" (Victor 25333) is better than the others; but the group is at its best accompanying the mediocre singing of Helen Ward in "All My Life" and "Too Good to Be True" (Victor 25324). And as it happens, the finest examples of Wilson's recent work leading a small band are to be heard in performances of these two songs on Brunswick 7640 and 7673. Very good, also, are "If You Were Mine" and "Fenny Meeny Miny Mo" (7554), "Life Begins When You're in Love" and "Rhythm in My Nursery Rhymes" (7612), "These n' That n' Those" (7577), and "Sweet Lorraine" (7520).

Goodman has his own superb band, which because of its size plays arrangements that afford only occasional opportunities for solos. What with the quality of the arrangements, the band, and the solos of Goodman and one or two others, recent performances of "Remember" (Victor 25329), "Between the Devil and the Deep Blue Sea" (25268), "Stardust" (25320), and "Basin Street Blues" (25258) have been about as good as such performances can be. But I prefer the more spontaneous performances he recorded with small bands a few years ago: "Basin Street Blues" (Columbia 2914-D), in which Teagarden's trombone solo and the spirit of the entire performance are superior; "I Gotta Right to Sing the Blues" (2835-D), "Texas Tea Party" (2845-D), and the masterpiece "Moonglow" (2927-D). (Teagarden plays, I believe, in all of these; Teddy Wilson in the last.)

"Whose Medicine?"

[The following letters are selected from many we have received about Mr. Rorty's articles on the medical profession.]

A SERVICE TO MEDICINE

Dear Sirs: I want to congratulate The Nation on the service it has performed through publishing the series of articles on Medical Politics by James Rorty. The time is ripe, and rotten ripe, for exposure of the political methods employed by "organized medicine" to prevent a change which will bring adequate medical care to all the people.

I was greatly impressed by Mr. Rorty's method of securing the facts upon which he based his series as well as by the remarkable manner in which he condensed and clarified a highly involved and very long story of the machinations of the medical politicians and the cabal into which they entered with big business in order to keep health insurance out of the Social Security Act and defeat it temporarily.

Personally I am glad to have had the "Case of John A. Kingsbury" fairly presented to the public in The Nation.

JOHN A. KINGSBURY

New York, August 15

A. M. A. METHODS

Dear Sirs: I have carefully read James Rorty's articles in your issues of June 24, July 4, and July 11. The fourth number has not reached me, and I assume that it has not appeared. As I am just leaving for Europe, it seemed to me best to write to you in regard to the three articles which have appeared, without waiting for the final one.

I think a distinct service has been done by stating the "Case of John A. Kingsbury" and the Milbank Foundation. As far as my own information goes, Mr. Rorty states the case correctly. I have personally felt that it was most unfortunate that the medical profession should use the method of the boycott in order to enforce its views in disagreement with the work of some of the foundations. Even a superficial knowledge of the circumstances which have led to the very rapid improvements in medical education during the last thirty years brings one unavoidably to the conclusion that medical education in this country is under a profound debt to many of the foundations, such as the Carnegie Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Milbank Foundation, and some others. As a matter of fact, the original report on medical education in America made by Mr. Abraham Flexner was under the auspices, if I remember correctly, of the Carnegie Foundation. Today under the aegis of Dr. Fishbein and the American Medical Association these foundations have been violently and I think unfairly criticized for work which they have done and publications which they have put out in an attempt to clarify the situation in regard to medical care in this country. Whether one agrees with them or not, the work which they have done seems to me of basic value and of importance as evidence in the case, which must ultimately be decided not by the medical profession but by the public.

Mr. Rorty's second article discussing the objections of Dr. Fishbein and the American Medical Association to the development of group practice also seems to me a valuable contribution. I have long held the view that group practice is a very desirable development and one which in many respects is quite inevitable in the days to come. I have not felt that the American Medical Association has always dealt with these questions in a judicial manner, and at times it has been clear that it is in fact defending vested interests rather than trying to discuss dispassionately possible alterations in the pattern of medical service.

Mr. Rorty's third article, entitled Whose Medicine? does not seem to me nearly so valuable. He sheds considerable light upon the enormous advertising business carried on by the American Medical Association, but I do not find in his article any very helpful answer to the question which he asks.

HUGH CABOT,

MAKING HASTE SLOWLY

Dear Sirs: Your magazine, and Mr. James Rorty in particular, is to be congratulated upon the splendid manner in which you have brought to the public's attention the great controversy now raging in this country regarding a more adequate spread of medical care.

Mr. Rorty, however, in his articles displays the tendency of most laymen in not understanding the slow movement of medicine in adopting anything that is new. Medicine has always had false paths open to it, and if it had not been for its natural conservatism, it would not occupy at the present time the respected and scientific status that it enjoys. It is perhaps better for the public that medicine should progress slowly and cautiously rather than plunge hysterically into things without mature and deliberate consideration. Measures now considered conservative were deemed most radical fifty years ago.

Mr. Rorty's "prognosis" is undoubtedly true. There is one thing, and one thing only, that can change this "prognosis," and that is for organized medicine immediately to recognize the system of budget payment for medical service conducted by groups of ethical doctors, legitimize this form of practice, and supervise and control it. If it will openly approve and sponsor such movements there is little doubt in my mind that the idea will prove so popular that it will not be necessary to institute state medicine, and that this form of practice can go hand in hand in every doctor's office with the old system of private practice for those individuals who prefer it. A splendid public-school system has not put out of existence the private school.

I can speak as one who has suffered greatly through the intolerance of organized medicine and who has had to go through the fire of persecution; but I anticipated this when I became a medical reformer. For all my unpleasant experiences, I still feel that my profession is intelligent enough eventually to accept progressive principles in the economics of medicine, and have no doubt that we shall all live to see the time when organized medicine will accept such principles to safeguard itself in the future.

The outstanding success of the seven-year-old experiment of the Ross-Loos Medical Group in Los Angeles, which has adopted progressive principles in the economics of practice and conducted this experiment along highly ethical lines, demonstrates what can be done by others if diminished opposition to such a plan shall be forthcoming from organized medicine.

H. CLIFFORD LOOS, M.D.

Los Angeles, Cal., August 6

FOR THE MEDICAL PROFESSION

Dear Sirs: I have reached radicalism by way of The Nation. I believed—nay, swallowed hook, line, and sinker—its exposés of all kinds of rackets, political, industrial, economic, insurance, and so on. For the first time, in James Rorty's articles, I read an "exposé" of conditions of which I happen to know something, from a mere thirty years of practice of medicine.

If all The Nation's criticisms of present conditions are as unfounded, warped, misinterpreted as this series of articles on the medical profession, maybe the Liberty League is right and maybe I should vote for Landon (God forbid). If Rorty knew how unsatisfactory to both patient and doctor inefficient, unscientific, contract practice usually is, he would admit that that is the worst racket of them all. I, and every practitioner, can testify to the fact that many patients who are entitled to free medical treatment from their lodge doctor, their company doctors, and so on, refuse these treatments and go to private physicians and pay the regular fee.

A RADICAL PHYSICIAN

New York, August 16

PROBLEMS OF GROUP PRACTICE

Dear Sirs: Here are a few comments on James Rorty's articles on medical organizations, in recent issues of The Nation:

Article 1: Such terms as "medical hierarchy," "unscrupulous sabotage," "minority clique of reactionary politicians" tend to confuse readers, and conjure up emotions of anger and distrust. I have thought that statements of facts and principles might accomplish more. But I suppose that is a criticism of literary style, and you know your public best.

The story of Mr. Kingsbury's resignation, as Mr. Rorty told it, was very illuminating. I had often wondered about, and on one occasion tried to find out, the inside story of the loss to liberal medical progress which his resignation represented. Also, for my own personal information, what was the exact role of the editor of the Detroit Medical News (page 803) in the events which immediately preceded "the kill"? I have heard certain queer statements locally—something connected with a visit to Detroit of the Public Relations Counsel of the Borden Company immediately preceding the resignation, which made me think that the directors of the Milbank Fund were listening to the loud voices of a very few medical writers in local or county medical bulletins. At the time I did not believe that these opinions represented the rank and file of the profession. . . .

Article 3. The characterization of the American Medical Association as owner of a successful commercial magazine, just as directly responsible to its advertisers as is any newspaper or periodical, was a revelation to me, and I am sure it will be to others.

I think the local, state, and other official societies loom too large in the layman's estimate of medical organization. They are only debating societies. . . . The real medical unit is the hospital, and many of them care very little what goes on in these county societies. Hospitals differ vastly in organization and outlook, but I am sure that the collective heads of hospitals generally—by that I mean the medical men responsible for the professional work in them—hold as a group a much more liberal view of what changes should take place in the practice of medicine than would seem to be indicated by the expressions of opinion of the American Medical Association or a few county societies. Witness the indorsement of group hospital insurance and other schemes by the American College of Surgeons and the American College of Physicians.

Article 4: . . . The problem of the development of group medicine on a scale adequately to serve large numbers of our population is not simple. After considerable interest in the matter, I came to the conclusion that the Committee on Medical Costs did not have any clearly worked-out program for its development, which is a vastly different thing from the announcement of its benefits. Most successful private group clinics are the outgrowth of large individual practices, usually dominated by one or a few men, who have volume of business enough and enough talent for organization to grow out of the "one-man medical-business" stage. . . . The Mayo clinic and the Crile clinic are so outstanding that for the average run of doctors they are not illustrative cases. The trouble as I see it is this: Unless there is a certain number of patients in a group the various diversifications and specializations of medical practice cannot be evolved or maintained, especially in larger cities. The banding together of a small group will not increase their combined practices sufficiently to offer very much better service than the public can get from their colleagues. On the contrary, the professional ostracism which this banding together produces is apt to militate against the doctors in the group in that their medical contacts, sources of referred patients, and so on cease. For these reasons I think most doctors under present conditions will prefer to develop their specialties in free hospitals and dispensaries and try to "go it alone" in their private practices. . . .

I personally do not think that group medicine serving large numbers of persons of moderate means will get very far without large subsidies, either from universities, wealthy individuals, or the state. . . . The immediate problem is not to demonstrate the worth of this form of medical practice but to persuade a sufficient number of people—lay and medical—that it is worth while, to make them demand such service on the one hand and supply it on the other. Short of socialized medicine, I think a few demonstrations of successful group clinics catering to persons of moderate means would be highly educational.

Now as regards constructive suggestions: . . . Further exposition of the personal viewpoints of the officials of the American Medical Association would, I think, be in order, including the Bureau of Medical Economics. How sound are its investigations and certain of its findings which have contradicted the opinions of recognized experts working in the privately endowed foundations? The movement for group organization in medicine seems to have slid back, and payment schemes for hospital care to have taken its place. To me, the latter is a mild reform, but I suppose an entering wedge. Why doesn't someone with the necessary money sponsor a few more experiments in the field? I mean actual demonstrations, not literature.

THE ONLY REMEDY

Dear Sirs: I read Mr. Rorty's articles with a great deal of interest. I don't agree with all of his deductions. Mr. Kingsbury was in charge of the activities of the Milbank Foundation for a number of years. During that time he, in the name of the foundation, did pretty much as he pleased. His attitude toward the medical profession was roughshod and impatient. The directors of the foundation did nothing to stop him. When he came back from Russia, a convert to communism, that was more than the directors of the Milbank Foundation, who are in Wall Street, could swallow. So they used the pretext that he was antagonizing the medical profession and fired him. Can you see a doctor telling his patients not to buy Borden's milk because Mr. Milbank, the president of the Borden Company, is also president of the Milbank Foundation, and the foundation is sponsoring the view of its executive director, who believes that all the people are entitled to adequate medical care and should get it just as they get schooling or police and fire protection, without paying for it directly?

Does Mr. Rorty really believe that the American Medical Association is opposed to socialized medicine because Dr. Fishbein wants to hold his job as editor of the Journal and is afraid that if we have socialized medicine the drug houses will not advertise any more in the Journal and Dr. Fishbein will lose his job? The officials of the county, state, and national medical societies oppose socialized medicine because it is so different, so untried, and they are naturally conservative. Mr. Rorty can hardly accuse the doctors of withholding medical service from people who need it just because they haven't any money. In this city more than half of the sick are being treated in the free clinics by doctors who aren't getting paid, and I don't know how many more are being cared for without charge in the private offices of doctors. This, too, in the face of the fact that the average income of the doctors has dropped more than 50 per cent and they are having a hard time making a living.

More than 80 per cent of the people do not and never have earned enough to get adequate medical care when they need it. The various plans being suggested to provide medical service without imposing too serious a financial burden are proof of an almost hysterical search for a remedy. But lodge practice, contract practice, employers' or employees' aid associations, group practice, voluntary or involuntary insurance, and exhortations to budget incomes do not fill the bill. Competition in medicine should not be for the greatest financial return but for skill and ability. This can best be seen in the wards of the public hospitals, where the members of the visiting staff use all facilities and all their skill for their patients. These patients are poor, have no social standing, and do not choose their own doctors, but they get the best the doctor can give them.

That is why I believe that socialized medicine is the only remedy.

THE COOPERATIVE METHOD

Dear Sirs: The conditions which produce ten million unemployed and place twenty million on relief are precisely the conditions which place the majority of people in the United States outside the zone of adequate medical service. The fact that 38 per cent of our population receive no medical care at all when incapacitated by disease is a small part of the story. The important fact is that only a few of the rich—namely, the intelligent rich—enjoy the full advantages of the art and science of medicine. . . .

State socialization of medicine is coming as a result of indifference on the part of the people most concerned. It brings medical service to those not served without it. There is little tendency on the part of any government to relinquish it, once it is entered upon. Its advantages, in the absence of anything better, are obvious. It possesses the disadvantages inherent in the expansion of state functions and in the impersonal mechanization which characterizes governmental services.

The cooperative method of health protection represents non-political service in the interest of patients. In Denmark it is the prevalent method of medical practice. Yugoslavia, Sweden, and many other countries are steadily developing this method. In Holland there are consumers' cooperative health societies with as many as 122,000 members in a city of less than four times that population. Cooperative consumers' societies and cooperative banking unions are also employing physicians on salaries to care for their members. In the United States there are enlightened physicians who are advising their patients to organize themselves into cooperative health societies and employ a physician on a salary basis. . . .

This cooperative method offers possibilities of preserving the fast-disappearing family physician, who is being destroyed by the same forces which are destroying the family, forces which official medicine in the United States is so zealous in continuing in operation. The cooperative method, which preserves this useful person in something of a pastoral role, which addresses his attention to the prevention of disease, which guarantees his income and gives him a position of self-respect in the field of science, should have much to recommend it to the public and to the doctors.

CAMPAIGNS IN AMERICA ARE APT TO BE pretty much one-man affairs. This has never been better illustrated than in the invective and idolatry that have been woven about Mr. Roosevelt. The cause may be somewhere in the American intellectual climate or it may be in the deeper human need for the dramatic symbol. But one consequence of it will go hard for the progressive forces in America. Paul Ward's analysis elsewhere in this issue of the chances for the progressive bloc in the next Congress makes dark reading. When Congress assembles it will be pretty much of a reunion on Capitol Hill. The old faces will be there, and not many of them are turned toward the American future. In the fight for Mr. Roosevelt's reelection, Labor's Non-Partisan League and its allies have tended to forget about Congress. It is natural to concentrate all one's strength on the main objective, and it is natural also that as many conservative Democrats as possible should be pushed to the fore to take the sting out of the President's imputed radicalism. But it is none the less tragic. For Mr. Roosevelt, when reelected, is not likely to go toward the left but toward the right. Only a strong and militant progressive bloc in Congress could function effectively as an opposition and exert pressure on him to fulfil some of the implications of the New Deal. We appeal to American progressives not to forget Congress.

LABOR DAY THIS YEAR WAS A CHALLENGE TO both Presidential candidates to say something about labor. Both said it with dignity and good-will. It was good politics for Mr. Landon to deplore the split in the A. F. of L. and equally good politics for Mr. Roosevelt not to mention it. Beyond politics, we found Mr. Roosevelt's statements more satisfying. Mr. Landon reiterated his belief that collective bargaining must be free of "government coercion"—what Mr. Knox, in his more bitter speech, called the government's "iron hand." But Mr. Landon and his running-mate should know that in the present state of bargaining power between the two groups the lack of government protection for labor in its struggle for a living wage could lead only to company unionism or worse. Mr. Roosevelt made it clear that "practical protection" for the worker was a function of government, and that the achievement of economic freedom for all was tied inseparably to the fate of the worker. He showed the same realism in his comments on the drought—the com-

THE PRESIDENT'S REPORT ON THE STATE OF the nation's finances seems to have taken the wind out of Governor Landon's vague strictures on governmental waste. Owing to a substantial rise in federal revenues, it now appears that the deficit for the coming year will be only $1,500,000,000—or a little more than half the amount of the last two years of the Hoover Administration. Of this amount, approximately $560,000,000 can be attributed to the soldiers' bonus, which was twice vetoed by the President, leaving a net deficit of somewhat less than a billion dollars on the regular and emergency budgets. Considering the fact that relief needs have diminished but slightly and that many of the public-works projects are just beginning to be costly, the President's budget undoubtedly errs on the side of economy rather than extravagance. If Landon were elected, he might, like Roosevelt, make a few gestures toward economy in the early days of his Administration, but there is no reason to believe that he would come nearer to balancing the budget than Roosevelt will. Landon has asserted that he recognizes the need for "being generous in the spending of money for relief and emergency purposes," and as a first-term President he would find it bad politics to make substantial cuts in any direction. With Hearst behind him, he would be most unlikely to cancel the present Administration's unjustifiable increase in military and naval expenditures. Having lost economy as a talking point, Mr. Landon might as well carry out Mr. Hearst's wishes and conduct a silent campaign.

SPAIN'S NEW COALITION CABINET UNDER the leadership of Francisco Largo Caballero appears to have instilled new life into the government's military forces. Less than three days after its appointment, the Madrid people's militia is reported to have inflicted a decisive defeat on the important rebel column advancing on Toledo and to have reentered Talavera de la Reina. The government also appears to have scored an important victory near Malaga, and to be pressing hard on both Oviedo and Huesca. Although these successes have been partially offset by the loss of Irun and Fuenterrabia, the fact that the government has definitely taken the offensive in the south is indicative of a greatly improved situation. The appointment of General José Asensio as commander-in-chief of all the loyalist forces in the Madrid area makes possible a coordination in the government's efforts which was hitherto lacking. Caballero's reputation as leader of the extreme left wing of the Socialist Party is being seized upon in many quarters as final proof of the "red" character of the Popular Front regime. Actually, however, Caballero appears to have been chosen not because of his left opinions, but because he seemed to be capable of offering the most vigorous leadership at the present moment.

In addition to representatives of the various Marxist parties, which are undoubtedly the most powerful in Spain at this time, the new Cabinet contains proportionate representation from all the more moderate groups in the Popular Front, including the Left Republican, Republican Union, Catalanian Esquerra, and Basque Nationalist parties. As such it seems admirably devised for rescuing the country from the depths to which it has been plunged by indecisive, incompetent republican leadership.

BLUM'S ATTEMPT TO MAINTAIN NEUTRALITY toward Spain's life-and-death struggle with fascism has already nullified the auspicious beginning which his government enjoyed as a result of his successful mediation in the strike crisis. The entire working-class section of the Front Populaire—Communists, left Socialists, and trade unions—are angered by what they consider a betrayal of France's duty to extend aid to the Spanish government as permitted by international law. On September 7 the metal workers of Paris, 200,000 strong, carried out a one-hour strike as warning to the government of more vigorous protests to come. At recent large mass-meetings Blum, formerly exceedingly popular, has been greeted with a concert of cries urging aid for Spain. As sponsor of the neutrality proposal, Blum finds himself in an extremely difficult position as it becomes evident that both Germany and Italy are continuing their illegal aid to the rebels. Repudiation of neutrality not only would involve serious loss of face for the Premier personally but might conceivably precipitate, as he insists, a general European war. A rigorous enforcement of neutrality, on the other hand, might lead to a rebel victory in Spain that would plunge France into a civil conflict in which all the odds favored the fascists. Although either step involves great danger, a strong leader would probably run the lesser risk of calling Hitler's and Mussolini's bluff.

AT NURNBERG HALF A MILLION GERMANS are gathered for the Nazis' fourth annual Party Congress. The congress opens as we go to press, but we may confidently predict that the dominant note throughout will be a call to arms against communism. And not only in the figurative sense. The half-million who have been herded there will listen to speeches rousing them to a pitch of chauvinism and hatred of "bolshevism." They will also watch the army stage a sham battle in which no true Nazi will have any doubt as to the identity of the enemy. As every stroke of recent German foreign policy has indicated, the enemy is the Soviet Union. It is not expected that there will be any new Jew-baiting decrees such as were the sensation of last year's congress. Laws announced in loud tones and written down in black and white bring forth unfavorable reaction from abroad. The party has learned how to achieve the same results with less publicity. Since the end of the Olympics it has steadily and ruthlessly been making every profession Judenfrei; Jewish merchants and industrialists, great and small, are being forced to sell their businesses, Jewish employees are being discharged. The campaign against the Jews has now entered its worst stage—their noiseless annihilation through slow and persistent economic pressure.

ALTHOUGH THE CRUSHING DEFEAT OF THE Liberal Party in Quebec does not portend a national repudiation of the Liberals, it has set the political pendulum swinging wildly. Quebec Liberalism has been the mainstay of federal Liberalism in that it has regularly provided 50 per cent or more of Liberal representation at Ottawa. But while Liberalism in the other provinces has more or less lived up to its name, in Quebec, under the domination of the Catholic church, it has been of another vintage altogether. For forty years, under the unbroken sway of the Liberals, Quebec was the most backward province in Canada, the masses living in almost unbelievable degradation. Their discontent, repressed so effectively by the Catholic church, has finally burst forth and swept in the Union National Party headed by Maurice Duplessis. United only by a common opposition to the former Taschereau regime, L'Union Nationale is a hodgepodge of everything from the ordinary garden variety of liberal to the outright fascist. Its program is dominated by French Canadian nationalism and for the rest is based on the usual paraphernalia of middle-class demagoguery. For Canada as a whole the significance of the Quebec elections—and of those in Manitoba, which had similar results—lies in the weakening of the Liberals. Whether it will be the Conservatives, or third-party groups like the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation or Social Credit, who will gain most from the Liberal loss, it is still difficult to say.

THE LARGE MILK DISTRIBUTORS HAVE FOR some time been runners-up with the power companies in the great Consumer Unpopularity Contest. The present struggle in New York City has resulted in a rise of one cent a quart to consumers and an increase of about twenty-five cents per hundredweight of fluid milk in the rates paid to producers. The independent farmers, under the leadership of Felix and Starfley Piseck, are demanding a basic price of $3 a hundredweight; so far the large distributors have granted a price of $2.87. But the farmer, after deducting freight differentials and the loss on "surplus" milk, is receiving considerably less than $2 a hundredweight. There are forty-seven quarts of fluid milk to a hundred pounds; a one-cent increase to the consumer, therefore, means additional revenue of forty-seven cents a hundredweight to the Borden and Sheffield companies. This would seem to be ample not only to protect the high salaries of milk-company officials and the poor, long-suffering stockholders, but to grant more than the highest price so far demanded by the farmers. Undoubtedly the farmers are underpaid for the milk they sell; but this does not mean that the consumer should have to pay more. The percentage which is taken up by middlemen operating between farmer and consumer has always been a public scandal. Milk as a public utility, sold by the city, is the answer.

The cooperation of the New York Department of Health in inducing several thousand stores to continue to sell milk at the old price of eleven cents a quart points the way.

THE REPUBLICANS HAVE BEEN AWAITING the labor of the Literary Digest mountain with evidently bated breath. But the mouse that the straw vote has brought forth must give them small comfort. Twenty-four thousand votes from four states have been counted. The states are Maine, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. But no large cities were included. The results mean, therefore, that so far 1,800 Maine farmers who voted in the Digest poll are for Landon; rural New Jersey and Pennsylvania seem to be going for Landon, too; and—wonder of wonders—so does upstate New York! All this we might have known without the poll. The Digest deplores the fact that the large groups of unemployed workers who are now on New Deal relief, and who may be expected to vote themselves more of the same, cannot be reached by the straw vote. They would make Mr. Roosevelt's chances look better. But from the returns on the Digest poll so far there is small reason to believe that his chances are not still pretty good.

MAGISTRATE CHARLES SOLOMON OF Brooklyn, New York, has introduced a pleasing reform in the matter of bail for pickets. Pickets are often arrested too late for their cases to be tried in day court; magistrates sitting in night court have often set bail as high as $500. Frequently the defendant does not appear at night court; the bail is a routine procedure insuring the appearance of the defendant the next day. But as a result unions often find themselves hard pressed to raise the necessary funds, and high bail has on occasion been instrumental in breaking strikes. Magistrate Solomon, acting on the belief that pickets are not criminals and that they never fail to appear at the proper time, has lately begun to impose bail of $1. Fourteen pickets whose cases were brought before him a few days ago were released on bail of $14. The best part of this sensible and fair-minded procedure is that other magistrates are beginning to imitate it. Although Magistrate Solomon's bargain price has not been met, bail for the horrendous offense of being a member of a union picket line is coming down.

TELEVISION HAS HOLLYWOOD WORRIED. While everyone else is worrying about war in Europe or the chances of the Giants, the film leaders fear that the threatened advent of television may render the cinema obsolete—as obsolete as today rendered yesterday. But they are fretting needlessly. Television, with all its knobs and gadgets, can never be half as funny as the movies—even without counting King Kong. Can television ever hope to give us a phrase like "Second Smash Week"? Or create a sound like the roar of the MGM trademark? Or produce a new blonde that can compete with Platinum?

Or the trailers—not tin-can tourist trailers, but Coming-Next-Week trailers—those breathless previews without which neighborhood (ninth run) movie houses wouldn't be able to stretch a two-hour show into a three-and-a-half-hour orgy? And then we have the movies to thank for the Cycle, the Close-up, and Fan magazines. For the Child Star, Will Hays, Frankenstein, and Westerns. For Double Feature, Bank Nite, and Screeno. For Super-Epics and Extra-Colossal-Spectacles. No, Hollywood need not worry, and even if television comes to the home, it will never keep us from those cathedrals of the cinema where sparkle the magic letters: "Also M. Mouse."

A Reply to Dorothy Thompson

IT IS only natural that the Republican Party should seek to make a campaign issue out of the 1936 corporation-tax bill. Here is a measure which in principle and effect is undoubtedly offensive not only to "economic royalists" but to all who believe in the sacredness of the profit motive. It is intolerable because it plugs up the last great leak in the income-tax law and makes fairly certain that in the future the income-tax burden will be closely proportionate to ability to pay.

Since the average voter is not very likely to get excited over the fact that wealthy stockholders will no longer be able to dodge their taxes, Republican tactics have been to becloud the issue as much as possible. With a fine display of logic Governor Landon described the tax law as "cock-eyed," and declared that it tied "a millstone around the neck of the little fellow." Other Republican spokesmen have inveighed against the bill, but have been very careful to avoid particulars. Ridicule and invective may not be sound in formal debates, but they are excellent weapons in political controversy.

Unfortunately for the Republicans, an outsider with more courage than discretion has inadvertently let the cat out of the bag. Writing in the staunchly Republican New York Herald Tribune of September 3, Dorothy Thompson attempts to show by specific illustration how iniquitous the tax bill actually is. The illustration is well chosen and on the surface carries a certain degree of plausibility. She tells of "a small but highly efficient industry in New England," situated in a small town, which pulled through the depression with a debt of $250,000. During the past year the company has prospered again, and promises to show a net profit of approximately $500,000. Then begins the sad story of what will become of these profits. To quote Miss Thompson:

One hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars must be repaid to the bank. Working capital for increased output and increased employment during the current year will take another $175,000. The state income tax will take $10,000 and the federal income tax will take $73,500. That will leave $106,500 presumably for the payment of dividends and for beginning a new reserve. But the undistributed-profits tax steps in here. It adds just $94,500 to the tax load. For repaying its debts the industry will be taxed 20½ per cent of what it pays; for increasing pay rolls and employment it will be further taxed 20½ per cent on what it diverts to this purpose. And when it is all added together a company which showed a profit of $500,000 will have left to distribute in dividends and to build up reserves against a rainy day precisely $12,000.

In order to avoid controversy on non-essentials we will assume Miss Thompson's figures to be correct—though according to our computation the excess-profits tax would be nearer $87,000. Taken as it stands, her illustration is very useful in portraying the principles behind the bill. The company may be a genuine one, but it has apparently been selected because it seems to show that the profits have been entirely eaten up by the wicked undistributed-profits tax. Actually, very few corporations are likely to divert 96 per cent of their profits, after deducting taxes, to new investment and debt retirement. The company, let it be noted, is not exactly a "small" business. A concern which earns $500,000 in a single season would be valued, under prevailing rates of interest, at ten to twelve million dollars—not a great corporation but none the less far removed from the struggling shopkeeper class.

It will be observed that the company has approximately $417,000 in profits available for dividends after payment of federal and state income taxes. If the directors choose to distribute this whole amount in dividends, it will have no further taxes to pay, but each of the stockholders will have to pay full income tax on the receipts. If 10 per cent—or approximately $42,000—is withheld from the stockholders, the corporation will have a tax of only $2,940, leaving $39,000 for debt retirement or surplus in addition to dividends of $375,000. But instead the company chooses to make a new investment of $175,000—which like all investments provides "increased output and increased employment." In other words, the stockholders are choosing to invest their profits before they are distributed to them in the hope of thereby earning larger profits next year. This, of course, is perfectly legitimate. But under the old law this was a very neat way of investing one's profits without the formality of paying an income tax on the money reinvested. Since an overwhelming proportion of the corporation stock in the country is held by extremely wealthy men, it meant that a large part of the true income of this class was being reinvested before the progressive income tax was collected. Miss Thompson is very moderate in her selection; she could have chosen a company that devoted all its earnings to capital investment, thus eliminating dividends altogether.

Much the same can be said of the $135,000 paid back to the bank. There was no compulsion to make a payment of this size. A corporation earning $500,000 a year would have no difficulty in extending all or part of a note for $250,000 as long as it liked. But the stockholders naturally desire to clear off this liability as soon as possible, and they vote to use part of their earnings to retire the debt. If they chose to pay it back in small instalments they could avoid the tax, but they weigh the alternatives and decide that rather than receive the money, pay an income tax on the dividends, and reinvest the returns, it would be cheaper to pay off the debt. That is a simple matter of business judgment. If the shareholders choose to use the bulk of their earnings in these two ways, they must set aside approximately $80,000 to compensate for the income tax that would otherwise be paid. This leaves only about $26,000, and apparently the stockholders have decided that cash in the corporation till is more desirable than in their own pockets; hence the additional tax. That again is their business.

But how is the additional capital "for increased output and increased employment" to be obtained? Will not the tax tend, as Miss Thompson declares, "to freeze all industry in the present pattern"? The answer, of course, is that where there is genuine opportunity for expansion, industry will get the capital as it always has—by issuing new stock, by floating bonds, by taking advantage of the present low interest rates and borrowing from the banks, or, as in the present instance, by appropriation out of surplus after payment of tax. Capital has never been so plentiful or so cheap. The tax bill imposes no restriction on industrial expansion. It merely requires that the owner of the capital pay his income tax before the money is invested. And it serves as a sorely needed protection against the accumulation of unused surpluses which was a primary cause of the depression.

In a town of 1,000 people, 800 tried to get in to see "The Dictator," the first play ever given in that community.

A majority of the adults . . . report that they had seen no living actors for many years.

These three Federal Theater units, a dramatic company and two vaudeville groups, have played to 18,000 school children in Omaha and its suburbs. Ninety per cent, according to the statistical studies made by the director, had never seen a play, and could not believe that these actors were really not moving pictures. They clapped until the actors had to give eight curtain calls, and even then the children refused to go home.

WE HAVE been quoting from an article by Hallie Flanagan, national director of the Federal Theater Project, published in the project's monthly bulletin—a thirty-page mimeographed sheet in which the theater in all its phases comes alive with such force as to set first-night dilettantes and dowagers shaking in their swallowtails and ermine capes. Here is a swaggering, pushing, vigorous theater, lineal descendant of the early American troupers, giving its performances in public parks, cavorting in circuses ("The only reason we don't have elephants in this show is that none were on relief"), reviving vaudeville, setting marionettes dancing in a score of cities; and yet tackling with the same verve and with great success the intellectual niceties of T. S. Eliot, or combining Macbeth with Harlem and creating something new and satisfying.

The Federal Theater Project was designed to succor starving actors. Like the Federal Art Project it has loosed spring torrents of theatrical interest and talent, which are already seeping into Broadway.

It is impossible, in a brief account, to do more than touch upon the numerous activities of the project. Suffice to say that some 10,000 professional theatrical people are taking part in it all over the United States. Its productions are playing to large audiences, which are described as distinctly new audiences as far as the theater is concerned—admissions, when they are not free, range from 25 to 55 cents. Experimentation is going on in every branch of the theater from play-writing to stage lighting. The flesh-and-blood actor is being restored to the American scene. Vaudeville is being revived—certainly the lack of any striking new comic talent in the past few years is due in part to the wiping out of vaudeville, in which our best comedians have been trained. In its work with and for children the Federal Theater Project has broken new ground and is already achieving important results.

The Federal Theater would be worth while—and like the art project its budget is small in proportion to its effect—if only for the service it is undoubtedly performing in setting up active participation and local interest in the theater to counteract the deadly passivity that reigns in the plush seats of air-cooled movie palaces. In this connection a few notes on censorship are worth making. Early in the history of the project the issue rose very sharply in New York—as might have been expected. Lately it has risen in another guise. It is announced that on October 20 the Federal Theater will offer throughout the country twenty simultaneous productions of Sinclair Lewis's "It Can't Happen Here," which Hollywood refused to sponsor. For our final note on censorship we are indebted to the research bureau of the project, which is busy cataloguing plays in the attempt to supply, by return mail if possible, the demands of actors' groups for exactly the right production for the given locale. The bureau has unearthed what appears to be the first comic opera written in America. Its name is "The Disappointment." It was printed in 1767, but it will be produced for the first time probably this winter. "The Disappointment," it seems, was never produced in its time because it satirized some prominent Philadelphians and fell foul of the censor.

The Vatican's New Crusade

THERE could be no clearer declaration of the policy of the Catholic church toward its "children" and their relation with the temporal world than was contained in the comment of the Osservatore Romano, the Vatican's newspaper, on the activities of Father Coughlin. In the measured periods of the statement could be heard the voice of Mother Church speaking across many generations and many governments, sure in the knowledge that humanity would stop in its tracks and listen. But if its tone was pitched above the battle, its content got down to cases with all the temporal energy of a ward politician.

Father Coughlin's conduct, it intoned, was improper because "an orator who inveighs against persons who represent the supreme social authorities, with the evident danger of shaking the respect that the people owe to those authorities, sins against the elementary proprieties." "The Holy See wants respect for all liberties but for all proprieties as well." Lest the world fail to understand, the Holy See, like any other regime, has unofficial spokesmen who fill in the lines. Thus it was "stressed" "in high Vatican circles" that while the Vatican did not approve Father Coughlin's attack on Mr. Roosevelt, it does approve the work he has done in interpreting the Pope's encyclicals on economic matters. The Vatican, "it was pointed out," does not want to see the respect of the masses for their authorities shaken by such an attack as that on Roosevelt. What happens when the masses lose respect for their authorities, the prelates said, now may be seen in Spain.

To the extent that the church is mighty it need not be consistent. It is necessarily on the side of the angels. But there is an inconsistency in its latest statement as big as the shell holes in Spanish churches, and its name is Soviet Russia. There the disrespectful masses went so far as to set up new social authorities against whom the church itself is now waging bitter warfare. Mother Church is obviously worried. The most recent pronouncements from the Vatican have been marked by the desperation hitherto reserved for temporal governments fearful of being overthrown. The Catholic chant against communism is rising stronger and stronger. It is no accident that the 10,000 alumni of Notre Dame University have dedicated themselves to an anti-red crusade; there is no doubt that Father Coughlin's perorations will center more and more on the Communist menace—they have been tending in that direction for some time, and Bishop Gallagher stands squarely behind him on this issue. There is already evidence that the church will not hesitate, when the moment comes, to align itself with that other great red-baiting force, German fascism. "Another set of laws," writes Frederick T. Birchall from Berlin, "previously expected, depriving Catholic orders of the right to teach are understood to have been stricken from the program as the result of the recent pastoral letter in which the Catholic church indorsed Hitler's stand against bolshevism." These are important and ominous developments.

Under the great concept of the right to liberty of conscience the Catholic church has built up in this country a tremendous vested interest in money and influence. To judge by recent announcements, it is now preparing to turn that power, as it has never done before, to the task of combating "communism." We have had more than enough proof that communism in this context means liberty of conscience, nothing more nor less. The alumni of Notre Dame would be well advised to stick to football as an outlet for their predatory instincts. As for Father Coughlin, he has a well-earned reputation as a sower of wind; he has not yet displayed the lineaments of a reaper of whirlwinds.

"The Truth Shall Make You Free"

READING the news stories of the discussions at the Harvard Tercentenary Conference, the layman knows that about mathematics he knows nothing, about the stars he knows somewhat less, and the intricacies of the higher logic are a closed book to him. Nevertheless, the spectacle of the ivory tower bending to examine the creature man in all his aspects cannot fail to be an impressive one. The scholars who are meeting at Cambridge are chosen from the best of the world; the internationalism of thought was never more convincingly demonstrated. England and the United States have sent their representatives, as have France, Italy, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, Australia, Germany, Sweden, Japan, Norway, Brazil, and many other countries. Unlike the regrettable demonstration at Heidelberg, politics here play no part. And contemporaneity is relegated to its proper place in the stream of history.

The keynote of the meetings was the speech of the medievalist, Professor Etienne Gilson of Paris. "There is a spiritual order of realities," he said, "whose absolute right it is to judge even the state, and eventually to free us from its oppression." The medieval world was unified not only by a common faith in God but by a belief in "the universal character of rational truth itself." For a thousand years the ideas of Aristotle as expounded by Thomas Aquinas were the yardstick by which man measured the worth and the meaning of his actions. When the authority of the church was challenged and largely fell, this unity dissolved into a group of nationalisms, of local philosophies, of conflicting ideas of statehood and behavior. In the twentieth century we shall probably not go back whole-souled to Aristotle; we shall have to invent our own rational and universal truth. But when we find it, the problems of fascism and communism, of economic crash and boom, will fall into a pattern in which also will appear the mosaics of individual obligation and allegiance.

This is rendering Professor Gilson rather freely, but the gist of his remarks are here. And the challenge to scholarship which he offers is clear enough. In the last few centuries our universities have shown themselves unwilling or unable to think except as separate entities, largely unrelated to the immediate needs of men in general; the physical scientists provide in some respects an honorable exception, but even science is threatened by dogmas of race and polity. What we must do in the reordering of a chaotic world is not only act but think and learn. We have had men of action who allowed their procedure to be governed solely by the needs of the moment: the largest navy in the world has been one result; a ruinous tariff has been another. We have had philosophic systems which nobody understood but their author. The universal truth which Professor Gilson hopes may spell salvation must be altogether different. It remains to be seen how much our universities can contribute to its formulation.

BY PAUL W. WARD

Senator Couzens

Still the Same Congress

Washington, September 7

THE political monotheism that sweeps over this country in Presidential election years is having in 1936 its usual effect of killing off all chances for the development in Congress of the strong, cohesive, and disciplined progressive bloc which the nation always has needed and now needs more desperately than ever. The concentration of the electorate's attention on the race between the two major-party nominees, a concentration fostered and kept fixed by straw votes and party propaganda, again is preparing the way for the return to Congress of essentially all the shysters, demagogues, free-seed peddlers, chauvinists, Jew-haters, red-baiters, and lobby leeches who have dominated past Congresses, Republican or Democratic. It is easy for this gang to slip back into their places at the legislative machine's controls, with the voters lost in frenzied adoration of one or the other of the year's man-made gods, Roosevelt and Landon.

For every Blanton or Huddleston defeated and every Maverick or Marcantonio reelected there will be a dozen Copelands, Baileys, McFarlanes, Kramers, Robinsons, Bilbos, Tinkhams, Treadways, Robsions, Mays, Shorts, Hastings, Hales, Fishes, and O'Connors returned to Congress on November 3. And the proportions will not vary greatly from those of late years. If there is any material change at all, it is likely to be in the direction of a reduction in the progressive bloc and a more than commensurate increase in the conservative to reactionary ranks in Congress. That is bound to happen in the unlikely event that the Hearst-Landon-Liberty League crowd succeed in ousting the Roosevelt Administration. It is only slightly less likely in the event of another Roosevelt landslide, for the great majority of the men who are coming back to Congress under the Democratic banner have no taste for the New Deal's avowed objectives. That is especially true of the Democrats who are certain of reelection and who, because of their seniority in the House and Senate, will monopolize the important committee posts. I refer, of course, to Democrats from the "solid South." Does anybody think that Robinson, Harrison, and Glass, for example, are New Dealers at heart and—to use the simplest definition of what is supposed to be the underlying principle of the New Deal—can be depended on to champion human rights over property rights? And is anybody so misguided as to think that the string of victories piled up by "New Dealers" in the primaries are veritable New Deal victories? They indicate nothing more than that the majority of the voters are heartily in favor of the Roosevelt who was presented to them on Inauguration Day in 1933 and who remains the same Roosevelt to them today because his enemies—the du Ponts, Sloans, Hearsts, McCormicks, and the rest—keep telling them that he has not changed.

Imagine, in view of that situation, how delightful it is for machine candidates for Congress to be able to avoid concrete issues and, taking their stand on the Roosevelt myth, to run for reelection on the plea that votes for them are not votes for them personally but votes in defiance of Roosevelt's enemies and in vindication of the President. Their resultant triumphs at the polls do not change their private allegiances any more than victory on a platform of mother-love would convert them all into impeccable sons and husbands. Furthermore, many of them are having what little fearful respect they feel for the electorate's New Deal inclinations dimmed by the inevitable campaign-year upsurge of opposition to those in power; and seeking to compromise with that opposition, they are being driven into positions more conservative than they held in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses.

Nor can it be said that Roosevelt or any of his most enthusiastic allies have made any substantial effort toward ameliorating the Congressional trend which promises to keep the progressive bloc at best in statu quo. Labor's Non-Partisan League, which might have been expected to take effective steps in that direction, has thoroughly shirked the responsibility, fearing that any intrusion into the Congressional field would split the labor vote and detract from Roosevelt's support. To that extent it has reduced itself for the time being at least to about as hopeful an incubator for a genuine third-party movement as the Business Men's League for Roosevelt which is in process of parturition with—reputedly—Walter Chrysler as one of its leaders. The other third-party nuclei friendly to Roose-vult are on a comparable plane. The La Follette group is running around in circles, with the La Follettes themselves dodging any firm alliances with definitely leftist groups for fear of antagonizing their liberal-conservative support. Unanimity is achieved in this circle only on the point of supporting Roosevelt. In Minnesota the Democrats have put up weak candidates in exchange for the Farmer-Labor Party's support of Roosevelt and then have seen that support disorganized by the death of Governor Olson and the resultant scramble among his political heirs and assigns for new positions on the party ladder. As a result of that scramble two Farmer-Labor seats in Congress have been placed in jeopardy, with Ernest Lundeen, who has never been able to carry the state but was certain of carrying his Congressional district, being removed from his race for reelection to the House and placed in nomination for the Senate seat which Olson had had cinched. One heartening feature may be noted in passing, and that is that two third-party movements—the Townsendite and Coughlinite, or Lemke Union Party, movements—plainly are making no headway.

As for Roosevelt himself, his aid to the progressives has been negligible. To be sure, he has used his best efforts to persuade Senator Norris to run again in Nebraska, and he sought to make Couzens take the Democratic nomination for the Senate in Michigan, but neither gesture was made at any cost to himself; in fact, both were directed as much toward insuring his own political fortunes in the states at issue as toward keeping Norris and Couzens in the Senate. It is true, too, that he made some slight gesture toward aiding Maverick in his campaign for renomination in Texas. But consider the other side of the picture. In Maine his man Farley literally begged an anti-New Deal Democrat, Brann, to run for the Senate merely to increase the chance of a Democratic Party victory in Maine September 14, with a resulting psychological enhancement of Roosevelt's chances throughout the country in November. For similar reasons he did not lift a finger to bring about the defeat of Glass, who is coming back to the Senate and, now that his senior, Senator Fletcher of Florida, is dead, will take over the chairmanship of the Banking and Currency Committee. Nor did Roosevelt so much as move to throw his weight against the renomination of Senator Bailey in North Carolina, although Bailey has been well described by the leading group of Roosevelt supporters in that state, the Liberal Democrats of North Carolina, in a statement by their president, Dr. W. O. House. To emphasize the "Democratic above all else" character of his group, Dr. House asserted that its members "will even vote for the arrogant, insulting anti-New Deal Josiah William Bailey for Senator because he is on the Democratic ticket." And Roosevelt's chief ally in Massachusetts is the indefensible Governor Curley, a candidate for the Senate.

If you think I exaggerate the atmosphere of obscurity and neglect in which the Congressional campaign is proceeding, let me invite you to try to inform yourself upon its progress. Consult the files of your local newspapers and try to learn the primary results in the various states, and if you doubt the comprehensive qualities of your favorite newspaper, go to your public library and consult the files of all the papers there. You will find not only that they fail to cover in anything approaching realistic fashion the Congressional campaigns and primary results throughout the country; you also will find that they fail to cover them in their own states. You will be hard pressed to discover complete figures on the party vote in each district, and you will be even more hard pressed to discover what sort of men are winning the nominations, why they won, and what forces they beat. When you have made that discovery, come down to Washington and consult the Democratic and Republican Congressional campaign committees and the Washington correspondents who are supposed to be profoundly informed as to the play of political forces and personalities in the states where are published the papers they represent here. These journalists in the great majority of cases will tell you they know next to nothing about the Congressional contests in their states because their papers pay little or no attention to them, and the party committees will be, if anything, less informative.

It is only by the most laborious ferreting that you will be able to piece together the Congressional picture for 1936, and even then you will have to depend on cold statistics. Those figures, however, are sufficient in themselves to show how small is the prospect of any material change in the complexion of either house. They are based on the primaries which have been held to date in thirty-six states. Primaries or nominating conventions have not yet been completed in Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington. In the thirty-six states where the party tickets are complete, nominations for 315 House and 28 Senate seats were involved, and in all but 56, or 16.4 per cent, of the 343 cases those who held the seats at the Seventy-fourth Congress won renomination. It would be pleasant to report that those fifty-six changes were effected by the voters, but ten of them were due to deaths and twenty-seven to retirements, leaving only nineteen resulting from the defeat of incumbents. All nineteen defeats were suffered by Democrats who, of course, were defeated by other Democrats who in the great majority of cases professed themselves to be as good or better New Dealers than the men seeking renomination. The number of defeats suffered by the 306 incumbents seeking renomination amounted to only 6.2 per cent of the total, and lest undue significance be attached to the fact that all the fallen were Democrats, the point must be made that 78 per cent of the 306 men and women seeking renomination were Democrats and only 22 per cent Republicans. Five of the nineteen who met defeat were anti-Long Democrats in Louisiana; they were beaten by pro-Long Democrats in a primary held soon after Huey Long's death but not before the Long machine had made peace with the New Deal. The others who went down to defeat were Representatives Claiborne of Missouri, Duffey and Fiesinger of Ohio, Gassaway of Oklahoma, Richardson, Berlin, Brooks, and Moritz of Pennsylvania, Blanton of Texas, Huddleston of Alabama, Hoeppe of California, Sears of Florida, and Darden of Virginia. None of them was a member of the progressive bloc in the House and none represents an irreparable loss to the national fortunes. On the other hand, among their conquerors there is not a single likely addition to the progressive bloc.

There remains here only space enough to point out that the Democrats cannot possibly lose control of the Senate. There are only thirty-six Senate seats to be filled in November, of which at present twenty-three are held by Democrats, twelve by Republicans, and one by a Farmer-

Laborite, Benson. The Democrats are certain of recapturing eighteen of them because they are seats from Democratic strongholds. They have a definite edge in the race for four others and at least a fighting chance in nine. When these facts are added to the fact that the Democrats held seventy out of the ninety-six Senate seats in the last Congress, it becomes apparent that they are certain of keeping sixty-five of them in the next Congress and possibly may run their total up to seventy-eight.

How Dead Is Liberalism?

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE more often a thing is said and the more commonly it is accepted the less likely we are to ask precisely what it is that we mean when we find ourselves accepting it. Sometimes everyone seems to agree upon some formulating phrase because everyone is either giving it a private meaning of his own or letting it pass without asking whether or not it actually signifies anything at all.

"Liberalism is dead." So many people who seem to agree upon nothing else have agreed to accept these three sweeping words that one is justified in suspecting the simplicity of the phrase as the reason for the agreement, and it occurred to me that it might be interesting to ask the people whom I met on a recent visit to Paris and London precisely what it meant to them when they used it themselves or allowed it to pass unchallenged when uttered in their presence. How much, in the first place, does the statement include? How many of the institutions, convictions, and ideals loosely associated with the term "liberalism" are thus certified to have passed beyond human aid? And just how dead, in the second place, are we supposed to assume that each of them is? Are they dead completely and forever or, as some a bit too facilely assume, only pro tem? Which of them are to be dismissed as discarded experiments or exploded myths; which stand for something eternally desirable and either to be returned to at some happier time or approached from some new direction?

Certainly the Communist and the fascist would be the first to insist that their agreement is merely verbal and that they differ almost as much over what it is that is dead as over the question of what should replace it. But as I had suspected before and as I discovered upon question, members of the various subdivisions of the left also disagree among themselves in ways which are, perhaps, even more important for the very reason that they are less obvious, and that—if I may force the metaphor—the various doctors who sign the same death certificate have actually been examining a different corpse.

"Liberalism" obviously means different things to different persons, and, more especially, it includes very much more in the minds of some than it does in the minds of others. I know, therefore, no better way of beginning a discussion like the present than by listing some of the meanings which the term may have. When anyone says, "Liberalism is dead," he may be meaning to assert that the world is done for good with any one or more of the following: (1) the Liberal Party of Great Britain; (2) the doctrine of economic laissez faire; (3) a political method of which the essentials are universal suffrage, free speech, and an insistence upon the maintenance of civil liberties at all times; (4) a philosophy of which the foundations were laid in the eighteenth century and which includes a belief in the natural goodness of man, in the doctrine of equal rights, and in the existence of a natural tendency toward progress wherever freedom is maintained; (5) what may more properly be called the liberal temperament—a quasi-aesthetic preference for freedom and variety over discipline and conformity and a tendency to regard them as ends in themselves.

In actual practice people have been found saying that liberalism is dead and meaning to affirm by that statement everything from a mere belief that the Liberal Party of Great Britain has ceased to be an effective force to the very inclusive conviction, which seems sometimes to be shared by some Communists and some fascists, that the whole tendency to regard the individual as important and individual opinion or action as even interesting is fundamentally pernicious. Hence the tendency to agree that liberalism is dead is the source of far more confusion than it is of clarification, and any man who wants to be understood will refuse either to affirm or to deny it. He will not take refuge in any statement so monstrously vague but will say instead exactly what are the methods, or institutions, or convictions, or preferences which the world, in his opinion, is done with at last.

Ten years ago one would, I think, have met more widely divergent answers to these questions than one is likely to get very often today. Many fascists, to be sure, would doubtless still use the phrase in the most absolute possible sense, but outside the ranks of such it would be much more difficult to find anyone willing to take a position so extreme or so simple. The most ardent advocates of proletarian dictatorship are usually anxious to explain that such a dictatorship is at best a temporary expedient, and though that has, I believe, been always the official Communist position, there is no mistaking the shift which has taken place in emphasis. There is, for example, no disputing the fact that the new Russian constitution is a gesture at least, even though it may possibly turn out to be no more than that, and the gesture is inspired by a sentiment plainly evident in many other quarters. Communists of all parties are much more anxious than they formerly were to emphasize their positive aims and to picture the new society in terms far less offensive to the traditional liberal temper than they used to choose. Officially as well as unofficially democratic institutions like universal suffrage are spoken of with greater and greater respect, while at the same time—and this is of perhaps even greater significance—the emphasis upon the determination to distribute the goods of bourgeois society grows at the expense of the determination to substitute others for them. Jazz and cosmetics are no longer frowned upon but supplied generally, so we are told, to the people, and the Communist who a decade ago would have held that an interest in fashionable apparel was evidence of a dead soul today points with pride to the elegance of Moscow dress shops.

At the same time there is an equally evident tendency to regard the higher manifestations of bourgeois culture with similar favor. Eight years ago Eisenstein summed up for me his aesthetic creed somewhat as follows: There are only two kinds of art—bourgeois art, which consists in the imaginative satisfaction of unfulfilled desires, and proletarian art, which is preparation for social change. In the perfect state about to be created there will be no need for any art at all—no need for bourgeois art because there will be no unsatisfied desires, no proletarian art because there will be no more social change. Today Eisenstein is said to have lost official favor, and it would be difficult to find anyone who did not regard such a pronouncement as his as quaintly barbarous, or who would not hold a similar opinion of the statement made some years ago by Robert Briffault, that the entire culture of the past is so poisoned with a devilish ideology that it ought to be withheld in its entirety from the new people. In Russia RAPP is no more; Pravda has declared that the spirit of Soviet art is classic; and if a composer like Shostakovich is suddenly liquidated, it must be remembered that he was "revolutionary" and that at least apologists are eager to explain that his sudden disappearance was due, not to the watchfulness of a dictatorship determined to give the people what they ought to have, but to a surprisingly sudden loss of popular favor. Outside Russia even an official publicist for the Russian Communist Party like Ralph Fox is ready to admit to me that perhaps the Soviet government "went too far" in its condemnation of bourgeois artistic ideals, and an independent Communist like André Malraux declares roundly both that Russian literature since the revolution has been nearly worthless and that the revolutionary or non-revolutionary character of a work of art has nothing to do with its subject matter.

Eight years ago the manager of the Moscow theater in which "The Hairy Ape" had been given an eccentric production replied with lofty condescension to my inquiry about "Strange Interlude." The Russian public, she said, could not possibly be interested in such a work because it not only dealt with love but dealt with it as a problem between individuals, while the Communist had passed far beyond any interest in "individual problems." Last winter "Romeo and Juliet" was said to have been one of the most popular plays of the season, and according to a dispatch in an American newspaper, one of the official journals in Russia not only gave its readers editorial permission to fall in love but urged some sort of public reproof for those who showed themselves incapable of this noble emotion. Mr. Fox, whether following the party line or announcing the results of his own lucubrations, assured me that the "problems of the individual" had undoubtedly been given far too little attention in recent Russian literature and that though they were being taken up again, much valuable time had been lost. For almost a generation the Russian citizen had been deprived of that opportunity to know himself which the more intimate sort of literature provides, and the newest writing would necessarily be crudely elementary until the spiritual development of the Russian had caught up with the past from which it had been detached. Indeed, he even went so far as to agree with my more or less fanciful suggestion that the perfect society would, after all, be one in which none but individual problems remained.

It might of course be argued that as the attempt is made in Russia to moderate the rigors of a revolutionary society by the readmission of bourgeois ideals, comforts, and diversions, as well as of bourgeois institutions, the vulgarities of such comforts and diversions as well as the injustice of such institutions must be admitted pari passu; that, in a word, the prospect for a sanctified and classless society fades as the convictions of the Communist approach those of the bourgeois liberal. But that is not the subject here under discussion. The fact remains that even the Communist who proclaims that liberalism is dead is far from asserting that the whole complex of institutions and ideals and standards of value associated with the term has been wholly abandoned. And to that extent the differences between him and the liberal democrat have not only diminished but diminished at least as much because the Communist has shifted his emphasis as because the democrat has recognized the working defects of the system he supports.

On the one hand, Bertrand Russell may take his stand upon a position which many would describe as far to the right. He may assure me, for example, that to him the phrase "Liberalism is dead" means no more than that laissez faire as an economic system has been shown not to work. He may go on both to affirm his faith in democracy, his conviction that it has already vastly improved the condition of humanity, and his further conviction that the best hope for the future is in the continual piling up of such small reforms as democracy has accomplished in the past. On the other hand, M. Malraux—and here his position does not seem very different from that of an orthodox Communist Party man—may assert that the whole method of liberalism is dead because it was never alive, that the liberal society never existed except in the minds of sentimentalists. To Mr. Russell's assertion that the citizen of France or Great Britain or the United States who insists that nothing can be done now and that he must simply wait for the catastrophe of civil war is merely giving us an excuse for laziness, M. Malraux may oppose the conviction that democracy can never work until it has been reborn after a proletarian dictatorship. But wide as the divergence is, it is not as wide as it might be and not, I am convinced, as wide as that between the typical Communist and the typical democrat was ten years ago. Neither M. Malraux nor Mr. Fox talked about the "workers' civilization" as something beyond the comprehension of the bourgeois democrat. They talked only about the best method of getting in the greatest measure something which, like Mr. Russell, they agreed in thinking worth the having. Perhaps they found more of liberalism dead. But they were obviously as anxious as he that the whole should be restored to life.

To say all this is not to say that the Communist and the liberal are therefore ready to unite as brothers along a common front. The differences between them are profound enough to wreck a world which may find no way of reconciling one with the other. But the agreements are sufficient to limit the particular discussion. The question "How dead is liberalism?" has come to mean—much more clearly than it meant ten years ago—how dead are liberal methods and the faith which intelligent men can have in them? Can liberalism best be served by defending the institutions through which these liberal methods have operated or by consenting that they should be destroyed to make way for others whose outlines can at present be only dimly perceived? In my conversations I met no one whose discussion ranged further afield.

[This is the first of a series of four articles by Mr. Krutch. The second will appear next week.]

Doriot—France's Would-be Führer

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, August 20

PIERRE LAVAL, in the days when he was a revolutionary Socialist, uttered words which sound like a prophetic description of his own subsequent career. "The bourgeoisie," he said, "no longer has any men. It is obliged to go and find them in the garbage heap where the proletariat throws its refuse." A more recent example is the case of Jacques Doriot. It has been evident for many months now that all was not quite well in the Croix de Feu camp. The fantastic unfitness of Colonel de la Rocque for the role assigned him was brought home after the elections even to the impresarios of fascism. Therefore these gentlemen, with no time to lose, set about looking for more suitable talent. They found it—or think they found it—in the mayor and deputy of the suburban town of St. Denis, the Communist renegade Doriot. Why he, of all the possible and eager candidates? The answer is that Duke Pozzo di Borgo—until some three weeks ago the Colonel's angel—and his general staff had been looking into the mechanics of the movement which had triumphed in Germany and Italy and which had so inexplicably failed in France. Their studies showed them that the counter-revolution, whenever it got anywhere, was led by a man of the people—in Poland and Italy by ex-Socialists, in Germany by a former workman; while in Spain, for instance, where an army officer tried his hand at the business, it was short-lived. Now Doriot fulfils all the requirements. He is a man of humble origin, has served his political apprenticeship in a proletarian party and in capitalist prisons, knows how to talk to workmen, is well versed in the "social" lingo of which Hitler made such excellent capital, is a determined, intelligent, able fellow, and the U. S. S. R. is anathema to him.

This last is a capital point. The other fascist chieftains could and did rave against "Moscow," but Doriot has the goods on the Soviets. He is an ex-member of the Politburo, has had personal contact with the leaders of the Russian government, and can at least pretend to have inside documentary evidence of the aims and methods of the Comintern. He did a lot of "exposing" of his one-time comrades in the course of the recent elections. Indeed, it was this that in the first instance caused the 200 families to cock their ears in his direction. He possesses other qualifications also for the role he is being cast for. Though the working class and the politically conscious execrate a renegade, the unwary are apt to be drawn toward a "convert" who has seen the light; and Doriot exploits the pretension of being a peace-loving, patriotic—as well as, of course, an anti-capitalist—Frenchman who reluctantly parted company with an Internationale which was bent on involving his country in a war against fascism and for the defense of a foreign power, the Soviet Union. The facts are somewhat more complex and rather less flattering to his rugged sincerity. He was, it is true, forced out of the French Communist Party for a breach of discipline, his advocacy of union with the Socialists before the executive committee had got round to it. But having got out, he did not, like other dissident Communists, join either the Socialists or the P. U. P. (Party of Proletarian Unity). He took the path which Millerand, Laval, and their kind had blazed for him, setting up, first, his own Doriotiste machine and then swinging by rapid strides farther and farther to the right. In two years he had bleached completely white, the leading exponent of "integral" nationalism and anti-Sovietism in France.

His past, his versatile conscience, his common touch made him the very man to rally the scattered forces of the counter-revolution into a single movement. No sooner were the elections over than negotiations started. By the middle of July the one-town Doriotist seed blossomed out into the Parti Populaire Français, before an audience of dowager marquises, bank directors, tricolor youths of both sexes, and residents of the Faubourg St. Germain, with the blessings, on the following morning, of the entire reactionary press, including the Action Française and the Völkischer Beobachter. In many circles, notably in Communist ones, Doriot is viewed with apprehension. Doubtless he is more dangerous than the preposterous La Rocque or any of his competitors. For the moment his advent has served to precipitate the collapse of the long-decayed Croix de Feu movement. But while the right-wing elements of this fascist army are flocking to Doriot, the anti-capitalist faction of it, that which took the Colonel's "social" aspirations seriously, is heading in the opposite direction, to the Socialists and the Communists. What is more, both La Rocque and his rivals decline to efface themselves before the new idol of the oligarchy, and having transformed their organizations into political parties to evade the dissolution decree, carry on at the old stand. The immediate result, then, of Doriotism has been but to bring another aspirant into an already overcrowded market. Time alone will tell whether his venture has solid ground under it. If it ever gains any effective following, it will be owing less to Doriot's gifts of leadership than to the dawning crisis in the political and economic life of the republic.

In contemporary Europe a left victory at the polls is not necessarily the prelude to the strengthening or even the preservation of democracy. It may, on the contrary, be the signal for a final and desperate assault by its foes. This is all the more likely to be the case when the democratic forces arrive in office with an audacious program of social and economic reform. In every country where fascism has carried the day its triumph has been preceded by an electoral landslide to the left. The tragic events occurring in Spain today are but the latest and bloodiest instance of the truth that the counter-revolution effectively gets into action only where and when democracy throws down the gauntlet without at the same time boldly and swiftly taking the offensive. Indeed, fascism as a world phenomenon is historically and in its nature the counter-attack of the old order after the first victory of the new. In this sense the French reactionaries were not lying when during the campaign of last spring they warned that if the Front Populaire won the election it would mean civil war. It was a veiled hint that the oligarchy and the political parties at its service had no intention of abiding by the will of the people.

Sojourn in Hell

BY JOHANN SCHMIDT

THE concentration camp of Esterwegen, in which I was a prisoner, consists of two inclosures separated by a barbed-wire barricade in which there is a gate. In the smaller inclosure are the offices of the commandant and the administrative officials, garages, kitchen, dining-room, court, bath, and sleeping quarters for about 400 special guards (S. S.). The larger inclosure is the prisoners' camp, containing ten barracks, workshops, kitchen, bath, and court. Around this camp runs the "path of death," a sanded strip about thirty inches wide along which hang warning shields painted with skulls and crossbones. Whoever sets foot on this path may be shot by the sentinel without warning. It is inclosed by wires and barricades, and between these and the outer wall runs another path about forty-five inches wide on which sentinels walk incessantly to and fro. Over the gate between the two inclosures is a tower occupied day and night by a machine-gun unit. There are other towers on the extremities of the camp wall.

The prisoners number from 1,000 to 1,200. They are divided into the following groups:

Criminals. The Nazis classify as criminals persons who within a year receive more than five criminal sentences, including one of a half-year's imprisonment. Such offenders are kept in a concentration camp for two or three years as an additional penalty. The local police decide more or less arbitrarily whether or not a person is to be classified as a criminal, and those so classified have no right of appeal and no other legal right. Criminals and political prisoners do the same work and suffer the same treatment, but wear different uniforms. Conversation between criminals and political prisoners is forbidden, although they work together.

Austrians. Many Austrian Nazis fled to Germany after the revolt of 1934. Some of these were enrolled in German Nazi organizations; the rest formed the Austrian Legion. If one of them was guilty of an infraction of discipline, or was politically suspect, or even showed a desire to go back to a civil profession, he was placed in a concentration camp as a "prisoner of honor." The Austrians at Esterwegen wear special uniforms, and are not obliged to do labor service. They are allowed to give the Hitler salute, and as a visible sign of their "honor" they are permitted to wear shining black leather puttees. But this honor is tenuous. Frequently they become political prisoners. The "prisoners of honor" are strictly forbidden to communicate with the criminals or the political prisoners, but this does not prevent them from begging Jews for half-smoked cigarettes. The Austrians commit most of the infractions of discipline. In special barracks, separated from the others, these National Socialist prisoners of honor show neither honor nor friendship.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I SUPPOSE it is too much to hope that President Roosevelt may appoint Ross A. Collins of Mississippi, the former Congressman, to the post left vacant by the death of Secretary Dern of the War Department. Yet it would be an almost ideal selection. There has never been a more useful member of the House Military Affairs Committee than was Mr. Collins, who unfortunately resigned his seat in the hope that he might be elected Senator from his state—he was defeated by his demagogue opponent, Theodore G. Bilbo. Mr. Collins had served in the House from 1921 to 1935 and during most of this time was on the Military Affairs Committee. He took his work most seriously and studied the organization of the army, its personnel, its needs, and its methods of business with a thoroughness that nobody else had thought of giving to it. I believe it is true that he was the only member whom the War Department officials feared when they came before the committee, for Mr. Collins sometimes told them things about the army they did not know themselves. More than that, Mr. Collins is not a militarist. If he were Secretary of War, he would not go round the country making bombastic and imperialistic speeches, and he certainly would not permit the present Assistant Secretary, Mr. Woodring, to preach militarism and to attack violently the most outstanding clergymen in the country and the workers for peace in general merely because they stand for peace. It is just because Mr. Collins is such a civilized man and because he would insist on reorganizing the army and making it really efficient that it is too much to hope for his appointment.

Perhaps next winter, when Major General Johnson Hagood's new book on the army appears, this whole question of army organization and army efficiency may get a real ventilation in Congress. I say "may" and not "will" for the reason that two years ago a book on the United States navy appeared which would have caused the fall of any ministry in Europe if it had been written about the navy of a European country. It was called "Is the Navy Ready?" and it came from the pen of F. Russell Bichowsky, a former instructor in the Naval Academy and civilian official who was for some years employed in one of the navy's scientific bureaus. It was not that he had only his own opinions to offer which made it possible for the navy to ignore this terrible indictment of itself, its educational methods, and its efficiency as a fighting machine, for the author had gone through the back files for a number of years of the leading naval professional publication, the Proceedings of the Naval Institute, and taken out criticisms of the service from the pens of officers of high standing. This book of Bichowsky's was reinforced after its publication by Admiral Sims's indictment of our system of training naval officers, in which he declared that we were not producing any officers competent to handle the fleet in war time. This alone would have caused a governmental crisis elsewhere, and either the admiral making the charge would have been court-martialed and dismissed or reforms would have taken place.

Similarly in the army the criticisms of Major Generals Johnson Hagood, William C. Rivers, and Smedley D. Butler, the latter of the marines, go unnoticed. Just as the navy ignores aspersions upon its honor and efficiency, so the War Department simply ducks the criticisms of the few officers who have the courage and are in a position to say what they believe. Perhaps Major General Hagood's book will sting both Congress and the War Department into action, but the only definite assurance of this that I can think of would be the appointment of Ross Collins as Secretary of War.

The recent action of France in placing the army and navy under one head ought to make Congress consider creating a similar department of defense with one executive and three assistant secretaries to head the army, the navy, and the flying force. Was there ever anything more preposterous than the fact that the War and Navy departments are within sight of each other in Washington and yet have no more to do with each other in the matter of the nation's defense than they have with the Department of Commerce, or of Labor? Part of the air forces are assigned to the navy and marine corps and part to the army, yet Holland, France, Germany, and Italy are consolidating their army and navy air forces. Great Britain has long had only one air force. Opposition to the combining of our defense organizations under one head is based solely on the fact that it has never been done before and on the fear of the present departments that they will lose prestige and power. Yet if war should come, there would not be time to work out a coordinated plan for defense such as should be in existence today. There might be directly conflicting orders to the navy fliers and the army air men which would result in confusion and chaos, perhaps even collisions, not with the enemy, but with each other. The worst of it is that the money spent on preparedness is just fooling the public into believing that the arming of the country is going on in accordance with a detailed plan worked out in relation to a definite foreign policy of this government.

I sincerely hope that Major General Hagood will devote a good portion of his book to the astounding fact that our responsible political leaders speak of a defense policy without any genuine attempt to define such a policy, without understanding what such a policy calls for, and without seeing that unison of the armed services is the very basis of any defense policy which merits the name.

PROFESSIONAL baseball is one of America's industries which have profited particularly by recovery. Although the magnates have not made any public expression they are decidedly in debt to the New Deal. Moreover, in their own system of government for the game they long ago abandoned earlier ideas of complete autonomy and set up a strongly centralized control under Judge Landis. But it would hardly be fair to call this fascism since Landis has to get himself elected every once and so often.

Still, at the moment I am not going to concern myself with the economic or political aspects of the national game, rich as these fields may be. My own reviving enthusiasm in the pennant races rests, I hope, upon the restoration of pitching to its proper place as an art form. Babe Ruth was a genius, and his own exploits in self-expression on the diamond will never be forgotten, but he did destroy all balance and form in the proper pattern of big-league baseball. Or at any rate one phase of the art was developed at the expense of the rest.

The Babe was the prophet of man's potentialities. He was the "yea" sayer of the diamond. Carl Hubbell is a sort of Housman marking in mournful numbers—chiefly zeros—the limitations upon human aspirations. In the days of Ruth it seemed a small world after all, and the fences were close and not particularly compelling. During the reign of Hubbell first base itself is a Marathon route.

All of which is just another way of saying that the pitchers are beginning to catch up with the hitters once again. If I choose to mention Dizzy Dean only in passing, it will be because in my opinion Carl Hubbell is the greatest technician the game has ever known, and I am not even excepting Mathewson. It is true that both Ed Walsh and Chesbro ran up strings of victories greater than those which Hubbell has achieved, but there was a certain brute strength in their triumphs. Hubbell prevails on sheer skill. He is a pitchers' pitcher and certainly the sort of ballplayer who would have delighted the heart of Ruskin or of Pater.

One of the most thrilling things which an admirer of perfectionism can do is to sit behind the plate and watch Hubbell work on one of his good days. And most of his days are good. One of the curious contradictions in his mastery of his medium is that he happens to be a southpaw. There may have been left-handed architects, authors, and painters who possessed control, but it is notorious that left-handed pitchers are universally a little whacky.

Some have made up for their aberrations by intermittent flashes of brilliant execution. The late Rube Waddell, for instance, was not an artist in the sense in which Carl Hubbell is, but he could upon occasion pitch practically unhittable baseball. It all gets back to the fundamental question of whether Willa Cather is more important than Theodore Dreiser. Dreiser can't write. He is distinctly what the big-league pitchers call a "thrower," but when the perspiration is on him he often can manage to buzz the ball across even though it is straight as a string.

Hubbell, unlike Theodore Dreiser or Walter Johnson, plays for the corners. He gains his effects with a minimum of effort and by his precision rather than his power. Of course he has a good curve and he is a master of the screw-ball. Indeed, he is one of the few left-handers who has ever succeeded in perfecting this delivery.

When Carl Hubbell is right he is always ahead of the batter. I watched him once in a tight game in Boston when he did not throw more than three balls during the entire game which did not go precisely where he intended to place them. Naturally he was not throwing a succession of strikes although he almost always had the first on the batter before he undertook to make him go after bad ones. Too many pitchers with a two-and-none advantage will waste the next one so grossly that the current hitter cannot possibly be deceived into swinging. They will give the batter a ball two feet over his head or one which hits the dirt in the vain hope that he may go after it. But when Hubbell wastes a ball he uses more finesse. He doesn't waste it by much. He simply puts it in a mean spot, for he knows not only the corners of the plate but the territory just outside where a sharp-eyed batter or even an umpire may make a mistake.

Once in the annual all-star game Carl Hubbell struck out six (or was it five?) of the finest batters in the world in succession. But that was bravura stuff and unworthy of him. It was like Wagner (Richard) throwing a song hit into the middle of the "Ring" or Shakespeare stooping to write a "Taming of the Shrew."

I trust that we can agree that the chief function of a pitcher is not to give the batter something he can't hit but rather to serve the ball up to him in such fashion that he cannot hit it in the manner to which he had been accustomed. It is, of course, amusing to get a man to miss a wide curve by a foot, but there is more artistry in letting him get just a piece of a delivery properly placed for his undoing.

To be sure, Hubbell is tragically born either too soon or too late. He came to the game well after the fans had begun to forget all about the art of pitching or take any interest in it. They are beginning to show a greater appreciation for this old art form, but it is still too tepid. In the days of his glory excursion trains were run to bring the villagers into town to see Babe Ruth knock the ball over the fence. Even today it is considered expedient to let it be known in advance when Dizzy Dean is going to take the mound for the Cardinals. But my great admiration still goes out to Carl Hubbell, the quiet and inconspicuous left-hander in the pea-green business suit, who moves through the world with all the self-effacement of an Alfred Landon.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Gerontion in Cork

BIRD ALONE. By Sean O'Faolain. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THE principal reflection left by Mr. O'Faolain's third volume of fiction is that here is a young novelist who has mastered all the more important elements of his craft—to a greater extent perhaps than any of his contemporaries in either England or America—only to remain handicapped by a fundamental uncertainty or confusion as to his theme. This new work possesses all the qualities that made the short stories of "Midsummer Night Madness" and "A Nest of Simple Folk" among the few real consolations of recent book seasons. It is distinguished by the same controlled use of Anglo-Irish speech rhythms, the same brilliance of both narrative and descriptive detail, and the same rich handling of the mise-en-scène. But it is hard to discover in it anything that can be said to mark an advance over either of those earlier books. It is not that Mr. O'Faolain, turning from direct treatment of revolutionary materials, has failed to bring up to date the long chronicle of Irish social and political history begun in his first novel. For it would seem not impossible for a writer of his imagination to give us a novel of Irish life of such depth and breadth that the revolutionary subject would fall into his proper relation to the whole. It is rather that he has chosen to demonstrate the acknowledged perfection of his craft within the easy limitations of a minor and now rather too conventionalized pattern.

Taken conventionally, and it has already been so taken by the English reviewers, "Bird Alone" belongs to the class of romantic death idyl which has enjoyed such a lively vogue since the war. Future historians will doubtless discover some connection between this fondness for identifying the themes of love and death, as revealed in novelists as disparate as Michael Arlen and Ernest Hemingway, and the present state of our society. At the moment it is certain only that, in addition to providing an incontrovertible termination to a story, the necessity of death for the heroine renders almost unavoidable some very facile dramatic writing. This is a consequence doubled in certainty when death is allied with the other officially most effective of literary subjects; and like "A Farewell to Arms" Mr. O'Faolain's novel reaches its climax in a scene describing a childbirth. The truth is, however, that this central situation is so interwoven in the rich background of people and places that its melodramatic angles are considerably softened. Much more likely to remain in the memory than the over-ritualized love scenes are such figures as the narrator's unregenerate grandfather, his notorious Aunt Virginia from London, Mabel-in-the-Stable, and the evil-eyed Condoorum. Mr. O'Faolain's characters are on a somewhat higher social level than those in Frank O'Connor's stories and novel of Cork but they have no less capacity for rhetoric and absurdity. Perhaps the high point in all this humorous accompaniment to the main story is the epochal last confession of Grandfather Crone, in which the old man still keeps "an even balance between his loyalties, so that what with his fortissimo secularities and the pianissimo confession the thing was like an antiphon between this world and the next." But it is not possible by any single character or incident to indicate the remarkable quality of density with which Mr. O'Faolain endows his presentation of the complex little world of Cork. The city itself, as has been said of the Dublin of Joyce's "Ulysses," is more real and interesting than any of its inhabitants. This is managed partly through the fluid poetic style and partly through a formal framework which makes possible the rapid transitions and vivid condensations of the memory.

The framework, which is distinctly reminiscent of Mr. Eliot's "Gerontion," is that of recollection: an old man looking through misty windows upon the city in which he has lived all the important experiences of his life. The symbolical division of the three periods of his life—The Dark Cave, The Jungle, The Desert—increases the resemblance to a lyrical monologue. To this choice of novel structure, despite its great advantages for Mr. O'Faolain's type of prose, there are at least two objections amply illustrated in the book. The first is that the novelist is practically forced to make his narrator employ language and rhythms more complicated than are plausible for his particular background. It is hard to believe, for example, that even a carpenter who knows his Shakespeare and Moore would describe his native city in this fashion: "Lovely under the faint webbing of the hearth-vapors of every house, linked from peak to peak into a communal smoke, covering her like a city-under-the-sea." The second and more serious objection is that rather tenuous poetic renderings and reflections are substituted for the orderly working out of a theme that we have come, rightly or wrongly, to expect from the novel form. It is never precisely clear what pattern of meaning we are to extract from the sequence of circumstances that have made Corny Crone a "bird alone" in his social environment. There is mention of a "whisper of wind" that seems to tell him that he has had too little sense of the claims of common humanity. But we know that the tragedy itself—the death of his fiancée on the lonely marshes and his consequent ostracism—has been as much the result of outside forces like ignorance and intolerance. The whisper of wind does not quite condense into a theme. It is as if Mr. O'Faolain himself, like Grandfather Crone, were trying too hard to keep a balance between his social and religious loyalties. Here again we are left, as at the close of his first novel, with an impression of conflicts unresolved, of ambiguities remaining suspended in a flowing current of exquisitely modulated language.

all over the world were hounded, blackmailed, or murdered, and their well-nigh unbelievable stories stifled. At the same time through lavish subsidies for favorable publicity, the tales of the rotting torture holes, ruled over by known sadistic criminals, were concealed by sickening praise of Gómez and his regime in all the notable publications of the world, not excluding the New York Times.

But did not the great benevolent patriot eliminate all foreign debt? Did he not build fine roads? Well-paid publicists failed to mention that most of these roads were not built to benefit the nation but to accommodate the vast private estates of the dictator, and that their cost in money and human misery hit an all-time high. But did he not maintain peace in one of those troublesome countries, thus permitting honest American capital to operate?

Now, after twenty-seven years of regal pomp and might, the dictator has discovered that he also fits in something less than a six-foot coffin. Fourteen tons of the cruelest leg irons yet devised by man have been flung into the at Puerto Cabello. Venezuela breathes again. What next?

Rourke gives us little inkling, but he does tell the whole story of Gómez, succinctly and dramatically, without special pleading. A former oil engineer, the author of "Thunder Below," an intimate novel of Latin American life, Rourke—with his broad background of Venezuelan history, his first-hand knowledge of the people, their life and customs and institutions—in vivid, swift, and occasionally brilliant style contributes a worthy addition to the best literature dealing with the southern countries. He knows Venezuela better than most men ever get to know a foreign country, and this knowledge flows into his exciting narrative to give it validity, strength, and richness. The career of the sardonic ruler, his cattle rustling, his campaigns, his mistresses, his lust for gold and power, his cruelties, his fantastic energies and abilities—all are told.

It is too soon for a definitive biography. Confessions, hidden records, all sorts of data are still pouring into the pages of the liberated Caracas newspapers. During the long conspiracy of silence, which partly baffles even Rourke, the dictator had powerful allies—for hundreds of millions of dollars of American and British capital are invested in the country, until recently the second-largest petroleum producer in the world. There were dark and sinuous things in the dealings of many of the oil companies and other great investors, completely whitewashed by Rourke—shady concessions, bribed officials, false-bottom tankers, tricky gauges, connivances with corrupt officialdom to defraud the nation. A few of these things are on record, but Rourke does not give the story.

Now that there is talk of nationalizing Venezuelan oil, the country may well become a second Mexico, with thunderous notes speeding toward Caracas, and battleships with stripped decks and guns trained on Maracaibo. As in Mexico, some of the oil companies even before the death of Gómez had worked out emergency plans in detail to set up an independent oil republic. If and when these momentous events disturb the Rooseveltian dream of noble pan-Americanism, Rourke's book will provide us with no background for understanding them.

Personally I regret that he did not delve into the records of the relations of our State Department with the dictator. He might well have quoted some of the gushing eulogies by our outstanding diplomats and Congressmen at the Bolívar centenary, at a time when behind the scenes, perhaps to hide any signs of unrest from his silk-hat visitors, Gómez had embarked upon one of his most terroristic ram-

I also wish that Rourke gave a deeper explanation—he gives it by implication—than that of mere political precedent for dictatorships in countries of such racial and economic cleavage as Venezuela. But he is so generous with information and understanding and has stuck so well to his essential task of narrative biography that quibbling is not in order. His book is exciting enough to warrant its being read by a public usually lethargic about the affairs of our southern neighbors.

THE BROTHERS ASHKENAZI. By I. J. Singer. Translated from the Yiddish by Maurice Samuel. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE mood of this novel is of a piece with the mood of our time. Now that the Jewish problem is more than ever with us and the fate of the Jew swings in the scale of political events, a narrative depicting a wide panorama of Jewish life through a fusion of its national and social elements is something of a triumph of historic consciousness over the inertia of tradition. Not that Yiddish writers have not done it before, and, in the case of radicals like David Bergelson, with greater clarity and concentration. Yet the fact remains that most Yiddish writers have been content to immerse themselves in genre painting, provincial nostalgia, and the segregated patterns of a dying folk life. This seems to be the reason for the scarcity of translations from that language. Lacking a common denominator with scenes and values of literature in other languages, much Yiddish writing has inevitably found itself chained to the Wailing Wall. In a way Singer has himself been one of the romantics of national introversion. With this novel, however, he has thrust forward into the mêlée of modern experience, and this without surrendering a jot of his fidelity to the particulars of the classic Jewish world of Eastern Europe.

The story of Lodz, textile center of Poland, supplies the background of Mr. Singer's novel. Each character's destiny is, to a large degree, determined by the fortunes of the city itself—from its small beginnings in primitive accumulation on through the Industrial Revolution and the growth of monopoly. The brothers Max and Yakob Ashkenazi, sons of a pietist father, move through careers that involve a full recreation of their teeming environment—the all-absorbing business deals, the cycles of intimate life, the breakdown of orthodox mores, the rise of the labor movement with its strikes and revolutionary conspiracies, the World War, the Russian Revolution, and the birth of an independent Poland. Events are shaped by the combat of classes, individualized within the human void of wealth and in the agonies and struggles of the poor. The variegated national traditions of the city find their detailed representation in symbolic figures, such as Nissan, the workers' leader, who reenacts in revolutionary terms his father's messianic yearnings and ascetic frenzy; Huntze, the German textile magnate, who defends his peasant heritage in battling the social ambitions of his degenerate sons and daughters; and Flederbaum, the Jewish millionaire, who, having abandoned his religion in all but name, remembers in the nights the implacable God of his fathers and in fear and trembling pours his money into the synagogues and charities of the Jews to appease the jealous deity.

But of course it is Max and Yakob who carry the brunt of the story's movement. Max, a physical weakling and a brilliant Talmudic scholar in his youth, rises to wealth and power through countless cruelties and betrayals, while Yakob, a tranquil, self-indulgent type, alert to the enchantments of sheer living, makes his way through luck with women. The rivalry between the brothers, running its course through boundless hatred to reconciliation on the brink of financial disaster and death, is cast, it seems to me, in the Biblical mold of Cain and Abel. Nowhere is the deeply Hebraic nature of the author's imagination so patent as in the character of Max, in whom we discern the quality of evil absolutized as in some of the figures of the Old Testament. And as Max dies repentant, cursing, like Job, the day he was born—"his head fallen across the rumpled pages of his Bible"—his end serves to revitalize his origin in the mythology of his people.

The book ends on a note of interrogation, for though the author has welded the national and social elements of his subject, he has not resolved the problem of their interaction. As the story closes, the reader may be left with the impression that the classes are taking one road and the Jews another. Nissan's disappointment in the October uprising, the shattering of Feldblum's faith in a Poland free from tyranny and racial hatred, the ineffectualness of the money solution for the Jewish dilemma, as exemplified in the death of the brothers—are these the fears of the author or his answer?

It might also be said that frequently the haste of history stays the intensity of the writing. In its effect on specific emotions and perceptions, the author's rendering of the objective flow of events is at times more illustrative than profound. The orchestration is perhaps a trifle too geometric, the characters too devoted to the destinies mapped out for them. The world of this social novelist suffers from an excess of rationalism. Given the intensity of pauses and the relief of a more plastic humanity, this novel could have reached a higher imaginative level. But even as it is, "The Brothers Ashkenazi" seems to me the most important novel of Jewish life so far published in English.

Small Pink Bloom

SPLENDOR IN THE GRASS. By Audrey Wurdemann. Harper and Brothers. $2.

MISS WURDEMANN is so gracefully depreciatory of her talents in certain of the poems here that one is tempted to take her at her own estimate. The opening lyric, for example, draws a useful comparison between the activities of the locust and the labors of the poet, both of whom, it appears, are concerned with the portage of "a single grain" "to a paltry storehouse." Farther on, in a sonnet descriptive of the resurgence of the arbutus, "a natural growth, a thing of the very soil," Miss Wurdemann pauses somewhat wistfully to register the hope that her own "twisted thoughts" may some day "put forth a small pink bloom." Elsewhere she proceeds to define the full life as one devoted wholly to seeing "With the eye Of the fly," tasting with the "tongue of the bee," hearing with "the furred ear Of the deer," smelling "As a dog can tell Trouble and terror," and touching "With the pink splayed hands of the mole." It would be excessive to suggest that Miss Wurdemann has not been to some extent successful in achieving each of these modest objectives; she has, in the present volume, carried a single grain, put forth a small pink bloom, and reported the "splendors in the grass"—which are hardly those Wordsworth meant—through

One of the frankest and most realistic accounts, as it is also one of the most artistic, of the process by which a so-called "wayward girl" becomes a prostitute.

"Caroline Slade has written a terrible story. It should be terrifying to all of us who are in any way responsible. And who of us is not?"

"STERILE SUN is both an important social document and a moving piece of writing."

"The book is memorable because of the fact that literature on the subject is usually written by individuals not only with no social kindness in them, but also without imagination. Mrs. Slade possesses both, and further possesses skill as a writer. . . . The book reads like fiction. Alas, it is not fiction."

Josephine Herbst

"I don't know any piece of contemporary writing where the American idiom has been more expertly controlled and utilized . . . a tender and moving thing."

POLITICS:

WHO GETS WHAT, WHEN, HOW

by Harold D. Lasswell

Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes says: "This is a 'fundamental' book on politics if there ever was one. Professor Lasswell has brought to bear on the subject an amazing number of techniques, all of an original and penetrating type. And yet the book is brief and highly readable. One who wishes to escape from campaign piffle and get down to brass tacks on our political issues will find nothing else which will quite equal this book for stimulation and insight."

A Book that Answers All Your Questions About Cooperatives

THE DECLINE AND RISE OF THE CONSUMER

By Horace M. Kallen. In this timely, accurate and authoritative volume, Dr. Kallen has written the first thorough treatment of the philosophy of consumers' cooperation. Tracing the history of consumer-producer relations from primitive man to the present, he reviews the history of consumers' cooperation, compares it with its rivals, Communism, Fascism, etc., and demonstrates its logical development from capitalism, as capitalism was a logical development from feudalism. An important book, written objectively, it must be read by everyone wishing to keep abreast of the times.

what may be politely fancied as the eye, tongue, ear, nose, and hand of a fly, bee, deer, dog, and mole respectively.

More than this, there is little to be said, except that the volume embarrasses definition by its complete colorlessness. Miss Wurdemann writes trippingly, without intensity or distinction. She is content to speculate as to the shape, sound, and consistency of cold, to note the flight of pigeons and geese, the figures in a tapestry, the details of unicorns, new moons, spiderwebs, and her face in the mirror, and to devise literary nosebags out of traditional flowers. It is a little beside the point to cite incidental echoes of Millay, Dickinson, and Léonie Adams which occur in several of the lyrics here, for Miss Wurdemann's models, like her observation of natural phenomena, have yielded her only their platitudes.

Revolt of the White Collars

A TIME TO REMEMBER. By Leane Zugsmith. Random House. $2.

THIS is not only the best novel that Miss Zugsmith has written, but one of the best social-minded novels that anybody has written, and one of the sanest approaches to the broadly anonymous—but no longer wholly inarticulate—population of our time. Of the fiction of the left, this is an exemplary novel to set before an open-minded reader because, starting from scratch, he would have no choice but to end up in a partisan mood. To some extent this would be due to the effect of the book on his emotions—with its human characters, its pathos, its touches of personal drama and social passion, "A Time to Remember" has a decided emotional appeal—but it would be chiefly due to the effect of the book on his mind. Miss Zugsmith, nowhere seeking to intoxicate the reader with belligerent indictments, has simply shown that the modern business world, even minus its most flagrant abuses, makes life hopeless for one's self-respect, one's human growth, one's sense of being fully alive: she makes us see it as a chain we drag around with us, if it isn't a heavy boot that bashes in our heads. Her novel, in other words, goes beyond showing that the methods of present-day capitalism are incompatible with human dignity; it shows that their very goal is incompatible with human freedom (the freedom of the bosses hardly less than the freedom of the workers).

"A Time to Remember" deals with white-collar employees in a department store. We become familiar with them as so many human beings before we observe them banded together as fellow-workers and, more significantly later on, as fellow-strikers. They are not much alike, mentally or temperamentally, in background, education, or social consciousness; most of them, however, are typical American products swallowing the myths of democracy and opportunity as a gesture against fate. For the most part they are not imaginative or self-assertive by nature; some of them are possibly grateful to have so few responsibilities, even toward themselves. But they are subtly worn down or dried up by the simple facts of their situation—the long hours of work under unpleasant circumstances for inadequate pay. And with the clash that arises through the formation of a union, when they are spied upon, blackmailed into giving information, bounced for becoming members, a capacity for leadership and action begins to assert itself.

Miss Zugsmith neither glorifies her strike nor distorts its meaning. For both bosses and workers it is a time of enlightenment and a time of confusion, and people on both sides, granted their bias, behave like human beings. Nor, though the strikers win, is their victory more than, to quote the author's own words, an "armed truce." Indeed, the clearest perception which the book brings home to you is that nothing is really settled by the here and now of her story, since it reflects but a moment in a struggle that is basic and irreconcilable. The system has got beyond repair; the people, taken individually, have ceased to count.

That is the final verdict, the verdict of our minds; but it is the business of fiction to attack our minds by way of our emotions, and to make people, taken individually in a different way, count for all they are worth. Miss Zugsmith, aware of this, has never allowed the immediate realities of her novel to be swallowed up by its implications. Here are people involved in a process; but here, to begin with, are people. People, many of them, quite ignorant of the process, and only beginning to learn as the process jumps a cog. People with families, with love affairs, with modest, absurd, unruly desires, with all kinds of prejudices, all degrees of courage. Even those who are prepared to fight and know what they are fighting for, work with conflicting emotions: one of them has a sick, pathetic, uncomprehending father; another has a jealous, pathetic, uncomprehending wife.

Thus through the material itself, through telling a vigorous story about interesting men and women, Miss Zugsmith leads us step by step to an understanding of their place in society; and then leads us one step farther, to understand the structure of that society, where the pay envelopes and the blocks of stock, the bouncings and the promotions, are all equally enslaving. "A Time to Remember" is impressive both for what it has to say and for the way it says it.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

The Bunga-Bunga Tree

ANTI-SEMITISM HISTORICALLY AND CRITICALLY EXAMINED. By Hugo Valentin. The Viking Press. $3.

"WHEN the bunga-bunga tree yields abundantly, the Australian blacks allow the stranger to share its fruit; when the yield is moderate, they may not do so; and in time of famine they eat the stranger." In this behavior Professor Hugo Valentin finds the prototype and explanation of modern anti-Semitism; for, as he adds, and many observers will agree with him, "civilized man is the twin brother of primitive man."

Civilized men, however, do not eat the stranger raw. They insist on seasoning him with spicy vices and cooking him over elaborate and complicated grills of theology, nationalism, or racialism; and by the time they have wiped their mouths it would appear that they have not devoured an innocent stranger but baffled a dangerous enemy. For men who want to know the whys and hows of anti-Semitism, as well as men who honestly regard the Jews askance, we urge the bestowal of two or three hours on Hugo Valentin's candid work, "Anti-Semitism Historically and Critically Examined."

The author is a Swede, a Christian, and a distinguished historian at the University of Upsala. The Jews of Sweden, it should be noted, number about 7,000, or one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total population—a mere fleck proportionately one-tenth the former size of German Jewry, which itself was proportionately a quarter the size of American Jewry. As a consequence, this Nordic student of the Jewish question—he has given years of study and devotion to it—can look with superb and certainly impartial peninsular isolation upon the madness which has overrun Central Europe and threatens the two Americas. His isolation from psychic contagion of either a philo- or anti-Semitic nature, his even temper, such as one expects but does not always find in a historian, and his wide and competent familiarity with the subject are a guaranty and a clear gain for the reader. Indeed, as a result of this book Professor Valentin will doubtless be ranked with G. F. Abbott and Leroy-Beaulieu as a dispassionate interpreter of Israel to the Gentiles.

The 300-page volume opens with a few brief chapters devoted to anti-Semitism in ancient and medieval times—a survey, it must be confessed, that smacks too literally of the encyclopedias and standard histories from which it was drawn. But the succeeding hundred pages, devoted particularly to Germany as the country which gave birth and classic expression to modern anti-Semitism, will reward the inquirer with a succinct, accurate, and highly readable account of why and how Germany and many of its neighboring lands, when the bunga-bunga tree went back on them, took to eating their Jews. The concluding and larger portion of the book details the leading charges brought against these victims—charges especially prevalent in Germany, echoes of which are not unfamiliar in America—such as racial inferiority, a conspiracy to rule the world, overweening financial power, secret Talmudic doctrines, radicalism, bolshevism, and parasitic habits. Each charge is examined in the light of its historic origin, the facts which can be distinguished among its fancies, and the interests which keep it alive. Such an examination explodes rather than refutes the charge. The accusation vanishes from the realm of fact, to linger, as the author says, only in minds that live on fiction.

The author's splendid isolation is perhaps responsible, however, for certain deficiencies which, in view of what the book otherwise achieves, must be regretted. Probably because Sweden, with its high and equitable standard of living and its low percentage of "strangers," is free from any menace of Jew-hatred, Professor Valentin gives scant space to the practical and intimate details of how anti-Semitism is fostered, not by its blind, honest, or fanatic adherents, but by the political demagogues and the industrial and financial leaders who take profit rather than pride in Jew-baiting. So, too, the author dwells too little on the menace of anti-Semitism to the Gentiles. Since they far outnumber the Jews, it should be made evident that it is the Gentiles who lose most when, in the course of depriving the Jew of his liberties, they must surrender their own. In a literal and ominous sense anti-Semitism is a Gentile problem.

Although the author clearly understands the economic basis of current anti-Semitism, he fails to draw from it either a prognostication or a program for the future. He is, to be sure, shrewd enough to see that nothing the Jews may do as Jews will alter their general lot. Whether they "assimilate" or act with "tactful restraint," whether they cling to their past or create a new future in Palestine, they will not be helped. "For it is not the Jews who are hated but an imaginary image of them." With respect to the Gentiles, "so far as we can see," he says, "this hatred will flourish for generations," to be vanquished only by that messianic reign, dear alike to Christian and Jew, which "lies in the mists of the future."

Yet it seems to a careful reader of this valuable book that hatred for the Jew, with all the evils it brings upon the hater as well as the hated, would vanish tomorrow, as it has vanished from time to time in the past, if we could get the bunga-bunga tree to yield us all enough food and security. Here, it seems to me, lies the chief and immediate task for Jew and Gentile; and if we need example or advice in the husbandry of that tree or in the distribution of its fruits, Professor Valentin's own Sweden can provide us with both.

WASTE—THE FIGHT TO SAVE AMERICA. By David Cushman Coyle. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. 50 cents.

In a brilliantly written little book Mr. Coyle dramatizes the great economic and social waste which characterizes present-day America. The chapters on mud, dust, water, land, and power are superb examples of the art of popularizing technical engineering problems. It is safe to say that no American can read the book and remain indifferent to such problems as soil erosion, flood control, and the conservation of our natural resources. If the chapters on human erosion are somewhat weaker, it is not so much owing to any deficiency in Mr. Coyle's writing skill as to uncertainty regarding the solution. Engineers know how to bind the soil so as to prevent erosion; they can control floods and conserve our natural resources. but if we are to judge by Mr. Coyle's exposition, our social engineers are still in a pick-and-shovel age, prepared to repair but not to prevent the damage wrought by our economic cataclysms.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE CONCEPT OF NATURE IN NINETEENTH-CENTURY ENGLISH POETRY. By Joseph Warren Beach. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Mr. Beach represents the enthusiasm for nature in certain English poets between Wordsworth and Meredith (and in such foreign poets as Goethe, Emerson, and Whitman) as a substitute for the religion which Europe had been losing since the Renaissance. He is doubtless correct in this, as he is in his diagnosis of poetry since Hardy as revealing both a lack of religion and a lack of any such substitute; for the nineteenth-century concept of nature is in our time wholly gone. If it were not already dead Mr. Beach's dull book would have buried it. It is not so much that Mr. Beach is dull as that his subject is. Much of what he has to tell about what the poets thought, and most of what he quotes from them, is indeed preposterously dull. Their world is well lost, since it was built on nothing but pious hopes. Mr. Beach himself indulges such a hope when at the end he predicts that the poetry of the future will warm itself up again with the social theme. But perhaps the best poetry, now or long ago, can be said to burn with its own inner fire—as the best of Wordsworth does, for instance, whatever Wordsworth may have believed about the hierarchy of creation. Any history of poetry not purely formal in its concern tends to take a vast deal of second-rate verse too seriously because it furnishes proof that certain subjects were "developed" from author to author. This may be interesting as history, but it tells us little or nothing about how first-rate poetry comes here or there into being.

MARK VAN DOREN

NEW PROVINCES. POEMS BY SEVERAL AUTHORS.

The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Now out of Canada comes a little book representing various younger poets. Robert Finch, Leo Kennedy, A. M. Klein, E. J. Pratt, F. R. Scott, A. J. M. Smith all have a group of poems in this collection, which reminds one, immediately, of the early collections of the younger English and American poets. Here is poetic criticism of the social system, satirical disillusion; here also the imprint of Eliot and the denial of Eliot's later religious values. Here again is the effort in poetry to use ideas only to make them felt. Of the poets represented Robert Finch appears to be working most carefully with syntax. A. M. Klein fixes upon Jewish life and character the satirical eye of the young T. S. Eliot. F. R. Scott reminds us in his materials of our more ironic and revolutionary poets. Almost all the poets included are attempting to fuse a scientific understanding of the world with a sensuous perception of its significance to man. Much of this poetry is very interesting. Almost none of it is as yet perfectly achieved. But these young poets are working in a new technique and with new materials. And this may be the first book to point the way which Canadian poets are taking. Romanticism is out. The illusion of the importance of the individual is gone. These poets face their world to criticize and to reevaluate it.

EDA LOU WALTON

I'M FOR ROOSEVELT. By Joseph P. Kennedy. Reynal and Hitchcock. $1.

The former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, an economist and man of means, tells why he supports President Roosevelt for reelection. Emphasis is laid primarily on economic factors—on the recovery which resulted from devaluation, on the benefits resulting from relief expenditures, and on the salutary effects of the legislation for the regulation of corporate financing. Little is said about the NRA, the silver policy, the Social Security Act, or any other of the more dubious of the New Deal "experiments." Despite these omissions, the main thesis of the book—that Roosevelt has brought recovery—is so well documented that the Republican National Committee would be well advised to ignore it—if it can.

Letters to the Editors

Journalistic Distinction

Dear Sirs: The article in your issue of July 16 on Campaign Press Agents was a rather disingenuous fulmination by Paul W. Ward, whose facile presentation obviously wasn't hindered by facts. The article terms Alfred H. Kirchhofer, managing editor of the Buffalo Evening News and publicity chief for the Republican national campaign, "a dour fellow of no particular journalistic distinction." Surely Mr. Ward should know that The Nation itself, a few years ago, acclaimed a particular journalistic distinction earned by Mr. Kirchhofer. The Nation, in naming its selection for The Nation's Honor Roll for 1931, chose in the field of journalism: "the Buffalo Evening News, for its admirable work in improving conditions that amounted virtually to peonage in the employment and housing of laborers on state public works."

This "admirable work" was conceived and directed by the man whom Mr. Ward airily dismisses as "of no particular journalistic distinction." I know because I was the reporter he assigned to it.

Mr. Ward's article also referred to Mr. Kirchhofer as the man who "runs, as managing editor, a paper, the Buffalo Evening News, which is capable of discerning boondoggling in a project to disconnect the sewage-disposal system from a community's water supply." For Mr. Ward's enlightenment there's no sewage-disposal system here to be disconnected from any water supply; the system is just entering preliminary stages of construction. The News's fight revolved around political selection of an engineer for the $15,000,000 project. Sufficient to say that the revelations by the News, under the aforementioned Mr. Kirchhofer's direction, led Public Works Administrator Harold L. Ickes in Washington to toss overboard the engineer chosen by the local politicians and to divorce the latter completely from any connection with the project.

J. L. MEDDOFF

Buffalo, N. Y., July 29

—and Boondoggling

Dear Sirs: Mr. Meddoff and I are at loggerheads on only one point. We differ as to the meaning of "journalistic distinction." I reserve that category for men such as Ben Stolberg, Louis Stark, Paul Y. Anderson, Heywood Broun, John T. Flynn, and H. N. Brailsford. I doubt that even Mr. Meddoff would put his boss, Mr. Kirchhofer, in that company. Certainly Mr. Kirchhofer's former colleagues in the Washington press corps do not. In fact, what I wrote of him was based squarely on what more than a dozen members of that corps—men who had worked with "Kirk" and liked him—told me of him. I had consulted them because I myself knew Kirchhofer only casually. They were unanimous in picturing him as a meticulous workman, a plugger, without brilliance or any remarkable talent.

As for my reference to the sewage-disposal project, Mr. Meddoff does me something less than justice. I did not have in mind the project to which he refers. If Mr. Meddoff needs to know what I had in mind, I refer him to the paper's "daily boondoggle" series. My reference was merely an attempt briefly to characterize the frequently bizarre nature of the anti-New Deal trend of the news columns over which Mr. Kirchhofer presides.

PAUL W. WARD

Washington, August 30

In Defense of Dr. Kubie

Dear Sirs: I wish to protest that Grace Adams's review of "The Practical Aspects of Psychoanalysis" by Lawrence Kubie is grossly unfair both to Dr. Kubie and to psychoanalysis. Judging by the distortions of its contents that fill each of her paragraphs, I doubt whether Miss Adams has done more than glance through the book with hostility and wilful misunderstanding. Nothing she says about it is entirely true and the half-truths are twisted with malicious stupidity.

ESTHER D. HAMILL

Cambridge, Mass., August 18

—and of Psychoanalysis

Dear Sirs: Among the book reviews of your issue of August 8 appears the expression of Miss Grace Adams's feelings about my own book. That in her comments she should call me some harsh names is a matter of no moment to anyone else. That she should make this an opportunity to misrepresent and attack psychoanalysis by completely falsifying and distorting the contents of my book is a matter which cannot pass without correction.

In the first place, lest you be misled by her first paragraph into thinking that the book is not an accurate presentation of the subject, I can tell you that up to now all reviews in technical analytic journals have been highly favorable, that Freud wrote to me praising it warmly, and that the International Psychoanalytic Press asked for the translation rights.

Secondly, I would point out that Miss Adams, except for one or two passing thrusts at matters dealt with carefully in earlier chapters, leaps gaily over the entire volume and focuses on the final chapter. By so doing she misses the whole spirit and purpose of the book, and often makes it seem to support the very evils it was in part written to attack.

The book is avowedly written for "prospective patients," in order to make them approach analysis cautiously, with open eyes, forewarned against its hardships, its duration, its sacrifices, its expense. Little is said of rewards. Not one glowing picture of a cure is given. Instead of claims, as Miss Adams states, that "everyone who is correctly analyzed by a properly trained Freudian gets well," the reader will find records of mistakes, failures, and obstacles. The isolated position of the analyst is portrayed not as something he arrogates to himself, as Miss Adams implies, but as something which he himself deplores but which is forced upon him by the inexorable facts of practice in this field of medicine. Furthermore, the book describes to the layman those facts which he must seek to know whenever he tries to judge the course and outcome of any particular analysis, thus guiding the "outsider" to a clearer view if he wishes to acquire one.

I could point to many other glaring errors, such as the misrepresentation of the careful discussion of the problem of financing an analytic treatment; and other merely silly comments. It seems to me, however, that I have said enough to prove to you the justification of my protest.

Mr. Thomas Loses a Vote

Dear Sirs: In the coming election I, as a liberal favoring "scientific" socialism, would naturally vote for Norman Thomas. But in the United States, where prejudice and propaganda rule over reason, there is little likelihood that a Socialist candidate will be elected, surely not until economic conditions become so acute that my own class, the white-collar class, is compelled to sink its prejudices and to swing its support to the wage-earners, where its economic interests belong.

It follows that if Roosevelt is not reelected, Landon will be elected. Although I am not so beguiled as to believe that Roosevelt is a modern Moses to lead us out of the wilderness of economic and political chaos, I think of him as somewhat less reactionary than the Landon connections. It is a choice between the lesser of two evils—the support of Roosevelt to checkmate reaction—and possibly an American form of fascism.

Worm Bites Professor

Dear Sirs: September 8, 1936, is the 125th anniversary of the birth of Francis Bowen, the New England intellectual. His is a unique distinction. He was the only American professor to be ousted for insufficient radicalism. When the worm of "academic freedom" turned, it bit Bowen.

In 1850-51 American sympathies were violently aroused for Kossuth and the Hungarians and their unsuccessful struggle "for Freedom and Democratic Institutions, against the Despotism, Usurpation, and Perfidy of the Austrian empire." The only anti-Hungarian note was struck by Bowen in the North American Review, which he edited. Bowen defended the Austrians in his magazine, apologizing for Haynau, Metternich, and the whole reactionary Hapsburg regime.

Our patriots, for once, were indignant at this violation of the American tradition, and they became sore enough to cause Bowen to lose the Maclean chair of history at Harvard. A few years later, of course, he was given another chair at Harvard, but the existence of that almost mythical American genus, the teacher dismissed for reactionary political views, had been definitely established as real, although rare enough to be virtually extinct.

CONTRIBUTORS

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH has recently returned from a visit to England and France, where he talked with T. S. Eliot, Rebecca West, Bertrand Russell, André Malraux, Ralph Fox, and other leading literary figures. These interviews will be incorporated in a series of four articles beginning in this issue.

M. E. RAVAGE, author of "The Malady of Europe," has traveled as a journalist throughout Western and Central Europe and is now in Paris as The Nation's French correspondent.

JOHANN SCHMIDT is the pseudonym of a German business man who spent six months in the concentration camp described in Sojourn in Hell. On his release he came to this country.

JOHN STEINBECK has received critical acclaim for two very different books during the last year. The first, "Tortilla Flat," was a romantic love story laid in Mexico; the second, "In Dubious Battle," was a proletarian novel dealing with a strike among California apple-pickers.

WILLIAM TROY, a frequent book reviewer for The Nation, is on the English faculty of Bennington College.

PHILIP RAHV is one of the editors of the Partisan Review and Anvil, a radical literary journal.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL has recently published "The Jews of Germany," a historical study of particular timeliness. His earlier book, "A World Passed By," dealt with Jewish civilizations in Europe and North Africa.

CARLETON BEALS, author of "Mexican Maze," a life of Porfirio Díaz, and other books, is a journalist who has visited and written about many countries of Latin America. In 1928 he contributed to The Nation firsthand accounts of Sandino's revolt in Nicaragua.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, editor of "An Anthology of Light Verse" and more recently of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany," is one of New York's leading book critics.

HALF A LANDSLIDE IS BETTER THAN NONE, but the Republicans cannot take unmixed comfort from the Maine results. Paul Ward has pointed out that in every campaign since 1892, with one exception, when the Republican margin in September has failed to exceed 25,000 the Democrats have captured the White House in November. But here are three widely variant margins. The Republicans elected a governor by a majority of some 40,000 votes. They elected three Congressmen by majorities under 20,000, thus giving the Republicans two more votes in the House. Senator White was reelected by less than 5,000 votes, although he made an anti-New Deal campaign. To be sure, his rival, Governor Brann, has been a popular candidate in the past—in this fight he carried twelve of twenty cities, including Lewiston, the home city of both men. Moreover, he did not run as a New Dealer—on the contrary he expressly stated some weeks ago that the New Deal was not an issue. In both cases there were complicating factors. Senator White has supported New Deal favors to Maine, and Governor Brann grew less specific toward the end in his attitude toward the New Deal. Certainly the Maine election this year can scarcely be taken as a conclusive guide to the November outcome. The Republicans can point to the 40,000 lead in the governorship; the Democrats can add up the three sets of figures, divide by three, and get a majority smaller than the crucial 25,000. It is just possible that rural rock-bound Maine is losing its significance as a political indicator for urban industrial America. Meanwhile it is a pleasure to record that Georgia has sent the cracker-dictator 'Gene Talmadge to a well-earned obscurity. We shall be spared his presence in the Senate, and he has given place to a new governor in Georgia.

IT WAS A FOREGONE CONCLUSION THAT THE National Progressive Conference in Chicago would endorse Roosevelt's candidacy. It is in the light of 1940 that its manifesto and personnel take on significance. The manifesto in tone and content is the expression of a group of sincere progressives hoping to bring about genuine democracy by democratic methods. The principles it sets forth are unimpeachable; what it lacks is a quality to be found, for instance, in the utterances of John L. Lewis, a will to power which might galvanize the progressive forces of the country into a fighting instrument. Between the hopeful general program of today and a specific winning candidate in 1940 or 1944 lies the primary job of organizing labor industrially and educating it politically. It is encouraging to find that 27 of 100 persons who attended the conference were labor-union officials, giving to the meeting a higher degree of specific gravity than has been noticeable in former progressive gatherings. But the mere fact that the conference so wholeheartedly indorsed Roosevelt indicates at least one variety of danger that besets its path. The Democratic Party will make every effort to keep the progressives captive; it will concentrate especially on labor and its leaders, who have a long tradition of yielding to political blandishments. The industrial-craft-union dispute can be used to aggravate this tendency. The task of the progressives lies mainly in the lower ranks of labor's organizations. Can they overcome the barrier of political as opposed to economic freedom which has hitherto separated progressive leaders from their logical supporters—labor and the farmers?

THE LOSS OF SAN SEBASTIAN AND THE PORT of Pasajes, while expected, is the most serious defeat suffered by the Spanish government since the first week of the civil war. As a city San Sebastian is of little significance, being primarily a resort town, but with Pasajes it gives the rebels a much-needed opening to the sea. In contrast to the situation at Cadiz, where the navy has enforced a reasonably effective blockade, the government is helpless to prevent supplies from coming in from the north. On the other fronts Madrid appears to be holding its own. Despite the use of airplanes manned by German and Italian aviators, the rebel offensive at Talavera seems to have been checked. Elsewhere the stalemate continues, with the government profiting by the delay to train and equip its citizen militia. The danger of active foreign assistance to the rebels has increased as a result of the breakdown of the non-intervention conference at London, but in the end such aid may prove a boomerang. Nothing is so likely to coalesce the entire nation against the military clique as the knowledge that the latter's battle is being fought almost exclusively by Moorish mercenary troops supported by foreign munitions and money.

A SINO-JAPANESE WAR LOOMS AS A POSSIBLE outgrowth of the settlement reported to have been reached between Chiang Kai-shek and the Kwangsi militarists. Although the agreement has been hailed in Nanking as strengthening the power of the central government, it is apparent that Chiang, under tremendous popular pressure, has conceded everything of importance demanded by insurgent leaders. Nanking troops are being removed from the border areas, where they had been sent to prepare for an attack on Kwangsi; the members of the Kwangsi faction have been reinstated in the Nationalist Party and given positions of responsibility in the civil administration; Chiang Kai-shek's arch-foe—Tsai Ting-kai, leader of the famous Nineteenth Route Army—has been put in command of one of the Kwangsi units with financial assistance from Nanking. It is probable that Tsai Ting-kai has Nanking's support in refusing to permit Japanese naval authorities to investigate the murder of a Japanese subject at Pakhoi. Alarmed by the wave of anti-Japanese sentiment which has culminated in the slaying of three Japanese within a fortnight, Tokyo is reported to have suddenly softened its demands; but its position is rendered difficult by a revival of activity on the part of the fascists, who are demanding a more vigorous policy toward China. Similarly, Chiang has been embarrassed by the sudden appearance of an anti-Japanese Communist army, 70,000 strong, at the gates of Titao in Kansu. With the governments of both countries under strong pressure, developments may be expected momentarily.

THE THIRD WORLD POWER CONFERENCE served to dramatize the difficulty of obtaining the full use of our natural resources in a profit-making society. The conference was supposed to be highly technical in character, devoted to the problem of how to increase man's command over nature. Actually, as Mr. Coleman points out elsewhere in this issue, the gathering was confronted at practically every session with the futility of seeking to expand our power resources as long as private interests throttled consumption by exorbitant rates. In the interest of "fairness" the utility magnates were allowed a period of time equal to that of the sponsors of public ownership. The result was hardly elevating. Floyd L. Carlisle, chairman of the Consolidated Edison Company of New York, sought, in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary, to prove that the rates of municipal power companies are higher on the average than those of private companies when taxes are taken into consideration. His figures on the publicly owned plant at Los Angeles were immediately challenged by two Los Angeles engineers, E. F. Scattergood and William Peterson, who accused Carlisle of using "incomplete figures, so carefully selected" as to be "decidedly on the side of misrepresentation." The struggle against the utilities will not be won on the debaters' rostrum, but the sooner the average American realizes that he must choose between cheap electric power for himself and profits for the utilities the sooner the showdown will come.

THE NEW YORK TIMES IS A GREAT NEWSPAPER. As a "red" friend of ours remarked only recently, it will be a shame when the revolution comes because it will probably be necessary to suppress the Times. We should sorely miss those unbelievable front-page names—Will Moscow, Hugh Byas, Otto D. Tolischus—heading the stately columns of news that cover the world as it has never been covered before. We should miss the voice of Augur (speaking for the British government over a world-wide hook-up). We should even miss the Monday reports of Sunday sermons with their quaint headlines: Swearing by Women Found on Increase; Science Is Blamed for Moral Chaos; Sees God "Put in Attic." Until September 11 we never thought we should miss the editorial page. On that date our copy of the Times walked up the stairs by itself and broke down the door; taking its stand, it flew open at the editorial page and shouted these words at us above the roar of campaign speeches and Spanish guns:

Once we suppress the right of free speech and assembly for any group, however small or obnoxious, we violate the basic principle of liberal democracy.

The Times was speaking of and denouncing George U. Harvey, a local martinet who happens to be Borough President of Queens, New York City, for refusing a request of the Queens Communist Party for a permit to hold a meeting in Jamaica Town Hall. Since then a judicial martinet, one Supreme Court Justice Paul Bonyng, has taken his place beside Mr. Harvey as a violator of the Constitution. He has upheld the ruling, to the loud cheers of the American League Against Communism. The Times has taken up the cudgels in defense of civil liberties not a moment too early. They must not be laid down, especially since Mr. Harvey has now expressed his determination to take the Communist Party off the ballot. We know of no other single force, at present, which could dislodge the two little dictators in Queens as quickly as a few well-placed Times (editorial) bombs.

LAST WEEK SCIENTISTS WERE MEETING ALL over the place and announcing results which are vaguely disturbing to the layman even when, as seems so often the case, they offer the solution of problems he didn't know existed and hold out hopes for the cure of diseases he didn't know he could have. Most of us, for example, did not know that any number can be expressed as the sum of not more than four squares; so most of us were probably just a little better off before we heard that one of the learned men meeting at Harvard can demonstrate the fact in 120 hours. Slightly more immediately arresting were the pronouncement of a doctor at the American Council of Physical Therapy meeting in New York, who issued a solemn warning against cold baths, and that of two other savants at Harvard who contributed the news that the beauty of the human body depends upon electricity and that the "engineer" which controls the development of an embryo can be transplanted from one to another and continue to boss the job in its new environment. If, on the other hand, you are more interested in abolishing idiocy by dietary methods, keeping alive after the suprarenal gland has been removed, or producing a substitute for choline, then the meeting of the American Chemical Society at Pittsburgh is the place for you. Choline, or its equivalent, which we need imperatively even if we didn't know we had it, can be got either from the bile of cattle or—at the rate of one-tenth ounce per ton and a half—from mushrooms. Eye of a newt and toe of a frog. . . .

REAR-END PLATFORM APPEARANCES FROM Kansas to Maine and "fireside chats" from Hyde Park and Washington have alike been empty of reference to one of the gravest issues confronting the American people today. It remained for one of that despised race, the professors, to grasp the nettle of the Constitution, to point out that we are facing a "constitutional crisis of unpredictable gravity," and to suggest a solution. In his lecture on the Constitution at the Harvard Tercentenary, Professor Corwin said we must choose between the Constitution as symbol and as instrument. Today it serves as symbol and as such is static, a taboo, a thing dead on its feet whose function is "the protection of private advantage as against the public power." But it is as an instrument of public power to create a "feasible national existence" that the Constitution was thought of by the men who made it, and into such an instrument we must remake it now. Professor Corwin quotes Governor Landon as saying that "the Constitution was not framed to give us anything but to protect inherent rights already possessed." The very opening words of the document indicate how prejudiced is this interpretation. They show that the Constitution was meant to do something, not to stamp, seal, and ratify something already done. But we cannot remake it by thinking of it as a thing inviolate and perfect. Whenever he heard a eulogy of the Constitution, said W. H. Crawford, one-time Presidential candidate, he felt "an involuntary apprehension of mischief." What we must do, says Dr. Corwin, is to change our idea of the Constitution, "enlarge our idea of power to include economic power," and then the court will inevitably follow. Freed of the fear that the ax will drop, creative national legislation may really function.

NEWS FROM LONDON INDICATES THAT WHILE England may have conquered half the world in a fit of absent-mindedness, she can concentrate hard when she wants to. Today three vital issues absorb her: the rat menace, what to wear for the coronation, and was that really a sea monster off the coast of Norfolk? The monster was seen galloping through the water at ninety miles an hour by an ex-Lord Mayor of Norwich, an ex-Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, and an ex-M.P., who were all walking on the beach one day (which is rather suspicious in itself). But some fishermen found that on close contact the black humps of the serpent dissolved into clouds of sea birds. As for the rats, there are two kinds, brown and black. While the Rats and Mice (Destruction) Act of 1919 was all right for the brown or sewer rat, the black rat (who is really brown too, but who has a long tail which he wears curled over his ears) continues to gnaw at buildings unmolested. This is pretty awful; and the London Times and its readers are daily telling each other how terrible they feel about it. Meanwhile cloth designers are anxiously trying to work out a "satisfactory red, white, and blue blend" in patriotic designs for women's tweeds in preparation for the Great Occasion next spring. But their dilemma is as nothing to that of the pottery makers. They are afraid that if the King marries before he is crowned they will have to replace all the mugs they have made bearing his portrait with others picturing both him and his consort. So Lloyds' has been approached for insurance against the sovereign's marriage and is for perhaps the first time in its history at a loss about what to do.

Democracy in Retreat

IF any doubt remained regarding the gravity of M. Blum's blunder in proposing non-interference in Spain's struggle, it has been swept away by the events of the past week. Internally, his action has destroyed, possibly for all time, the unity of the Front Populaire. Although the Communists have declared that they will not allow the issue to provoke a break with the Blum Cabinet, the wave of strikes developing throughout the country presages more than a mere governmental crisis. It is not impossible that France, like Spain, will be plunged into civil war because of the shortsightedness of its Popular Front government.

The most serious repercussions, however, have been in the international sphere. As might have been anticipated, the neutrality pact has been a complete fiasco. Representatives of twenty-six European nations gathered in London on September 9, nearly eight weeks after the outbreak of the Spanish revolt, but their efforts to devise a method for international limitation of arms shipments to Spain were thwarted by the obstructionist attitude of the German and Italian delegates. Portugal, which has been the chief offender against neutrality, was not even represented. Recent reports indicate that all three fascist countries are still actively engaged in aiding the Spanish rebels, while France and the democratic nations are consistently refusing to assist Madrid. Thus the Socialist Premier of France finds himself in the unenviable position of initiating a policy calculated to overthrow the Socialist government of Spain.

An even graver repercussion of Blum's policy could be seen during the past week at Nürnberg. Spurred by the paralysis of the democratic powers in the Spanish crisis, fascism has very definitely seized the offensive in Europe. Whereas a year ago the world was talking of welding an iron ring around Germany and of imposing drastic sanctions on Italy, it now appears to be fearfully awaiting the day when the fascist armies will march. The Nazis' fanatical opposition to bolshevism is scarcely news, nor yet is their desire to make a new place in the sun for the Reich. But the lengths to which Hitler, Goebbels, and Rosenberg have gone in denouncing the Soviet Union indicate an arrogant self-confidence hitherto lacking in the Nazi leadership. Hitler's reassertion of the German demand for colonies at this moment is a further indication of his contempt for the democratic powers.

Responsibility for the weakness of democracy in the present crisis does not lie entirely with M. Blum. As in the Ethiopian conflict, the British government has trembled at any action which might lead to war. Doubtless this recent timidity is due partially to the sudden discovery of England's vulnerability to air attack. But it appears to be primarily the result of a sharp division within the ruling class regarding the value of democracy itself. Winston Churchill, for example, has declared in reference to the Spanish crisis that no "constitutional and parliamentary regime is legally or morally entitled to the obedience of all classes when it is actually being subverted and devoured from day to day by communism." He adds that "a constitutional government . . . must prove itself capable of . . . protecting life, freedom, and property." Paraphrased, Churchill appears to be saying that he favors democracy only as long as it preserves capitalism. And if we are to judge by actions, many of the British conservatives would qualify their oath of allegiance to the king to make it apply only as long as the demands of patriotism did not conflict with property interests. For how else can one explain the fanatical zeal with which many of the Tories have supported the Spanish rebels when it is evident that a rebel success would spell the end of British domination of the Mediterranean?

The French and British governments are in a most unenviable position. They have a choice of seeking to patch up a non-intervention agreement which would actually prevent fascist assistance to the rebels, or of admitting their error and throwing their full assistance to the legal government of Spain. If non-intervention could be made a reality, it would undoubtedly be of value to the Spanish government, since the rebels could not carry on without foreign aid. But if there is any method, short of blockade and war, by which Italian and German assistance can be stopped, it has not been disclosed. There is real danger, moreover, that half-hearted attempts to enforce such a pact will lead to growing friction until the world is plunged into war to preserve neutrality. On the other hand, grave risks are involved in an active support of Madrid even though such action is clearly permitted under international law.

But this policy is dangerous only if Germany or Italy is desirous of an immediate war. This, as Mr. Stewart points out elsewhere in this issue, is extremely unlikely in view of the fact that both countries are facing a serious if temporary shortage of strategic raw materials. Meanwhile, war will not be averted by surrendering all the positions to the enemy in advance. Fascists have only contempt for conciliation and compromise. If democracy is to survive in any country it must turn and face the enemy. As the events of the past few weeks have clearly shown, the enemy is not to be found only in Germany and Italy, but is already entrenched within the gates of democracy.

The Row Over Milk

NEW YORK'S battle over milk continues. On September 4 the three largest distributors announced an increase of one cent a quart to consumers. The consequent protests made some 8,000 retail stores continue the old price of eleven cents. Upstate, the farmers of twenty-nine counties have banded together and threatened a strike if their price of $3 a hundredweight of fluid milk is not met. And the distributors have already granted the farmers an increase of from $2.70 to $2.87 a hundredweight.

At the meeting in Albany on September 12 before Commissioner of Agriculture Ten Eyck, at which the farmers' demands were presented, Governor Lehman tried to pour oil on the troubled milk while the decision of the Milk Control Board was being formulated. If it could be established that the cost of feed had increased owing to dry weather, the Governor thought that the farmer was probably entitled to a higher price; but it must be remembered, he added, first that milk was a necessity, and it was very doubtful if the consumer would stand an increase, and second that a higher price would mean a smaller sale, with the farmer losing out in the long run. This argument would seem to leave the farmer about where he is today at the same time that it ignores the basic difficulty of the milk question—the middleman. Recently, when the Milk Control Board announced a twenty-five-cent increase for the producers, Dr. Shirley Wynne, spokesman for the large dealers, was quoted as saying, "This increase will bankrupt the distributors." Perhaps Dr. Wynne spoke too soon. In 1931 the National Dairy Products Corporation (Sheffield) earned 18.36 per cent on invested capital; in 1932, at the bottom of the depression, it earned 10.74 per cent; and in 1935, having traversed the hard years, it still earned 8.92 per cent. Since its organization in 1924 the company has never ceased to pay dividends. For the first six months of 1936 National Dairy netted $5,928,095, almost twice the sum for the corresponding period last year. In 1935 the president of the company received a salary of $108,680, and nine other officers received salaries ranging from $35,500 to $60,733. Borden's, though a smaller company, presents a comparable report. As early as April, President Milbank of Borden's declared that the company expected to increase its earnings in 1936. With such financial statements these companies still claim that in order to pay the farmer a larger price they must either take an extra cent from the consumer or face bankruptcy. But these facts Governor Lehman did not mention.

The farmer complains not only that he is paid too low a price per hundredweight of fluid milk. He objects also to the "classification price" under which his milk is sold. This is the process of paying a certain rate for all milk sold as fluid milk and a much lower price for "surplus" milk used in the manufacture of ice cream, cheese, and so on. The distributor, however, decides how much milk will be paid for as surplus. The average price to the farmer per hundredweight in July was, according to a member of the Dairymen's League, $1.76.

The consumers have already banded together to protest the extra cent per quart. Headed by the Consumers' Union, a Milk Consumers' Protective Committee has been formed, representing settlement houses and church and consumer groups. The New York Department of Health has been publishing a list of retail stores at which milk can be bought at the old price. But it is equally necessary for the farmers to unite. If their demands are not met, as it seems unlikely they will be, a strike may serve to dramatize the issue sufficiently to bring the producers and the consumers closer together. Only by exerting pressure above and below can the middlemen be squeezed into a conciliatory frame of mind. But the real solution, as the consumers recognize, is either consumer cooperative distributing plants or a municipal milk supply. The consumers' committee has already requested Mayor LaGuardia to establish a city pasteurization plant as a yardstick for distributing costs.

Faking the Spanish News

WHEN we read in our daily papers accounts of the civil war in Spain we rarely stop to question their sources. The Nation has received a communication from an American correspondent in Europe telling something of what happens to the news as it passes over the wires on its way from Spain to the American headlines. As he is still active as a journalist, our informant, who has had ten years' experience in Europe with both agencies and individual newspapers, must remain anonymous. We reprint his letter here, without comment, save for some exhibits from the American press which may serve to illustrate his story.

"For seven weeks I have spent fifteen hours a day watching the news of the Spanish civil war pour over my desk and I have finally reached the point where I must let off steam or burst. What has eaten into this fairly thick hide, strengthened by something like a decade of reporting from Europe, is the complete tossing overboard of all standards by American correspondents in the reporting of the Spanish war. Competition has long been eating at the dikes of the professional scruples of foreign correspondents, so that there has always been a premium on sensationalism. But that does not excuse the technique of simply inventing a story in cold blood to catch the headlines; and it is all the more maddening because that system has been greeted with complete success. The news agencies are the greatest offenders. They are battling for the headlines and the headlines go to the most sensational story. I am in a position to know fairly well what goes out of Europe, and it is my opinion that many of the sensational stories carried by at least one news service are written, not in Europe, but in New York. It is amusing to read them on this side of the water when the New York papers arrive ten days late. Day after day the papers carry smashing headlines which have been proved false one or two days after. But by then the new fake is being bannered across the front page and the old one has been forgotten. No one apparently notices these daily fabrications. Denials and corrections are not news.

"From Spain, of course, no true stories at all can be filed. Neither the government nor the rebels permit anything to go out that is not completely biased in favor of the side that is doing the censoring. Correspondents, therefore, rely mainly on three other sources: Lisbon, in complete sympathy with the rebels; London, cursed by a press entirely without scruples; and Paris, where almost any paper can be bought for a picayune sum. One would have thought that credulity regarding atrocity stories had ended with the last war. But all the hoary anecdotes are with us again. It suffices for the Daily Mail, for example (perhaps the most vicious of all the English sheets), to print the story that the government forces have filled a cell with women and children, doused them with gasoline, and set them on fire, for every paper in the world to pick up the story as sober truth on no further authority than that one prejudiced and unscrupulous paper has printed it. I have interviewed many refugees myself and heard a variety of horrible tales—all hearsay. In not one case had anyone actually seen any atrocities.

"The average newspaper reader never seems to remember what he reads for twenty-four hours. He may have read the vivid Associated Press story describing the heavy artillery bombardment (from Pamplona, which would indicate that the rebels possessed replicas of the Big Bertha which fired on Paris!) preceding the attack on Madrid, which began at dawn and appeared on New York newsstands some ten hours before dawn in Spain—the result of a slug 'hold for release' having been dropped off in transmission—but he failed utterly to note the next day and the next and the next that there hadn't been any attack on Madrid. He may have read how President Azaña had fled to Valencia on his way out of Spain because all was lost but honor, but it did not occur to him that there was any discrepancy with the news two days later that Azaña had left Madrid to review the troops along the Sierra frontier, returning to the capital in the evening. Can anything be done to end the barrage of fake stories? Nothing, I think, as long as the newspaper reader continues to accept everything that is printed and divests himself of whatever critical sense he may ever have had."

Campaign Gossip

Washington, September 14

EACH Presidential campaign kicks up its own cloud of anecdotes, and the time has come to set down some of the current ones. The teller of the first one is a leading Kansas financier, a Landon intimate and adviser, and the warmest Landon supporter I encountered at Topeka. In case doubts later assail you that he is a true friend of the Republican Presidential nominee, let me emphasize that the gentleman is also a contributing member of the Liberty League.

I had asked him to tell me about Landon as a human being, and he had reached a point in his discourse where he referred to Landon as "frugal." He emphasized the word in a way to indicate he meant something more than frugal and gave me cause to express a mild astonishment, which accelerated my friend's discourse. "Is he frugal?" he fairly snorted, his voice rising. "Is he frugal? Say, I guess I shouldn't tell this but I can't help it. You know, he gets $20,000 or $30,000 a year from his oil properties and he's very comfortably fixed, but I could never live the way he does. Why, do you know, back in 1932 when he had just been elected Governor or was about to be elected, his first child by this present wife was born. Now, Theo, his wife, she's a mighty fine girl, daughter of the town's leading banker, been used to living, if not luxuriously—'cause we don't live luxuriously out here—at least living well. Well, when that first kid was born, do you think he'd buy her a nice baby carriage? Not on your life. D'ye know what he did? He went out and paid $2.25 for a second-hand baby carriage!"

Indignation had nearly robbed my friend of breath by the time he ended this tale establishing Landon's claim to the Coolidgean mantle, and I sought to give him a breathing spell by setting off against his narrative one of my own. I said that a few days earlier there had departed for the East a New York journalist and that, on the eve of his departure, Governor Landon had presented a five-pound box of candy to the journalist's wife, a former show girl. The financier groaned. "I'd suspect the worst, I'd suspect the worst," he said.

It was also from a Topeka banker and ardent Landonite that I collected another anecdote casting light on the Republican nominee's character. This gentleman was trying to impress me with Landon's stubbornness. He said that once Landon had made up his mind, there was no power under heaven that could change it. To illustrate, this money changer told how Governor Landon a few years ago had been persuaded to address a bankers' convention and had insisted on including in his speech an attack on the House of Morgan. "What could he possibly have
